"In most cases, they will walk away with lavish severance packages that will more than offset any ill-gotten gains that the board presses them to return."

DOJ_NMG_0096206

kathy.kristof@latimes.com

Check, Please Companies Discover It's Hard To Reclaim Pay From Executives (WSJ)

By Phred Dvorak And Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

In April 2001, directors of utility FPL Group Inc. faced a sticky problem. A few months earlier, they'd awarded top executives $62 million in bonuses linked to a merger that would have created the U.S.'s biggest electric company. Now the deal had fallen apart and shareholders were clamoring to get the money back.

FPL directors scrutinized payment plans. They clashed with executives. Shareholders sued. After three years and millions in legal bills, executives returned $9 million, based largely on a technicality. Insurers paid another $12.5 million.

The FPL saga is an object lesson in why companies rarely recoup money paid to executives for results they didn't actually achieve. Although the concept seems simple, at least from an ethical point of view, so-called "clawbacks" of executive pay are in practice disruptive, divisive and difficult to pull off. In addition to a murky legal environment, the process is complicated by compensation contracts and insurance provisions. Most boards don't try recovering the money. Those that do often get mired in years of litigation.

With beefed up scrutiny of corporate accounting, an increasing number of companies have been revising their numbers, making the clawback problem more acute. In the first nine months of this year, 1,070 companies restated previously reported results, up from 948 in the same period last year, according to shareholder adviser Glass, Lewis & Co. These revisions lowered revenue and profits totals that were the basis for millions of dollars in executive bonuses.

In the most egregious cases, executives who fudged numbers that boosted their pay have been pursued by prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Former CA Inc. Chief Executive Sanjay Kumar pleaded guilty in April to manipulating the dates of sales contracts to artificially boost revenue by more than $2 billion in 1999 and 2000. That helped earn Mr. Kumar $5.6 million in performance-based bonuses and $331 million in restricted stock. In 2000, Mr. Kumar returned about a third of the restricted stock to settle a shareholder suit.

In addition to his 12-year prison sentence, Mr. Kumar has to pay an $8 million fine and restitution to investors; the amount hasn't been set. The SEC has claims pending for civil penalties and return of his "ill-gotten gains." CA, the software company formerly known as Computer Associates, has sued Mr. Kumar for repayment of his legal expenses.

A handful of executives quietly repay their companies. In 1998, then-CEO Lawrence Coss returned roughly a third of his $102 million 1996 bonus to Green Tree Financial Corp., now part of Conseco Inc., after a restatement wiped out $174 million of pretax profit on which the bonus was based. In August, the top 14 officers of electronic-component maker Molex Inc. said they'd return a total of $685,000 in gains on misdated stock options they'd received over the last 12 years.

Even voluntarily returning money can prove complicated. After a 2002 restatement shaved $100 million from Dollar General Corp.'s net income for 1998 to 2000, the discount retailer's then-CEO, Cal Turner Jr., decided to return all of his bonuses. But his awards also included the right to exercise stock options ahead of schedule -- and the value of the shares he bought had fallen below what he'd paid for them.

Mr. Turner says he told his lawyers he'd return whatever amount they chose, which turned out to be $6.8 million. "How on earth do you calculate that anyhow?" Mr. Turner says.

Some boards who pursue current or former executives find themselves bogged down in the courts. Canadian telecommunication-equipment maker Nortel Networks Corp. last year recovered $8.6 million in "return to profitability" bonuses paid to 12 executives. A restatement showed the company hadn't returned to profitability after all. It sued another 10 executives, including fired CEO Frank Dunn, who has counter-sued the company. All the suits are pending.

Symbol Technologies Inc., a maker of barcode scanners, sued four former executives in U.S. district court in Central Islip, N.Y. in 2004, to retrieve bonuses based on results the company now says were fraudulent. The suit is on hold while three of the executives contest criminal charges. A trial early this year in the same court of two of those individuals ended in a mistrial. A new one is scheduled for next year.

The 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law was supposed to ease the process of recovering undeserved bonuses. One provision requires CEOs and chief financial officers to return performance-based pay or profits from stock sales following restatements that involve misconduct. But when companies and shareholders have tried to use the law in civil courts, they've been rebuffed by judges and arbitrators who say the vaguely worded rule suggests only the SEC can enforce the provision. The agency, meanwhile, has never done so.

Directors of Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. tried invoking the provision in their long-running battle against former CEO Henry Yuen. The SEC in its own case, brought in U.S. district court in Los Angeles, says Mr. Yuen helped inflate the company's revenue between 1999 and 2002, a charge he denies. Mr. Yuen's incentive-based pay was partly tied to revenue, and in those years, he earned $72 million from bonuses and stock sales, Gemstar says.

DOJ_NMG_0096207

Arbitrators who heard the employment dispute agreed that the Sarbanes-Oxley rule could be enforceable only by regulators. "We were surprised that we couldn't use it," says Rick Stone, a lawyer who represents Gemstar.

An SEC spokesman says the commission prefers to use other laws to recoup money, in part because the Sarbanes-Oxley provision funnels money to companies instead of shareholders. Rep. Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who's in line to become chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, has proposed legislation that would strengthen the ability of shareholders to achieve clawbacks.

Some companies have tried amending their rules to forestall the problem. Directors of International Paper Co. last year revised their long-term executive bonus plan. Now the company can recover money if its results are revised significantly, regardless of who's to blame. International Paper pays bonuses in restricted stock that can't be sold for several years, providing time to catch mistakes.

In general, says Maura Abeln Smith, the company's general counsel, "if someone wrote you a check and paid you too much, it would only be fair to return the overpayment."

The biggest push to return unearned compensation comes from shareholders. Some are suing to recover bonuses when directors are slow to act. In the past three years, activist investors have asked 13 companies to adopt provisions like that of International Paper, according to proxy adviser Institutional Shareholder Services. Only one proposal has come close to winning 50% of the shares voted. But some targeted companies are adopting similar measures on their own.

Earlier this year, advertising giant Interpublic Group of Companies Inc., adopted a policy that allows it to seek repayment of bonuses if executive misconduct leads to a restatement. Interpublic had been under pressure since last year when it restated results for 2001 through 2004, reducing net income over the period by $514 million.

Interpublic says it has no plans to pursue $1.4 million in "performance bonuses" paid to former CEO David Bell over that period. In a written statement last year, Interpublic said Mr. Bell and other top executives were not involved in the "malfeasance" that led to the restatement. The company said misconduct by lower level employees overseas was partly responsible.

FPL's clawback tale began in December 2000 when shareholders approved the company's $8 billion merger with Entergy Corp. The approval triggered payment of $92 million in cash bonuses to nearly 700 managers. Like many companies, Juno Beach, Fla.-based FPL, the parent of Florida Power & Light Co., had a "change of control" provision in its compensation plan, designed to retain top talent during a merger or acquisition.

FPL's provision was unusually liberal. It took effect even if FPL shareholders ended up owning a significant majority of the merged company. FPL also required the payments to be made when shareholders approved a deal, rather than waiting for it to be completed.

Two-thirds of the money went to FPL's top eight officers. The chairman and CEO at the time, James L. Broadhead, received the biggest chunk -- $22.6 million.

The proposed merger quickly ran into trouble. Mr. Broadhead, a former telecommunications executive, found "discrepancies" in Entergy's financial projections, FPL says. Entergy says FPL demanded some of its executives step down after the merger. (FPL won't comment on that assertion.) In April 2001, the two companies called off the deal.

Former FPL director Marshall Criser says it was only after the deal collapsed that he realized the merger bonuses had already been paid. Mr. Criser, a lawyer, says he expected the board to ask Mr. Broadhead and others to return the money. Mr. Criser's term on the board ended soon after the deal fell through and he says he didn't have an opportunity to raise the issue.

The board was in a quandary. Some directors upset about the payments felt they had no grounds to demand repayment, says Willard Dover, a lawyer and former FPL director. Mr. Dover says some directors also feared hurting relations with Mr. Broadhead and other officers, given the close ties between the executives and the board. Mr. Dover himself used to hunt with an FPL executive. At least three independent directors were friends of Mr. Broadhead, according to a report the company later prepared about the payments.

Mr. Broadhead and FPL's general counsel, who also received the bonus, asserted publicly and to directors that the payments were justified by language in the compensation plans. The board didn't challenge them, says Mr. Dover.

Mr. Broadhead says in an interview that he never considered returning the money. It would have been "really inappropriate" for the board to ask him to repay compensation guaranteed in a contract, he says.

The FPL board was already under fire from corporate-governance watchdogs for the size of Mr. Broadhead's pay. He received about $35 million from 1999 to 2001, not including the merger bonus. In May 2001, a month after the Entergy deal fell through, a shareholder asked the FPL board to sue Mr. Broadhead and seven other executives to recover $62 million of the merger bonuses. In January 2002, two other groups of shareholders sued FPL's directors and officers on the company's behalf, asking for similar repayments.

DOJ_NMG_0096208

Roy Oorbeek, a former FPL engineer, was a plaintiff in one of the shareholder suits. He says he already was angry at FPL management for collecting big salaries while cutting worker pay and benefits such as discount coupons for Thanksgiving turkeys. Seeing them collect millions for a merger that never happened upset him more, Mr. Oorbeek says.

The discontent forced FPL directors to reconsider the issue. In May 2001, they formed a committee to review the payments. Directors relied heavily on advice from the company's management. To staff the committee, Mr. Broadhead recommended Mr. Dover and two other directors, and the board agreed. The committee also hired a law firm recommended by FPL's general counsel.

After eight months of work, the committee replaced the law firm, citing an appearance of a conflict of interest. In court documents, the directors said they were unaware that the firm, Steel Hector & Davis, had earlier had the job of reviewing and approving the controversial compensation plan.

After 16 months of study, the board decided in September 2002 not to pursue repayment of the bonuses. The board's new lawyers said directors would have trouble proving that the bonuses had been paid improperly. Directors worried about complex repayment calculations. They also feared antagonizing executives, Mr. Dover says. "Pretty soon, you lose the sense of cohesion you must have between the officers and the board," he says.

Mr. Dover's committee, however, had uncovered something else: a glitch in how the bonuses were calculated. According to one interpretation of FPL's compensation plan, the company overpaid the top eight executives by about $9 million, former FPL directors say. Directors seized the opening to ask executives for some money back. "It didn't make us very popular," recalls Mr. Dover.

By mid-2002, when the error was uncovered, Mr. Broadhead had retired and his successor Lewis Hay III -- who declined to comment for this article -- wanted to maintain good relations with the board, says a person familiar with the deliberations. FPL directors and executives agreed to let an arbitrator decide the fate of the $9 million.

Meanwhile, the judge hearing the shareholder suits ruled against the company in a key preliminary ruling. In January 2004, Florida District Judge Alan Gold decided that FPL's board didn't independently evaluate the original shareholder claims. Judge Gold noted that the board's committee had been hand-picked by Mr. Broadhead, and that two of the three members had initially approved the awards as part of the compensation committee. The judge also questioned the independence of FPL's first set of lawyers.

The ruling prompted FPL's board and executives to settle the shareholder suit in late 2004. Mr. Broadhead and other executives agreed to repay $22.25 million of their $62 million. Of that, the executives paid $9.75 million according to court documents; insurers covered the rest. According to Mr. Dover, the sum owed by executives was based on the amount of the original overpayment.

Mr. Dover says the experience was painful and draining. Mr. Broadhead, 70 years old and now retired, says it was a waste of time and money. Mr. Oorbeek was unimpressed. "It was not a substantial amount of money that they recouped," he says. In the end, FPL didn't lose executives or suffer in recruiting, former directors say.

Still, the long drama prompted changes. In a series of amendments starting in 2001, FPL's board revised the change-of-control provision to take effect only after a merger is completed. It cut potential bonuses in half and made it harder to trigger such a payment.

Last December, FPL announced another merger, this time with Constellation Energy Group. FPL shareholders would have owned roughly 60% of the combined company, the new threshold for some change-of-control payments. This time, senior executives waived the payments as long as they stayed in comparable positions in the combined company. CEO Mr. Hay, who had received a payment in 2000, said he wouldn't take one at all.

Last month, FPL and Constellation abandoned their deal amid worries it wouldn't get regulator approval. No one at FPL had been paid bonuses.

CRIMINAL LAW:

NASA's Auditor Probed (ORS)

By Michael Cabbage

Orlando Sentinel, November 20, 2006

A federal probe of NASA Inspector General Robert Cobb outlines allegations that he stifled investigations, mistreated department employees and maintained a close personal relationship with top officials of the agency he was supposed to independently monitor.

DOJ_NMG_0096209

Preliminary findings from a 10-month investigation into Cobb's conduct have been forwarded to an oversight group, the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency. That group is expected to make a final decision before the end of the year on what, if any, action to take.

Cobb has denied any wrongdoing. However, he said during an interview with the Orlando Sentinel last week that it was inappropriate for him to publicly rebut many of the specific allegations until the process had run its course.

Investigators from the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the federal agency called in to conduct the inquiry, have examined 69 allegations against Cobb, a White House appointee. The allegations came primarily from career employees in his own office.

Not all substantiated

A confidential summary of the HUD probe detailing the investigative findings was obtained by the Sentinel.

Not all of the allegations against Cobb were substantiated. However, current and former employees in Cobb's office interviewed by HUD inspectors and the Sentinel described him as a partisan manager who often failed in his responsibility to independently investigate possible wrongdoing at NASA.

Cobb vehemently disagreed with that characterization.

"I look forward to the integrity committee's review of all of the evidence and the resolution of this matter," Cobb said. "It is appalling that persons entrusted with part of the process would try to subvert it by releasing information."

Cobb sent a letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller on Friday requesting an investigation to learn how the Sentinel obtained the document and "take such action as necessary to address an obvious breach of law and investigative ethics." Those receiving copies of Cobb's letter included U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and a dozen members of Congress.

Serious questions

Some of the allegations against Cobb appear to raise serious questions.

According to the probe, the number of audit reports issued by Cobb's office plummeted from 62 in 2000 to seven during the first half of the 2006 fiscal year. An audit safety team was abolished. Investigations were derailed, witnesses said, including some related to safety and national security.

Investigators found that Cobb lunched, drank, played golf and traveled with former NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe, another White House appointee. E-mails from Cobb showed he frequently consulted with top NASA officials on investigations, raising questions about his independence.

Witnesses told investigators Cobb also intimidated and berated some subordinates to the point of tears. During his tenure as NASA inspector general, the department's employee attrition rate has increased by more than 50 percent, according to figures in the report.

Cobb said in his letter to Mueller that the report was "replete with easily demonstrable factual errors and inaccuracies." He described the investigation as having "spun out of control."

Shoppers Back In Force After Shootout At Mall (WP)

By Eric Rich And Leef Smith

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

Shoppers returned to Westfield Shoppingtown Annapolis in droves yesterday, undeterred by a gun battle that wounded three in the mall's food court the night before and sent scores of others racing for exits or diving under tables.

An 18-year-old Annapolis resident who was shot twice in the abdomen remained in a hospital under police guard, authorities said, and an off-duty U.S. Secret Service agent with whom he allegedly traded fire was recovering from a single gunshot wound.

The injuries to each man -- as well as to Tahzay L. Brown, a 16-year-old male struck in the crossfire -- were not considered life-threatening.

The violence began at 7:15 Saturday evening when the agent intervened after spotting as many as eight young men assaulting another young man, according to a preliminary police account.

The 18-year-old drew a handgun and fired, hitting the agent once in the leg, police said. The agent then drew his weapon, fired seven times and struck the 18-year-old twice in the abdomen, police said. The agent was with a family member, who was not injured.

Sara Schriver, an Anne Arundel County police spokeswoman, said it was unclear whether the bullet that hit Brown was fired by the agent or the 18-year-old.

Georgia Goslee, an attorney authorized to speak on behalf of Brown's family, described the Annapolis High School student as a victim drawn into the violence merely because the person who was being assaulted is his friend. She said the confrontation between the friend and the larger group was "spillover from an earlier incident that happened at the school . . . back in September."

DOJ_NMG_0096210

Police said they are investigating whether the shooting was related to three fights at the high school Friday, during which seven students were arrested, or to fighting there in September, when nearly 20 students were arrested. Police have said those fights stemmed from "neighborhood rivalries," particularly between students from public housing complexes.

Goslee said she was unsure whether the September incident she referred to was, in fact, the fighting that led to so many arrests. Of Brown, who was treated at a hospital and released, she said: "Obviously, he's upset and shocked. He's disturbed by the entire occurrence."

In the bustling food court yesterday, shoppers and employees buzzed about the shooting. Tommy Yau said he was behind the counter at Panda Express, helping customers during a busy rush, when he spotted four or five men fighting.

Fistfights aren't uncommon in the food court, he said, but this one was close to his shop. Yau, the restaurant's manager, decided to call mall security. He had barely stepped toward the phone when shots rang out -- as many as seven within three or four seconds, he said.

"I got down," Yau recalled. "Then I heard another four or five shots."

Looking up moments later, he spotted two men on the floor, each just feet from his counter. One was sprawled near a trash can and bleeding, and the other was by a bank of pay phones near a mall exit.

Yau said the next voice he heard was that of the federal agent, who raised his badge and called out to bystanders: "I'm a police officer -- call 911!"

Yau said mall security and law enforcement officers quickly swarmed the food court, and he later provided cups that were used to mark spent shell casings scattered on the floor.

Schriver would not identify the 18-year-old. She also would not identify the agent, referring questions to the Secret Service.

Federal authorities, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the agent has been with the Secret Service for more than five years and is assigned to the Office of Protective Operations in Washington.

"It was your typical Saturday night at the mall," Schriver said. "You had families there, juveniles getting ready to go the movies. It was definitely a terrorizing event."

Despite the incident, many shoppers appeared unbowed yesterday. The food court was jammed, and many there said they'd heard about the shooting but felt secure.

"When you think of Annapolis, you think it's safe," said Baltimore resident Courtney Katunick, 23, who was eating with her sister just feet from where the shooting occurred. "It makes you feel safe that [the Secret Service officer] would step up" to break up the fight, Katunick said. "It could have escalated into something worse."

Many business managers said that although they had feared the violence might cause holiday shoppers to avoid the mall yesterday, business was as brisk as usual.

"I didn't know what to think," said Erin Gray, assistant manager at Trade Secret, which is just paces from the food court. "It doesn't look like it damaged business."

Nathanial Weiss, an employee at Fast-Fix Jewelry and Watch Repairs, agreed. "I'm surprised, but we're really busy today," he said. "And it looks like it's just going to get busier."

Bought And Sold (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

Atlanta

When Mayor Shirley Franklin recently announced that the city would be cracking down on the pimps and johns who prey on under-age prostitutes, she also disclosed publicly for the first time that she had been molested when she was a young girl.

Speaking at a gathering of reporters, local officials and civic leaders, the mayor spoke frankly about the incident, in which she was abused at the age of 10 by the father of a girlfriend. She then asked how many of the women in attendance had endured similar experiences. Several women in the room raised their hands.

One of the most tightly kept secrets in the U.S. is the extent to which children are sexually exploited, not just by child pornographers and compulsive pedophiles, but by men who are viewed by their relatives, friends and neighbors as quintessentially solid citizens.

In an interview on Friday, Ms. Franklin told me: “It seemed appropriate to reveal my story in that setting, because what we were trying to do is demonstrate that this can happen to anyone. Not only can it happen; it does happen to a lot of children.”

Atlanta has become a major hub of commercial sex in the U.S. It’s a full-fledged sex-tourism destination, with thousands of strippers, prostitutes and other sex workers accommodating an endless stream of johns from around the country. Under-age girls

(some as young as 10 and 11) are a significant part of that trade. Many of them were already carrying the scars of sexual molestation when they got into prostitution.

A study of the commercial sexual exploitation of girls in Atlanta, released a year ago by the Atlanta Women's Agenda, an advisory group formed at the mayor's request, said:

"Atlanta, being a convention and sports event center, has a thriving 'adult entertainment' industry: strip clubs, lingerie and sex shops, escort services, massage parlors. At the same time, Atlanta generates its own lost battalions of emotionally and physically abandoned children and is a magnet for such children from outlying areas. These children are vulnerable to the pimps and their recruiters, but the pimp would have no interest in the children if there were no demand."

Ms. Franklin, who is 61, is trying to jump-start a cultural change that will expand awareness of the widespread sexual exploitation of children in Atlanta and foster an attitude throughout the city that it is not to be tolerated.

It is beyond unusual for a mayor, especially the mayor of a city that depends as heavily on tourism as Atlanta, to shine a spotlight on a problem as repellent as child prostitution. I asked the mayor why she went ahead with such a high-profile campaign, which includes a "Dear John" initiative that has flooded the city with posters and public service announcements declaring that the men who "buy sex from our kids" will no longer be tolerated.

"We take the position in my administration that the best way to solve a problem is to face the facts," she said, adding: "We know the problem is here. It's happening on our watch. It's unacceptable behavior, and we are not going to stand for it. So look for us to do everything in our power to change it."

It won't be easy. Law enforcement agencies have a notoriously poor record when it comes to prosecuting and putting away the pimps, traffickers and johns in the child sex trade. And there are very few resources, financial and otherwise, to help the kids once they are identified.

The mayor acknowledged the heavy lift that will be required: "Normally, by the time girls become prostitutes, there are a lot of other experiences that they've had, and you can't turn that around with a pat on the back and a new set of clothes. There's a great deal of psychological damage. They've lost trust in adults. They've lost self-confidence. Many of them have lost the will to do anything differently. They're demoralized.

"So we're just getting started. And we'll be asking for a lot of help."

The last time I was in Atlanta, about a month ago, I rode with the police as, among other things, they looked for a 15-year-old girl who had become a prostitute and was being used by her pimp to recruit other young girls. I remember looking at a circular with a picture of the child. She had the saddest expression on her face.

Over the weekend I checked with the cops to see if they had found her. "We never did," said Lt. Keith Meadows, who heads the city's vice unit. "We have reason to believe that she might have been trafficked out of the state."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Years Later, Lessons From Newark Riots To Be Learned (USAT)

By Charisse Jones

USA Today, November 20, 2006

NEWARK — Moise Abraham heard the bullets before he saw what they had done. It was July 12, 1967, the first night of the deadly Newark riots that put a spotlight on racial unrest in the nation's decaying urban centers. His mother had walked down the block, promising she would soon be back.

"Then I heard something hit the parking sign. It said 'Bing,' " remembers Abraham, then two weeks shy of his 17th birthday. "A few seconds later, my mother is coming up the street, but I noticed she was walking with a limp, so I ran to her and I grabbed her. … When we got to the front porch, she collapsed."

The next day, Rosa Lee Abraham died from a gunshot wound her son believes was fired by a police officer, although no official determination was made.

Moise Abraham has struggled emotionally ever since. Almost as painful, Abraham says, is the lack of acknowledgment for what the riots wrought.

"It is personal, but it is a pain that we all felt," says Abraham, 56, who yearns for a citywide memorial service for the 26 who died in the riots. "Even if they had done it once every 20 years, I would have appreciated that. But it's just total silence. … It seems that for some reason, Newark has forgotten."

Now, there is an effort to remember. In the first major exhibit documenting the 1967 Newark riots, the New Jersey Historical Society is assembling a retrospective that is scheduled to open by next summer, the 40th anniversary of the unrest.

DOJ_NMG_0096212

Tentatively titled “What's Going On,” the exhibit will use oral histories, text and artifacts to examine the six days of rioting in Newark. It also will look at the violence that engulfed Detroit 11 days later and the 1965 riots in Los Angeles' Watts district.

These and other riots in scores of cities in the late 1960s — many triggered by incidents involving police — focused attention on the lack of economic opportunity in predominantly poor, black neighborhoods. A presidential commission studying the causes concluded in 1968 that the nation was moving toward “two societies, one black, one white, separate and unequal.”

“We want to move beyond Newark and show the parallels between what happened in those summers of the 1960s,” says Max Herman, an assistant professor of sociology at Rutgers University in New Jersey who has conducted many of the interviews for the project. “The frustration was building for several decades.”

The exhibit will stay in Newark for nearly a year. Organizers then plan to take it to Los Angeles and Detroit, where they will work with local museums. The University of Baltimore also is planning a 40th anniversary exhibit on the 1968 riots in that city that followed the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. Sociologists say such exhibits are critical in helping the nation understand the legacy of that turbulent time.

“The late 1960s is a period we can't revisit enough,” says Clement Price, director of the Rutgers Institute on Ethnicity, Culture and the Modern Experience. “The riots had an impact on what might be called the decline of our cities and the rise of suburbs, and in that transformation is a racial transformation. The riots impacted American politics. They pretty much ended the civil rights movement. They turned white ethnics against black ethnics.”

Newark has gradually rebounded in the last decade, replacing high-rise housing projects with town homes, opening a renowned performing arts center, and this year electing a charismatic new mayor, Cory Booker.

Yet for many outsiders, the 1967 riots indelibly defined Newark.

They were sparked by the police arrest and beating of a black cab driver, stoking the anger many African-Americans felt about segregated housing, joblessness and alleged police harassment. While the middle class and businesses had been leaving the city for decades, the abandonment quickened after the riots, making Newark a symbol of urban decline and decay.

“It crippled the city,” says Ann Marie Penn, 56, who has wrestled with depression since her 17-year-old brother was shot to death during the riots.

In Newark, as in many other riot-scarred cities, there has been a reluctance to remember.

“All American cities have had to struggle to regain their footing after that time, and people don't want to revisit that,” says Linda Caldwell Epps, president of the New Jersey Historical Society. “It's an unhappy part of our history.”

A marker resembling a headstone stands at the epicenter of the Newark riots along Springfield Avenue, naming the 26 who died. But it is easy to miss. A local group holds annual remembrances at the site, but the crowds number no more than a few dozen.

The historical society, whose exhibit will cost up to $250,000, has struggled to raise funding. Some law enforcement officers and activists from that era have been reluctant to give interviews.

“There was a lot of dissension at the time, and it was not difficult to stir up resentment against authority,” says Kenneth Melchior, 90, the Newark police inspector sent to the 4th Precinct to quell tensions the first night of the riots.

Melchior made sure the injured cab driver was sent to the hospital, but he says he does not believe it was a case of police brutality. “The man was belligerent,” he says. “If police officers arrive on a scene … and they're met with resistance, they have to overcome that resistance, and if somebody gets injured, then immediately somebody will declare police brutality.”

Nearly 80 people have shared their stories of being caught in the violence of 1967. Among them are the now-grown children whose mother was shot as she moved them out of harm's way and the police detective's daughter whose father was killed and whose mother later committed suicide.

Craig Wilson remembers that his father's dry goods store on Springfield Avenue was spared during the riots. But in the end, neither the business nor his father survived.

“He died three months later,” says Wilson, 62, who believes the difficulty his father had after the riots contributed to his fatal heart attack. “You went from having a business to you couldn't pay the rent.”

Wilson, now a dentist in neighboring Irvington, was a 23-year-old social worker. He was on his way to see a client when rocks shattered the rear window of his 1962 Plymouth Valiant. “Nobody won, everybody lost,” he says. “The people who lived in the neighborhood, the people who worked in the neighborhood. … It was sort of like dropping a bomb.”

Lawrence Hamm has a different perspective.

Since the 1980s, Hamm's group, The People's Organization for Progress, has been the only group to hold an annual observance.

“The rebellion gave rise to the political movement, gave rise to the first black mayor in Newark, the first majority black City Council,” Hamm says. “The rebellion pushed forward people's social consciousness.”

DOJ_NMG_0096213

Detroit, whose 1967 riots were the worst in modern U.S. history until the 1992 Los Angeles riots left 58 people dead, has had few retrospectives on those events, says Mike Smith, director of the Walter Reuther Library at Wayne State University in Detroit.

"Would I love to see the public become more deeply aware of the factors causing the riot and the aftermath of it? Yes, indeed I would," Smith says. "I think if we could reach some people, we'd have better race relations in this city."

In Baltimore, 60 students are interviewing residents for an exhibit to be titled " '68, Riots and Rebirth." "The time is right to do it because there is enough historical distance between the events and the current day," says Jessica Elfenbein, associate professor of history and community studies at the University of Baltimore.

For Abraham, though, the calendar sometimes seems stuck on July 12, 1967.

"I have a house, I have a brand new car," says Abraham, who has been in and out of counseling since his mother's death. "On the outside it looks good, but I've been fighting this battle for almost 40 years."

He is happy about the exhibit that will tell his mother's story.

"It's a good thing," he says. "I think it should be remembered throughout the history books, in whatever ways are possible."

National 'nurse-in' Set To Protest Treatment Of Mom (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 20, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. — A national "nurse-in" will be held Tuesday to protest the treatment of a passenger who was kicked off a plane for refusing to cover herself while breast-feeding her baby.

A similar protest, in which mothers sat on the floor near the Delta Airlines counter, breast-fed their babies and held signs, took place at the Burlington International Airport last week.

Chelsea Clark, 31, of Fairfax, said she is using Web message boards to organize a national protest at Delta counters across the country. What happened to Emily Gillette, 27, of Santa Fe, N.M., has prompted an "out-swell of outrage," Clark said.

"This is for all of the nursing mothers in the country who felt that way," Clark said. "This is our opportunity to make a statement."

Freedom Airlines, a regional airline for Delta, said it has disciplined the flight attendant who ordered Gillette off the plane when she declined to cover up with a blanket. Spokesman Paul Skellon said the attendant did not meet company expectations when Gillette was told to leave the plane.

A spokesman for the airline said the pilot apologized and asked Gillette and her family to get back on the plane, but Gillette said that never happened.

"I would have jumped at the opportunity," she said.

On Oct. 13 Gillette was sitting aboard a plane, which was three hours late in taking off, when she began to breast-feed her 22-month-old daughter. She says a flight attendant handed her a blanket and told her to cover up, which Gillette declined to do.

The attendant said Gillette was offending her and she was removed from the plane.

Delta did provide ground transportation and a hotel before rebooking the family on a flight with a different airline the following day.

Gillette filed a complaint with the Vermont Human Rights Commission because breast-feeding in a public place is protected under state law.

Kerry: 'Botched' War Joke Won't Hurt Me (AP-Y)

By Hope Yen

AP, November 20, 2006

Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry insisted on Sunday his "botched joke" about President Bush's Iraq policy would not undermine a possible White House campaign in 2008.

"Not in the least," Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, said when asked if the furor over his comment had caused him to reconsider a 2008 race. "The parlor game of who's up, who's down, today or tomorrow, if I listened to that stuff, I would never have won the nomination."

One of the GOP politicians mentioned in a crowded field for the White House, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, said he would not make a decision until September — a relatively late date in the campaign cycle — to focus in the private sector on trade policies.

"We have lots of time for personal ambition," the Georgia Republican said. "And I think an awful lot of this early energy is wasted, and we ought to be focusing on, you know, how are you going to compete with China and India, how are you going to solve the problem in Iraq?"

DOJ_NMG_0096214

Gingrich said Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, both of whom have set up presidential exploratory committees, were the likely GOP front-runners. But Gingrich said voters are yearning for a clearer conservative voice.

"I think Mitt Romney has an opportunity to fill that," Gingrich said, referring to the outgoing Massachusetts governor.

McCain said Giuliani was an "American hero" for his leadership in New York following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But McCain called himself the best presidential candidate based on a "record of being a conservative Republican, of knowledge on national security and defense issues."

McCain, who supports a ban on abortion except in cases of rape, incest and to save a mother's life, said he doubted a constitutional amendment could pass but that one would not be needed because "it's very likely or possible that the Supreme Court should — could — overturn Roe v. Wade."

The high court is deciding this term whether to uphold a 2003 federal law banning the procedure opponents call "partial-birth" abortion. It is a case that conservatives hope could be used to reverse the landmark 1973 decision that made abortion a constitutional right.

At least two conservatives, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, have called on Roe to be overturned. Legal analysts have said if the court issues an anti-abortion ruling, justices would be more likely to impose restrictions rather than abolish the right.

"I'm a federalist," McCain said. "Just as I believe that the issue of gay marriage should be decided by the states, so do I believe that we would be better off by having Roe v. Wade return to the states. And I don't believe the Supreme Court should be legislating in the way that they did on Roe v. Wade."

McCain called the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy toward gays "very effective." He said he opposed gay marriage, but as to civil unions, "people ought to be able to enter into contracts, exchange powers of attorney, other ways that people who have relationship can enter into."

Meanwhile, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 Democratic nominee for vice president, said Illinois Sen. Barack Obama should get into the race.

"I hope he runs. I think he should run," Edwards told The Associated Press. "This is such an important job that I would urge anybody who can make a serious contribution to the campaign and the dialogue — either in our party or the other party — to run.

Edwards isn't yet willing to commit to another run for president. He said whether Obama — or any other candidate — enters the race will have no bearing on his decision to make a second run for president. Edwards sought his party's nomination for the White House in 2004.

Kerry said he would decide early next year whether to run for president.

Shortly before the Nov. 7 elections that brought Democrats back into power in the House and Senate, Kerry retreated from public view following his remark to a college audience that young people might get "stuck in Iraq" if they do not study hard and do their homework.

"This is over. This was a misstatement. All of us make them in life. You wish you could have it back, but you can't," the senator said Sunday.

Kerry said Sunday he had made the decision to keep a low profile after the White House attacked the joke as insulting to U.S. troops and several Democrats called the comment a needless distraction before the pivotal congressional elections.

"Since we had very close races, I made the decision to make certain that I didn't distract. The results speak for themselves," he said.

On running in 2008, Kerry said he had not yet made a decision whether to set up an exploratory committee.

"Right now, my focus will be what happened on election day," he said, citing a need to work toward solutions on Iraq, energy independence and health care. "The American people are waiting for us to lift up an enormous challenge."

Both Kerry and Gingrich appeared on "Fox News Sunday." McCain was on "This Week" on ABC.

___

Associated Press Writer Mike Baker in Columbia, S.C., contributed to this report.

Romney Pushes Vote On Same-Sex Marriage (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BOSTON, Nov. 19 (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts said on Sunday that he would ask the state's highest court to order a question banning same-sex marriage onto the ballot if legislators did not address the issue.

Mr. Romney, a Republican, said he would file a request this week for a justice of the Supreme Judicial Court to direct the secretary of state to place the question on the ballot if lawmakers do not vote on the issue on Jan. 2, the final day of the session.

The governor, an opponent of same-sex marriage who decided not to seek re-election as he considers running for president, made his announcement to the cheers of same-sex-marriage opponents at a rally on the Statehouse steps. Supporters of same-sex marriage staged a protest across the street.

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled in November 2003 that same-sex marriages were legal. Since then, more than 8,000 same-sex couples have married in the state.

More than 170,000 people have signed a petition in support of the ballot question, which would define marriage as between a man and a woman. Mr. Romney has criticized lawmakers since they refused this month to take up the question during a joint session. They voted instead to recess until Jan. 2, all but killing the measure.

"A decision not to vote is a decision to usurp the Constitution, to abandon democracy and substitute a form of what this nation's founders called tyranny, that is, the imposition of the will of those in power, on the people," Mr. Romney said. "The issue now before us is not whether same-sex couples should marry. The issue before us today is whether 109 legislators will follow the Constitution."

Because the legislature did not adjourn but went into recess, Mr. Romney has no legal authority to call lawmakers back into session.

Supporters of same-sex marriage have defended the lawmakers' procedural move.

"One of the tenets of the Constitution is that you do not put the rights of a minority up for a popularity contest," said Mark Solomon, campaign director of Mass Equality, a group that supports same-sex marriage. "It is one of the very principles this country was founded upon."

Romney Wants Gay-Marriage Ban On Mass. Ballot (WP)

By David Weber

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

BOSTON, Nov. 19 -- Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) said Sunday that he will ask the state's highest court this week to order a ballot question on same-sex marriage if legislators fail to vote on the matter when they reconvene in January.

Romney said he will ask a justice of the state's Supreme Judicial Court to direct the secretary of state to place the question on the ballot if lawmakers do not vote directly on the question Jan. 2, the final day of the current session. Romney's term as governor expires Jan. 4.

The legislature is in recess and, because it did not adjourn, Romney has no legal authority to call legislators back into session.

Romney, an opponent of same-sex marriage, made his announcement to the cheers of hundreds of same-sex-marriage opponents at a rally on the Statehouse steps. A counter-protest was held across the street.

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled in November 2003 that same-sex marriages are legal. Since then, more than 8,000 gay couples have tied the knot in the state.

More than 170,000 people had signed a petition in support of the ballot question, which would define marriage as between a man and a woman.

Romney has criticized lawmakers since they refused earlier this month to take up the question during a joint session, voting instead to recess, all but killing the measure.

"A decision not to vote is a decision to usurp the Constitution, to abandon democracy and substitute a form of what this nation's founders called tyranny, that is, the imposition of the will of those in power, on the people," Romney said earlier. "The issue now before us is not whether same-sex couples should marry. The issue before us today is whether 109 legislators will follow the Constitution."

Supporters of same-sex marriage defended lawmakers' procedural move.

"One of the tenets of the Constitution is that you do not put the rights of a minority up for a popularity contest," said Marc Solomon, campaign director for Mass Equality, which supports same-sex marriage. "It is one of the very principles this country was founded upon."

Messages seeking comment from legislative leaders were not immediately returned Sunday.

The legislature grappled with various efforts to ban same-sex marriages before the high court ruling in 2003. Lawmakers refused to vote on a citizens' initiative in 2002, and two years later they voted down their own proposed amendment that would have banned same-sex marriage and legalized civil unions.

Renewed War Over "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096216

With the Democrats in control of Congress, some activists are hoping they'll add a controversial issue to their to-do list: revisiting the "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays in the military. Gay servicemembers have sought a policy change for years. Now, says Steve Ralls, spokesman for the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, gay vets hope they might make some progress at a time when the military can't afford to turn away the willing and able. Last year the Pentagon discharged 742 service members for homosexuality, according to SLDN.

But making a change won't be easy: gay-rights advocates have seen a troubling signal from the Pentagon. Massachusetts Rep. Martin Meehan and the American Psychiatric Association complained last June when they learned the military's disability policy classified homosexuality as a mental disorder—something the APA stopped doing in 1973. Then the Pentagon quietly reclassified it in July. Last week Meehan and the APA complained once more: homosexuality has now been grouped with other "conditions, circumstances and defects" like bed-wetting, repeated venereal-disease infections and obesity. The reclassification is "even worse," says Aaron Belkin, who studies gays in the military at the University of California, Santa Barbara. "Now [homosexuality] is explicitly deemed to be a defect." Pentagon spokeswoman Cynthia Smith says the Defense Department does "not think homosexuality is a mental illness" and says the classification could be re-examined.

The gay question has long been a political quagmire. Since Bill Clinton waded into the controversy in 1993, more than two dozen former senior military officers have denounced "don't ask," including Gen. Wesley Clark and Gen. Claudia Kennedy. "We have a much friendlier environment now," says Ralls, citing a more accepting attitude by the "Will & Grace" generation. Gay British soldiers serve alongside Americans in Iraq and Afghanistan, sharing quarters. In Congress, Meehan has already introduced the Military Readiness Enhancement Act to replace "don't ask" with a nondiscrimination policy. He has 122 bipartisan cosponsors and hopes for hearings on the topic. Though GOP Rep. Duncan Hunter—a backer of "don't ask"—is on his way out as House Armed Services chair, his Democratic replacement, Rep. Ike Skelton, supports the current policy, too. And as the Pentagon's recent reclassification showed, there is still a long war ahead.

ANTITRUST:

Freeport Buys Phelps For $26bn (FT)

By James Politi In New York

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

Freeport-McMoRan on Sunday night agreed to buy Phelps Dodge for $25.9bn (£13.7bn) in cash and stock to become the world's largest publicly traded copper company with mines stretching from Indonesia to Chile.

The takeover is the latest in a wave of consolidation that has swept through the global mining industry as commodity prices soared because of high demand, particularly from China.

Amid the boom, both Freeport and Phelps were faced with key strategic challenges that they decided to address by combining the two companies. Freeport has been seeking ways to diversify away from its main Grasberg mine, which is based in a remote part of Indonesian Papua and has been criticised for containing too much political risk.

Phelps, on the other hand, has been a takeover target since its twin bid for Canadian mining groups Inco and Falconbridge fell apart in September.

Under the terms of the deal, Phelps shareholders will receive $126.46 per share – or a 33 per cent premium to the company's market value on Friday. About 70 per cent of the transaction value, or $18bn, will be in cash, with the rest in shares, meaning Phelps investors will end up owning 38 per cent of the combined group.

In an interview last night, Richard Adkerson, the chief executive of Freeport who will run the combined group, said the deal made sense in a wide range of scenarios for the copper price.

He added that the greater size would make his company much stronger: "Scale is important because it will allow us to have better access to resources, suppliers and project opportunities in a way that is limited for smaller companies."

Although the deal is structured as a takeover by Freeport, the company's headquarters will move from New Orleans to Phelps' home of Phoenix, Arizona. Steve Whisler, chief executive of Phelps, will retire.

The new Freeport will become one of the most powerful forces in global mining, generating cashflow of about $6.5bn from the production of about 3.1bn pounds of copper, 1.7m ounces of gold, and 69m pounds of molybdenum. As well as Freeport's Grasberg mine, the combined group will own Phelps operations in North and South America and control the Tenke Fungurume copper-cobalt project in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The deal is the latest in a wave of transactions in the global mining industry. In recent months, Brazil's Companhia Vale do Rio Doce agreed to take over Inco, while Falconbridge was acquired by Xstrata.

DOJ_NMG_0096217

Freeport was advised by bankers at JPMorgan and Merrill Lynch and lawyers at Davis Polk and Jones Walker. Phelps was advised by Citigroup, Morgan Stanley and Debevoise.

Freeport Sets Big Bet On Metals With Phelps Deal (WSJ)

By Mark Heinzl And Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc.'s $25.9 billion cash-and-stock agreement to acquire rival copper producer Phelps Dodge Corp. marks a major long-term bet that metals prices will remain strong.

Freeport said it pursued the deal to gain the scale it needs to compete among other miners for equipment and prospects amid increased Chinese demand for commodities and high prices. But the deal comes after copper has fallen from loftier levels, leading to some industry concerns of a potential cyclical downturn.

The combination -- resulting in what would be North America's largest copper producer -- continues the recent streak of big-ticket mining deals, as the industry scrambles to secure new production and mine developments.

Freeport, of New Orleans, will offer $88 in cash and 0.67 share for each Phelps Dodge share. The offer is valued at $126.46 per share at Friday's closing prices, marking a sizable premium over Phelps Dodge's share price of $95.02 reached at 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Freeport will finance the deal's cash portion, about $18 billion, with debt. Though Phelps Dodge is roughly twice the size of Freeport in terms of market value and sales, its shareholders will control 38% of the combined company.

Since reaching an all-time high in May, copper prices have dropped more than 20%, trading at about $3.08 a pound Friday on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Copper-market players have pointed to such factors as increasing Chinese production and slackening demand, and a slower U.S. economy and housing market. Concerns that copper supplies could fall short of demand have been offset by a growing sense that supplies appear sufficient. Costs, meanwhile, have climbed sharply in recent years amid high energy prices and tight equipment and labor markets.

Still, the current price remains high by historical standards and provides strong earnings and cash flows to many mining companies. Most copper mines in operation today were built with much lower prices in mind.

The Phelps Dodge acquisition will be immediately accretive to Freeport's earnings, the company said, and it will seek to pay down the incurred debt as quickly as possible from the cash flows of the combined company.

In an interview, Freeport President and Chief Executive Officer Richard Adkerson and Phelps Dodge Chairman and Chief Executive Steven Whisler said they have for years discussed the advantages of combining the companies.

Mr. Adkerson -- who would remain chief executive -- said the acquisition allows Freeport to branch out. It operates the highly profitable Grasberg copper and gold mine in Indonesia. Phelps Dodge, based in Phoenix, has geographically diverse mining operations in North America and South America and development projects such as a copper mine in Congo that stand to boost the combined companies' metal production by about 25% over the next three years.

The combination will help Freeport with the industry's labor and equipment problems, Mr. Adkerson said. "The larger and bigger players are in better position to have access to those resources," he said. "We will now be a global company in scale."

He argued copper prices are likely to remain strong because of economic development in China and other fast-growing countries and the lack of large new mines. Grades of existing mines, meanwhile, are dropping while some big mines are being quickly depleted, he said. Copper is used in industrial and construction applications from pipes to electronics and telecommunications.

Mining companies on the hunt for new deposits are being forced to do business in less politically stable nations. Indonesia has never received an investment grade from lenders. Freeport believes it can bring its Indonesia experience to bear in Congo, where Phelps Dodge has struggled to start its long-delayed Tenke Fungurume copper mine. "It looks to be a world-class development opportunity," Mr. Adkerson said. Freeport's role in Indonesia has been criticized by political activists and environmental groups; the company has defended its conduct.

Speculation that Phelps Dodge would become a takeover target has swirled since the company lost out on a bid to acquire Inco Ltd. in a protracted global battle for control of the big Canadian nickel and copper producer. Phelps Dodge's shares reached their 52-week high of $103.90 earlier this month. Mr. Whisler declined to comment on whether other companies sought to acquire Phelps Dodge. Some major shareholders have pushed for a sale or other measures to boost its stock.

For the first nine months of this year, Phelps Dodge reported net income of $1.69 billion on sales of $8.68 billion, while Freeport reported net income of $1.01 billion on sales of $4.15 billion.

James R. Moffett, chairman of Freeport, will be chairman. Mr. Whisler will retire when the deal is completed.

DOJ_NMG_0096218

Freeport is being advised by J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. and Merrill Lynch & Co., with legal advice from Davis Polk & Wardwell and Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrere & Denegre LLP. Phelps Dodge is being advised by Citigroup Inc. and Morgan Stanley & Co., with legal counsel from Debevoise & Plimpton LLP.

Smaller Rival In Agreement To Acquire Copper Giant (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Ian Austen

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

Phelps Dodge, the world's second-largest copper producer, will be acquired by Freeport-McMoRan Copper and Gold, a smaller rival that has been embroiled in environmental and human rights controversies, in a cash and stock deal worth $25.9 billion, the companies said yesterday.

The transaction, if approved by shareholders, would create the world's largest copper producer and the largest mining company based in North America. It is the latest move in a series of mining and metals mergers. Like companies involved in other mining mergers, Freeport-McMoRan promoted the idea that increased size has become an important competitive factor.

"We have been watching the industry consolidation, fewer companies, larger companies, but we had not been playing a role in it," Freeport-McMoRan's president and chief executive, Richard C. Adkerson, said. "Now Freeport is a larger company that has a larger platform."

The chairman and chief executive of Phelps Dodge, J. Steven Whisler, said yesterday that the two companies have talked about a possible merger for about a decade. The premium of about 33 percent being offered by Freeport-McMoRan, Mr. Whisler said, was a decisive factor in Phelps Dodge's decision to end its 172-year history as an independent company.

The boards of both companies have approved the transaction. Under its terms, stockholders in Phelps Dodge will receive $88 a share in cash plus 0.67 of a Freeport-McMoRan share. Based on Friday's closing, the deal is offering Phelps Dodge shareholders a 33 percent premium.

Freeport-McMoRan, which has a market capitalization of $11.3 billion compared with Phelps Dodge's value of $19.4 billion, will finance the transactions by borrowing about $17.5 billion. Freeport said it expected the deal would be accretive to the combined company's earnings per share and cash flow immediately.

To a considerable extent, Phelps-Dodge now finds itself being acquired because of its failure earlier this year to bulk up with an acquisition of Inco, the large Toronto-based nickel miner.

Inco had approached Phelps Dodge in an attempt to help it with its bid for another Canadian nickel miner, Falconbridge. In exchange for financing for that transaction, Inco's board agreed to be acquired by Phelps Dodge in a deal cash and stock worth about $17 billion.

Ultimately, however, the three-way transaction fell apart. Phelps Dodge walked away from its Inco offer after Xstrata of Switzerland emerged as the winning bidder for Falconbridge. Companhia Vale do Rio Doce of Brazil acquired Inco after offering about $17 billion in cash.

Not only did the Phelps Dodge bid fail to impress Inco's shareholders, it was also criticized by some of the Phoenix-based company's own shareholders largely because it would have increased the company's debt levels from almost nothing to about $24 billion. Some critics said at the time that they would prefer Phelps Dodge to sell itself rather than become larger through acquisitions, a request that has now apparently been granted.

Mr. Whisler will retire when the Freeport-McMoRan takeover is completed. The resulting company, which will retain Freeport-McMoRan name but move its head office from New Orleans to Phoenix, will be led by Mr. Adkerson and retain James R. Moffett, of Freeport-McMoRan, as chairman.

While Phelps Dodge has large mines in United States, Central and South America as well as Africa, Freeport-McMoRan's only significant asset is a mine in Indonesia.

Earlier this year, riots in the Indonesian province of Papua were directed at Freeport-McMoRan. In December 2005, The New York Times reported that Freeport had given more financial support to the Indonesian Army and police in Papua than the company had publicly reported, in some cases individual commanders received tens of thousands of dollars from the company.

Mr. Adkerson said the company was still responding to requests from regulators about the timing and level of disclosure to shareholders about those payments.

The Indonesian mine's operations have also come under criticism for their environmental practices. Mr. Adkerson said that Freeport-McMoRan now had its environmental measures assessed and tracked by independent auditors.

"We operate in an unusual place," he said. "Our mine is in a remarkable physical setting."

Freeport-McMoRan was advised in the deal by J. P. Morgan Securities and Merrill Lynch while legal advisers were Davis Polk & Wardwell and Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre. Citigroup Corporate and Investment Banking and Morgan Stanley & Company worked with Phelps Dodge, and its legal counsel was Debevoise & Plimpton.

DOJ_NMG_0096219

Copper Firms To Merge In $26 Billion Takeover (BLOOM)

By Vivek Shankar And Tan Hwee Ann

Bloomberg News, November 20, 2006

Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc. has agreed to buy Phelps Dodge Corp. for $25.9 billion in cash and stock to form the world's largest publicly traded copper company.

Phelps Dodge stockholders will get $126.46 a share, or $88 in cash and 0.67 Freeport share, New Orleans-based Freeport-McMoRan said in a statement yesterday.

That is 33 percent more than Phoenix-based Phelps Dodge's closing price Friday.

Global mining takeovers, fueled by record profits and prices of metals such as copper and zinc, more than doubled this year, to $113.7 billion, according to data compiled by Bloomberg News.

The Freeport transaction will be the largest mining-industry takeover deal this year.

"With metal prices fueling strong cash flows, and the expectation by companies that prices will stay stronger for longer, more miners would want to shore up their backdoor or acquire to add value," said Tim Barker at BT Financial Group, which manages $54 billion of assets, including mining stocks. "It looks like a pretty strong price for the shareholders of Phelps Dodge."

Freeport has secured financing from J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and Merrill Lynch & Co., and the cash portion of the bid is about 70 percent of the total bid, it said.

This year, Freeport has paid $500 million of debt early, spent $313 million on dividend payments and bought back $80 million in shares.

Freeport shareholders will "benefit from . . . lower cost of capital, and improved geographic and asset diversification," Freeport President and Chief Executive Officer Richard C. Adkerson said in the statement.

Blackstone In Talks To Buy Equity In $36bn Deal (FT)

By James Politi In New York

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

Blackstone was on Sunday night in advanced discussions to seal the biggest private equity deal on record as the board of Equity Office Properties, the US commercial real estate company founded by Sam Zell, met to vote on a takeover worth $36bn including debt.

Although the outcome of the meeting remained unclear, the talks will highlight the growing audacity of cash-rich, buy-out firms, which are taking over some of the biggest US companies in a range of industries.

Last week Thomas H. Lee Partners, Bain Capital and a group of banks agreed to buy Clear Channel Communications, the biggest chain of US radio stations. Harrah's Entertainment, the US casino giant, has for weeks been in talks to be taken over by Apollo Management and Texas Pacific, although it remained unclear on Sunday night if that would result in an agreement.

In July, HCA, the biggest US hospital chain, agreed to be taken private by a consortium including Bain Capital, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, and Merrill Lynch for about $33bn. That agreement broke the record for the biggest private equity deal, sealed in 1989 when KKR bought RJR Nabisco, the food and tobacco conglomerate.

But the huge amounts of money flooding into private equity and the availability of cheap debt to finance acquisitions have led to expectations that the HCA deal size would soon be trumped.

According to people familiar with the matter, Blackstone, led by Steve Schwarzman, has offered to pay about $20bn in cash for Equity Office, which is based in Chicago and is the biggest publicly traded owner of office buildings in the US.

Blackstone would be taking on $16bn of the company's debt if a deal were signed. Blackstone and Equity Office declined to comment.

An acquisition of Equity Office by Blackstone would represent the private equity group's latest big bet on the health of the commercial property markets in the US, where prices have risen significantly in recent years, leading to fears of a bubble.

Blackstone already began targeting the commercial property this year when it agreed to take over CarrAmerica for $5.6bn and Trizec Properties for $8.9bn. Blackstone is also a big investor in hotels.

Shares in Equity Office, established three decades ago by Sam Zell, the current chairman and Chicago real estate magnate, were trading at $44.72 on Friday. The current stock price gives Equity Office a market capitalisation of $15.72bn and implies that Blackstone's offer is at a 27 per cent premium to its current market value.

Blackstone Is Set To Announce Takeover Plan For Equity Office (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096220

Joining an unprecedented rush to remove corporations from the public markets, the real estate arm of private-equity firm The Blackstone Group is set to announce a $20 billion takeover plan for Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. office-building owner and manager, people familiar with the matter said.

If completed, the deal would become the largest such "take private" deal in history -- and the largest real-estate deal in history -- when factoring in Equity Office's existing $16 billion in debt. It's a record that has already been broken this year, and could be broken again by year-end, as private-equity firms train hundreds of billions of dollars of capital on once untouchable names of the stock-market firmament.

If the deal is ratified later tonight, Blackstone is expected to pay about $48.50 for each share of Equity Office, say the people familiar with the matter, representing about a 10% premium to Chicago-based Equity Office's stock price on Friday, of $44.72. Equity Office's management, including its founder and public face, Sam Zell, are not expected to be a part of the buyout group, the people added.

Blackstone Acquiring Trust In Richest Buyout (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Terry Pristin

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

The Blackstone Group, a private investment firm, said yesterday that it had agreed to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office-building owner and manager, for about $36 billion.

The deal marks the largest leveraged buyout in history, eclipsing the $33 billion paid earlier this year for H.C.A., the hospital chain, and it illustrates how private equity firms continue to gobble up corporate America. Under the transaction, Equity Office will go from being a publicly held company to a private one. Blackstone will pay $20 billion and assume $16 billion in debt.

Equity Office, with some 590 buildings and over 105 million square feet of office space in major metropolitan markets, was created in 1976 by Sam Zell, a real estate tycoon who built the business through dozens of acquisitions that were worth, in aggregate, more than $17 billion. Last year, Equity Office acquired the Verizon Building on Sixth Avenue in Manhattan for $515 million.

Matthew L. Ostrower, an analyst at Morgan Stanley, called the proposed deal "a ground-breaking transaction for the real estate world in general and an earthquake for the REIT industry."

Mr. Ostrower said that if a company the size of Equity Office chose not to remain public, "now every public company out there is going to have to some degree examine their capitalization, whether being public makes sense."

The deal will make Blackstone, which was founded in 1985 by Peter G. Peterson and Stephen A. Schwarzman, one of the nation's largest owners of real estate.

"We believe that the skills and strengths of Equity Office will greatly enhance our existing office platform," Jonathan D. Gray, senior managing director of Blackstone, said in a statement.

For Mr. Zell, one of richest men in America and the owner of more real estate than Donald J. Trump, the sale is an opportunity to cash out of part of the empire he built while working from his office in the old Daily News Building in Chicago. But the sale by Mr. Zell, who made his first millions in the 1970's buying distressed real estate, may also signal that he believes the market may have peaked.

Just last month, Ross L. Smotrich, an analysts at Bear Stearns, wrote in a note to investors: "REIT's have outperformed the broader market in each of the past seven years, putting valuations at the high end of historical ranges."

But in an upbeat report issued last week, Green Street Advisors, a research company, said that office rents, which have increased 8 percent over the past year, are likely to continue to rise next year. REIT's usually own and operate income-producing real estate.

Private equity firms are vying to hold the crown of having led the biggest buyout in history, and, with this deal, Blackstone will be able to do so at least for now. Blackstone will move ahead of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, which led the H.C.A. sale. Kohlberg Kravis also held the prior record with its 1989 takeover of RJR Nabisco, a deal that came to define an era when it was chronicled in the book "Barbarians at the Gate."

The transaction comes amid a private equity frenzy for the next big leveraged buyout. Last week, Clear Channel was acquired for about $26 billion by a team of private equity firms. Other deals, like the $22 billion purchase of the gas pipeline company Kinder Morgan or the sale of Freescale Semiconductor for $17.6 billion, have redefined the size and scope of leveraged buyouts. Harrah's, the big casino company, is currently in negotiations to be taken over by another group of private equity firms.

For many years, it was Equity Office that bought up other companies, but the company's performance in recent years has cast doubt on Mr. Zell's longtime credo that "bigger is better." In 2000, as the dot-com industry was about slide, Equity Office acquired a large portfolio of buildings in the Silicon Valley and was later forced to sell them at a loss.

DOJ_NMG_0096221

In recent years, Equity Office has reduced its holdings in weaker markets like Dallas, Houston and New Orleans and has tried to establish a bigger presence in stronger markets like New York and Washington. In 2005, the company sold $2.7 billion in assets.

Blackstone, meanwhile, has been the biggest acquirer of large buildings over the last five years. It has bought interests in $32 billion worth of property, 50 percent more than next largest buyer, said Robert M. White Jr., president of Real Capital Analytics, a New York research company.

This year alone, Blackstone has bought $20 billion worth of real estate, or 7 percent of all acquisitions. It has been involved in more REIT buyouts and mergers than any other company.

Blackstone began buying office REIT's only this year, first by paying $5.6 billion for CarrAmerica Realty Corporation, which had interests in 285 buildings, mainly in California and Washington, D.C. In a deal that closed last month, Blackstone teamed with Brookfield Properties, a REIT, to buy Trizec Properties, the owner of 61 office buildings, including the W.R. Grace Building in Manhattan.

Under the latest deal, Blackstone would pay $48.50 a share for Equity Office, representing an 8.5 percent premium to its closing price on Friday of $44.72.

Real Estate Giant To Go Private In $36 Billion Deal (BLOOM)

By Dana Cimilluca And Brian Louis

Bloomberg News, November 20, 2006

Blackstone Group L.P., manager of the world's largest buyout fund, has agreed to purchase Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. office landlord, for about $36 billion in stock and debt, Equity Office said late last night.

The leveraged buyout of Equity Office would be the largest ever in the real estate industry. It comes amid a dealmaking bonanza for private equity firms, flush with cash from record fundraising, and office REITs, which are benefiting from surging demand in major markets such as New York.

Equity Office shareholders would receive $48.50 a share, an 8.5 percent premium to Friday's closing price of $44.72, the companies said in a statement. The Equity Office board unanimously approved the offer for the Chicago-based real estate investment trust last night. Including the assumption of Equity Office debt, the total value of the transaction is $36 billion, making it the biggest leveraged buyout in history. The deal still has to be approved by Equity Office shareholders.

"I think it's a deal that's pretty attractive to shareholders," said Srikanth Nagarajan, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets in New York. "Office properties are increasing in value in the eyes of private equity investors."

Blackstone had previously acquired 10 publicly traded real estate companies in the past two years, including CarrAmerica Realty Corp.

Buyout firms have raised a record $170 billion this year through mid-October, up from $134 billion in 2005, according to London-based consultant Private Equity Intelligence Ltd.

The buyout talks were reported earlier by the Wall Street Journal. Terry Holt, a spokeswoman for Equity Office, declined to comment late last night. John Ford, a spokesman for New York-based Blackstone, also declined to comment.

Blackstone in July raised a $15.6 billion fund, to which it is adding. In June, it raised $5.25 billion for the largest-ever fund for high-return real estate investments, the majority of which has been spent already.

The company and other private equity firms, which finance the bulk of their takeovers using the target company's cash flow, have announced $600 billion of acquisitions so far this year, compared with $241 billion in 2005, according to data compiled by Bloomberg News.

Equity Office and Blackstone said in the statement that they expect the deal to close in the first quarter of 2007.

The biggest acquisition of a real estate investment trust to date is General Growth Properties Inc.'s purchase of Rouse Co. for $11.3 billion in 2004.

Equity Office shares have gained 47 percent this year. Over the past three years, the shares have increased 60 percent.

But Equity Office's share price hasn't appreciated as much as those of other REITs since it went public in July 1997 at $21 a share. Shares of New York-based SL Green Realty Corp., for example, closed Friday at $126.30 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Boston Properties Inc. went public at $25 a share in June 1997 and it closed Friday at $108.62 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Bloomberg News staff writers Daniel Taub and Hui-yong Yu contributed to this report.

Managing Lessons Learned? How US Airways Would Navigate Merger (WSJ)

By Melanie Trottman

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096222

It's hard enough post-Sept. 11 to manage one airline. Now, US Airways Group Inc. Chief Executive Doug Parker wants to run three.

With his $8.67 billion hostile bid last week for Delta Air Lines, the CEO is proposing to add yet another company to the two he's already combining as a result of his America West Airlines acquiring US Airways late last year. He envisions that the new airline would fly under the Delta name.

The 45-year-old, known for his financial expertise, is rolling the dice again in what would become the greatest management challenge of his career if a deal goes through. By merging with the much-larger Atlanta carrier Delta as it emerges from bankruptcy court, US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., would become the largest U.S. airline in terms of passenger traffic, a huge leap from its No. 6 ranking right now.

It would add an exponential level of complexity to an already daunting task. Though the earlier merger is considered a financial success so far, some of its customer-service rankings have been among industry lows in recent months as the airline has had rising problems with baggage handling and overall service complaints. Management is still blending the cultures of the two airlines, which were in many ways steeped in vastly different processes and procedures.

Union groups have yet to be combined, and pilots are griping about how throwing a third airline into the mix would further complicate the task of reassigning seniority ratings. US Airways has yet to meld the reservation systems of its predecessor airlines, a huge and sensitive task set to occur early next year. The company had major glitches when it combined frequent-flier programs and launched a blended Web site in May, efforts that angered many customers who couldn't complete bookings or get access to frequent-flier-mileage information.

Mr. Parker, though, is talking up the savings. A US Airways-Delta merger would cut overlapping flights and reorganize ground facilities, among other things, to bring about some $1.65 billion in annual cost savings, he said.

Increased size would be an advantage, not a burden for the airline, Mr. Parker said: "Size helps. The ability to take more people to more places is a critical factor in running an airline, so it certainly matters." The airline would also have more purchasing power when it comes to buying things such as new seats for aircraft or cups and napkins for in-flight service.

Still, adding Delta would bring more than 400 additional planes to schedule and maintain, 51,000 more employees, more complex technology to integrate or overhaul, and throngs of new customers (in terms of "passenger enplanements" -- a person getting onto an airplane -- Delta has about 119 million a year, nearly four times that of US Airways). "Because of the immense complexity of all the moving parts, the amount of planning is the single most important factor involved" in pulling off any merger, said Peter Walsh, director of New York-based Mercer Management Consulting's aerospace group.

Mr. Parker and his team say they are ahead of the game in planning if the Delta acquisition goes through. In the first merger they had to create an integration plan from scratch. But when they began contemplating a Delta combination months ago, they started going through each operating area to assess what would be different with Delta and what didn't work in the first merger.

"We've learned a lot of lessons. We'll do it better the second time around," said US Airways President Scott Kirby, who, like Mr. Parker, was an executive at America West before the merger.

One of the lessons, Mr. Parker said, comes from the airline's Philadelphia hub, acquired from the old US Airways. Baggage-handling problems and staffing shortages persisted even after Mr. Parker bought millions of dollars in ground equipment and increased staffing. He recently bought more equipment and boosted staffing again.

"It was a bigger problem than we thought," Mr. Parker said. "We've made huge progress over the last few months by focusing more on baggage, getting more people hired, putting more ground equipment in place. We apparently didn't go quite far enough. That is our No. 1 focus at US Airways, getting that done."

Management also learned it needed to listen more to employees. After the problem-ridden launch of the new US Airways Web site, Mr. Kirby started a weekly conference call with employees from reservations, airports, and other areas to discuss customer feedback. Once a month, a dozen vice presidents meet with line workers at various locations to do the same.

In a Delta merger, management would move more slowly on some of the technology integrations, Mr. Kirby said. The company was blindsided by higher customer call volumes after it moved more than 10 million frequent-flier records from one airline's technology platform to another. In a Delta merger they'd do more testing in advance and bring in customers to give feedback on the Web site and help identify glitches.

Executives concede that Atlanta's airport -- where Delta operates a huge hub -- would be a bear to manage. US Airways executives say that to more efficiently manage the sprawling, busy facility, they'll likely fly larger planes from that airport, while moving smaller planes to their nearby hub in Charlotte.

One key challenge for Mr. Parker would be putting together an expanded team of managers that would include those from an airline that is still loudly opposing his bid. "What we learned in the US Airways-America West merger is that it's extremely important to have people from both management teams working together," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0096223

When Mr. Parker was first integrating the new US Airways, he and his team came up with a list of goals he planned to share with employees. Someone from the America West side of his team suggested creating a slogan for the campaign. But managers from the old US Airways advised Mr. Parker that workers would think that was disingenuous, given that the company had made two trips through bankruptcy court and a string of promises from former managers hadn't panned out. "There are histories in each company, and as I went out and talked to employees on the US Airways side, I had to spend a lot of time trying to understand what have they gone through, what have they heard, how am I going to sound saying that?" Mr. Parker said.

All this is likely dwarfed by the union issues posed by combining three airlines. US Airways is conducting talks with pilots groups from both its predecessor airlines, and those talks are unlikely to be completed before a merger with Delta could be consummated some time next year. That means the airline could end up conducting three-way union talks.

Mr. Parker said he plans to raise union pay scales for the combined labor groups to the highest scale paid by any of the three original airlines. Current US Airways pilots say it's not so simple, given all the seniority issues and their uncertainty whether the highest pay scales would be enough. They also want the company to complete negotiations with them before taking on another merger.

Mr. Parker said he was forced to make a move while Delta was still in bankruptcy proceedings and big cost savings could still be negotiated through the courts. "If we could, we would have liked for this opportunity to come along a little later, so we could fully integrate our merger now," he said.

Final Bids For Putnam Are Due Before Thanksgiving Holiday (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

The auction of Boston money manager Putnam Investments will move into its latter stages this week with final offers due from three bidders before the Thanksgiving holiday, according to people familiar with the matter.

Prior to the Thursday holiday, bids are expected from three suitors: Amvescap PLC of the United Kingdom, Unicredito Italiano SpA of Italy and Power Corp. of Canada, according to one of these people.

It could be weeks before any decision is made by Putnam's parent, Marsh & McLennan Cos., of New York. Marsh President and Chief Executive Michael Cherkasky has called the auction "a market check," and the company may decide to hang onto Putnam, which manages $187 billion of assets, if it can't get a price its board considers fair.

A Marsh spokesman declined to comment. Calls to Amvescap, Unicredito and Power Corp. weren't returned.

A final sale price could be affected by the inclusion of "earn out" clauses. These agreements might allow for a lower payment up front but also additional payments if Putnam meets specific financial goals.

The Putnam auction is seen as an important step in Marsh's recovery from a tangle with New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. Mr. Cherkasky took the company's reins in October 2004 when an industry-wide bid-rigging inquiry put the firm and its Marsh Inc. insurance brokerage in crisis. Marsh Inc. and other large insurance brokers reached civil settlements with state authorities.

But many, including Marsh, also gave up controversial and lucrative commissions they previously accepted from insurers. Replacing that revenue has been difficult. Marsh earned $404 million last year. That was up from 2004 but down from the more than $1.5 billion in 2003 when it still accepted so-called contingent commissions from insurance companies.

The company has reported $764 million in net income through the first nine months of this year, as Mr. Cherkasky has embarked on a cost-cutting campaign. He has told shareholders he aims to build the company into a premier risk consultant to corporate clients world-wide. Its Marsh insurance-brokerage unit as well as its Mercer and Kroll consulting units generally fit under that umbrella.

But Putnam could be seen as something of an outlier. The money manager is seen as an awkward fit at times. Having a money manager and Marsh's Mercer Investment Consulting under one roof, for instance, creates a potential conflict of interest.

Putnam historically has buttressed Marsh profits when the insurance brokerage and consulting units struggled, but the company has grappled with its own problems in recent years. Poor performance in the 2000-2002 bear market and inclusion in a share-trading scandal in 2003 hacked away at the company's assets and reputation. The company's current assets under management are less than half what they were at their peak in 2000.

That said, things have begun to look up for Putnam and Marsh lately. Putnam funds' performance and reputation have started to improve during the watch of President and Chief Executive Charles Haldeman, who took over amid the share-trading scandal in 2003. While Mr. Haldeman offered to step down if a buyer wanted to install its own managers, he appears to have the backing of the board of Putnam's mutual funds, according to a person familiar with the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0096224

For its part, Marsh more than doubled its net income during the third quarter from the year-earlier period despite modest revenue growth. The company's shares, still below their level prior to the bid-rigging probe, are up more than 26% during the past three months.

Marsh's shares closed at $32.09 each on the New York Stock Exchange Friday, down 12 cents, for a $17.75 billion market value.

Bearish On Chicago (WSJ)

By Meyer S. Frucher

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

The announcement of the proposed merger between the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade has sparked applause from the shareholders who will benefit. But for the marketplace, the growing derivatives trading community, and the American consumer, the merger of two already powerful monopolies into a single pre-eminent force in the risk markets may be the perfect illustration of why monopolies are a bad thing. For regulators, therefore, the proposed merger represents an urgent challenge and an opportunity to ensure the competitiveness of these essential markets.

Historically, both the CME and the CBOT have operated as effective monopolies as futures contracts were typically traded exclusively at a particular marketplace. Yet to the idea that there is a downside to two discrete but not overlapping monopolies merging into one, many in the financial markets have responded: So what? After all, contracts traded at both exchanges are cleared by a single entity today. So long as the products are distinct from one another and the transaction does not result in incremental concentration of the marketplace for futures clearing, then there is no incremental concentration of market share either.

The argument does not stand up. First, the commercial markets suggest that you look for evidence of monopoly powers in concentrated pricing that harms consumers, builds economic inefficiencies into the system, and stifles innovation. Yet the recent history of the futures markets has shown that the winds of change were brought by a failed competitor in the case of CBOT and by the scrutiny of public equity investors in the case of CME. In fact, CBOT's case demonstrated the impact of competition on pricing and the "stickiness" of incumbency. The merged entity will concentrate pricing and will thus wield monopoly powers.

Second, given the supposedly limited overlap between products in the merger, this monopoly will reside in the financial futures that comprise the interest rate risk products -- i.e., Eurodollar futures that trade on the CME and the Treasury futures that trade at the CBOT. If this merger is approved, 80% of exchange-traded interest rate derivatives will be concentrated in one marketplace. Some counter this by contending that Eurodollar and Treasury futures contracts do not compete with one another because they are used to manage risks at different ends of the yield curve. But this is not true; both provide products along the entire curve. Thus, they are competitive, and their concentration into one marketplace would clearly be anticompetitive.

Third, the fact that clearing is already concentrated into one entity is already anticompetitive. Clearing should be a commoditized, processing-oriented service essential to the credit intermediation role of exchanges and thereby to the proper functioning of exchanges. Given that both exchanges have raised prices for clearing services since the Common Clearing Link was established, their concentrated clearing is a red flag.

Well, argue naysayers, even if the monopoly begins to creep toward predatory pricing, what's to stop some other market from listing a competing product that slashes that cost? In many markets, such as the cash equity trading arena, that is exactly what takes place. But such a scenario is unlikely to happen in the unique arena of trading and clearing in the futures contracts. Firms will only trade where there is sufficient liquidity to unwind a position they are carrying. The liquidity at a merged CME/CBOT would be unassailable, making it impossible for an upstart market to get a "first adopter" to trade a competing product.

The concentrated clearing exacerbates the issue. The cross-margining benefits of clearing all financial futures contracts at a single clearinghouse reduces the amount of capital traders need to post in order to take potentially risk-offsetting positions in products traded on different exchanges. This provides a further incentive to trade only at CME. While the common clearing link may have made margining more efficient, it has left unaddressed the long-term pricing power in the clearing space. We are talking about structural advantages that already impede entry to compete head-to-head in a product with either of them. Taking on their combined might in a merged entity would be akin to a high school team taking on the Chicago Bears. Add to these concentrated powers the fact that a merged CME/CBOT would be a self-regulating organization. That would make the post-merger CME an effective monopoly in the regulation of the financial futures space, exacerbating the issues of bifurcated regulation at the federal level between the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and the SEC.

So how does this merger affect the average trader or public investor? As more and more people use derivatives to manage their own portfolio risk or speculate on the direction of interest rates or commodities, it is a certainty that their transaction costs will be higher if CME and CBOT merge. Since both went public, they have raised their transaction and clearing fees, and can certainly continue to do so unilaterally as a merged organization.

DOJ_NMG_0096225

What can the CFTC and the Department of Justice do to ensure that a merger benefits the markets? First, the CTFC should insist on fungibility of products so that if another futures market offers a Eurodollar future, any firm can take or unwind a position on different marketplaces. That will encourage competition. Second, DOJ can insist that CME "universalize" its clearing services by separating the clearinghouse from its common ownership with the exchanges, or by allowing other clearinghouses the benefits of cross-margining.

Exchanges that have gone public -- especially futures exchanges -- have commanded the attention of the capital markets and enjoyed the benefits of investment. That is a good thing. A CME/CBOT merger, however, holds the potential to cast a disproportionate shadow over the risk markets -- with adverse impact on the markets themselves and certainly on the public.

Mr. Frucher is chairman and CEO of the Philadelphia Stock Exchange.

ENVIRONMENT:

Reforestation And Deforestation (NYT)

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

Almost anyone who lives in the rural Northeast can attest that the forest has expanded its range in the past century. That is why all those stone walls — the edges of cleared fields once upon a time — are now orphaned deep in the woods. A new study published by the National Academy of Sciences and based on a recent international assessment of forests confirms that reforestation has become a widespread pattern in well-off countries and also in a few that are not so well off.

This is obviously good news. Forests provide critical wildlife habitat, and the study's authors say the forest "withholds carbon dioxide that would add to greenhouse gas in the atmosphere."

Forest transitions — the shift from net deforestation to reforestation — began long ago in Europe and more recently in the United States. What is surprising is that they are beginning to happen in parts of India and Asia as well. Reforestation is directly linked to prosperity, an indicator that a country has risen well above the level of mere subsistence and has an economy that no longer depends entirely on exploiting natural resources.

But there is also bad news mixed with the good news. In some parts of the world, deforestation is only expanding, with dire consequences for biodiversity and the climate.

And even where forests have recovered, there is the likelihood that they have passed through an ecological point of no return. Some of the most biologically diverse forests are being logged or burned without ceasing, destroying irreplaceable habitat and extinguishing species one by one.

Perhaps someday those tropical forests will come back. But there will be no bringing back all the creatures who lived among them.

No Fish Story (WP)

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

FOR YEARS, scientists, environmentalists, responsible fishermen and others who care about the health of marine ecosystems have been warning about overfishing and other practices that destroy oceanic biodiversity. The message has been clear to anyone who cared to listen: Reform fishing rules or the oceans will die -- and sooner than you think. How soon? A new paper by a team of respected scientists estimates that unless policymakers take substantial steps to preserve marine biodiversity, the world will face "the global collapse of all taxa currently fished by the mid-21st century." Given how variably fisheries are managed, that may be too dire. Then again, it may not; in many countries, fisheries management is a disaster. And in many parts of this country, it's little better. A lot of fisheries have already collapsed. And destructive fishing practices continue as though the oceans represent a limitless supply, rather than a series of delicate ecosystems more easily destroyed than repaired.

The only good news in the new study, published in the journal Science, is that with most species, humans have not yet reached the point of no return and that sound fisheries management really does make a difference in preserving the sort of diversity that allows stocks to recover. There is no great mystery here. Fisheries managers who are disciplined about limiting the catch to what responsible science says an ecosystem can sustain marry environmentalism with the long-term economic health for fishing communities. It is no accident that Alaska's farsighted fisheries management council is both a leader in environmental stewardship and oversees the country's largest and most profitable fishing industry. These are ultimately the same thing, after all

DOJ_NMG_0096226

-- extinct fish being hard to catch. The challenge domestically is to get other regions to follow Alaska's lead and internationally to get countries bent on destructive fishing practices to adopt more sustainable models.

On the domestic front, Congress needs to reauthorize and improve the law that governs fisheries management. Both houses of Congress have bills that would do this; the Senate's is generally stronger. It is critical that the legislature quickly send a tough bill to President Bush that would bind fisheries managers to the best available science and provide strictly enforceable limits on the amount of fish taken from the seas. Internationally the Bush administration has been pushing for a ban on unregulated bottom trawling on the high seas. Bottom trawling, in which giant nets get raked along the sea floor, destroying ancient corals and other life forms in their paths, is one of the most ecologically destructive forms of fishing. Getting such a ban -- as well as international limitations on other destructive fishing practices -- would be a significant coup environmentally and would burnish the record of oceanic protection Mr. Bush established this year with his creation of a mammoth marine protected area in the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands.

Responsible fisheries management is an issue that bends ideology. But it is one of the most pressing ecological concerns of our time. If policymakers fail to address it seriously, the oceans will become giant dead zones, and seafood will be a thing of the past.

Building Green (WP)

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

IT'S A COMMON misconception that the noxious spew from an automobile's tailpipe is the predominant driver of global warming. But buildings are massive producers of the gases that contribute to climate change, too; they are responsible for at least 38 percent of greenhouse emissions in the United States, and the American Institute of Architects says that number is significantly higher. And, unlike the case with cars, cutting the contribution of buildings to the problem can be remarkably easy.

The environmental benefits of better building requirements remain an insight overripe for policymakers to exploit. That's why we welcome a bill the D.C. Council unanimously supported in its first reading last week. If the bill passes, government structures built three years after the legislation takes effect will have to meet a high standard of environmental friendliness. Five years on, private construction projects will also have to fulfill building requirements aimed at lessening environmental impact. This way, private developers would have a sense of how to easily bring their buildings into compliance and keep extra costs down before they have to begin meeting the new standards, a palliative that convinced the president of the D.C. Building Industry Association to support the bill.

The legislation is hardly perfect, however. The guidelines to which District developers must adhere place insufficient emphasis on energy efficiency. For example, builders can get away with doing special landscaping or making indoor conditions more pleasant instead of aggressively cutting electricity usage. Still, the legislation serves a useful purpose without imposing punishing costs on builders.

While there is some concern that the proposed law might cause developers to turn to other areas of the region that have looser building requirements, it's more likely that the District will become a regional leader in establishing environmentally sound building practices. The region's Council of Governments recently commissioned a task force to recommend area-wide "green" building standards. The District is showing the way.

After years of presidential neglect on global climate change, states and localities have had to pioneer their own approaches to reducing the atmospheric pollution they produce. Smart building requirements are a promising new tool for American cities to do just that. More jurisdictions should follow the District's example.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Global Hunt Turns Pushers Into Prey (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 20, 2006

HENRY ON THE PARK APARTMENTS, ROXBOROUGH

Fighting a fever with pepper cardamom tea, the graduate student raced through his homework and e-mailed a PowerPoint presentation to classmates. American business school seemed so easy. Group homework assignments. Exam review sessions. Online classes. Open-book tests!

And now, on April 18, 2005, Akhil Bansal stood on the cusp of earning an MBA and a master's in health-care finance from Temple University, golden American degrees that would catapult his career back home in India.

He smirked at the irony of that evening's twin assignments, health-care marketing and generic-drug risk management, subjects in which he had more than a passing interest.

If they only knew...

Since his arrival in Philadelphia in 2003, this studious foreigner, with his rumpled flannel shirts and cocksure demeanor, had at age 26 blossomed into a global businessman.

While classmates studied case histories and created mock businesses, Akhil made real money. He controlled offshore accounts worth $6 million. He bought four cars and a sleek five-bedroom condo in a swank suburb of New Delhi. He could fly his fiancée to London on a whim. The balance in his free student checking account stood at $401,881.

His family's business was simple. From its base in India, the company supplied Internet pharmacies on four continents. The Bansals were the guys who supplied the guys who sent that relentless spam, luring American consumers with cheap Viagra, no-prescription Ambien, next-day codeine.

Akhil oversaw the family's North American operations, shipping roughly 75,000 pills a day via UPS. In a little more than a year, the network had smuggled 11 million prescription tablets to more than 60,000 American addresses, an operation that grossed at least $8 million. These numbers did not include the steroids or the kilo shipments of the tranquilizer ketamine, a club drug called "Special K."

The family's Internet business represented a dark slice of the global economy so new, and so widespread, that national governments were still struggling to understand it, let alone police it.

Laws were vague, outdated, inconsistent. Technology - new medicines and ways to deliver them - was outpacing regulation.

Demand grew monthly. On this moonlit evening in April 2005, for example, the Bansal business had an additional six million tablets and 108 kilos of ketamine stockpiled in a cluttered garage and a warehouse in suburban Queens, N.Y.

There were risks, yes. Some clients paid slowly; some employees stole. More ominously, a valued client, one Web operator Akhil supplied, had been arrested on drug charges just days before.

Indeed, in an overseas phone call that very morning Akhil and his father, Brij Bansal, had discussed this arrest, spooked but reminding themselves again that what they were doing was legal: Both were doctors, after all, and in India most of the medicines they sold did not require a prescription.

Even so, the father sensed something wrong.

"Close all your bank accounts and transfer online," Brij told Akhil. "Keep an open ticket ready, and as soon as you smell trouble you can leave by the time they reach you."

"Yeah... . OK, Papaji."

ANJUMAN HOTEL, AGRA, INDIA

Seven thousand miles away, a thin Indian drug agent with a rust-colored goatee perched over a laptop in a sweaty hotel room not far from the Taj Mahal.

The room's thick walls and tiny windows shielded the wire man from the blare of National Highway 2, a road so frenetic even cows gave way to its traffic.

Through headphones, the Indian Narcotics Control Bureau agent listened to a replay of the Bansals' father-son call. Then the wire man listened again to confirm what he had heard: "Start taking precautions... keep an open ticket... as soon as you smell trouble..."

Across the room, his boss and his boss' boss stood next to an agent from America's DEA. The stakeout, two blocks from Brij Bansal's upscale home, was the culmination of a 13-month global dragnet. The wire man knew this bust represented his country's biggest Internet pharmacy crackdown, and its biggest case with the Americans.

With a series of synchronized sweeps coordinated from Philadelphia, Indian and U.S. agents hoped to arrest 17 people worldwide and seize bank accounts from 11 countries.

This was what the wire man had been waiting for.

Over six months on the wire, he had come to know the Bansals. Despite the time difference - when it was day here, it was night in Philadelphia - father and son spoke daily. True, they talked about the son's schooling and the father's bad heart. But mostly they talked business: supply, demand, stock, delivery, debt, profit.

The wire man had also eavesdropped on the father's calls with his New Delhi courier. Again and again, Brij reminded the courier to use phony return addresses on the packages he shipped to the United States. Several times, Brij remarked that he was paying the courier six times the going rate, a fee for which he expected loyalty and secrecy.

In a way, the wire man felt sorry for the Bansals. Except for their crimes, they were educated, productive, respected members of society. It would be sad to see them yanked from their homes in handcuffs.

That inglorious end, he believed, lay hours away.

DOJ_NMG_0096228

LANCASTER, PA.

Lynn, a 35-year-old mother who had not worked since a 2000 car accident, logged on to a familiar Web site, meds-warehouse.net.

Her doctor had prescribed Ambien in the past, but he was retired now, and insurance no longer covered the sleeping medication.

She ordered 30 tabs with her credit card.

The person at meds-warehouse.net did not require a prescription, nor did he have any medical training. He didn't even understand the purpose of half the drugs he sold.

After validating Lynn's credit card, the Web site operator entered the order onto an Excel spreadsheet, one of 24 Ambien orders this day - orders from Little Rock, Ark.; Hattiesburg, Miss.; Plano, Texas; Wichita, Kan.; and Philadelphia.

The operator forwarded the spreadsheet to his suppliers, Akhil and Brij Bansal, who fulfilled more than 1,000 orders each day from their Queens warehouse, shipping them by UPS across America.

DEA OFFICES, CENTER CITY

Whenever DEA supervisor Jeff Breeden grew nervous, he would rub his forehead with his left hand. Now, as the arrest briefing began, Breeden dug deep into his brow.

Tomorrow's worldwide takedown of the Bansal network was to be monitored from this drab conference room overlooking Independence Mall.

The network supplied a rainbow of pills - painkillers, sleep aids, sedatives, stimulants, steroids, psychotropics, erectile-dysfunction medication. Thousands of orders a day.

Who knew who made this stuff, where it came from, what was in it? The public health risk that Internet drugs posed, Breeden thought, was incalculable.

Yet no one in DEA had ever worked a major global online pharmacy investigation. He knew it was a career case, one colleagues would always link to his name. Breeden? Yeah, he's the guy who supervised the Internet pill case out of Philly.

To take down the network, agents were using a number of weapons - surveillance, undercover buys, cell-tower pings, trash pulls, e-mail wiretaps, bank subpoenas, immigration reports, even provisions of the Patriot Act. Agents here had flown to Australia, Costa Rica and India.

As Breeden listened to the arrest briefing, he thought about everything that could go wrong.

Would foreign banks and governments cooperate? Or would they protect the targets, allowing Akhil and others to flee with millions? Would magistrates in several states authorize search warrants in time? Would the bad guys be there when agents raided their homes at dawn? Had any of them gotten wind of the premature arrest in New York? Did Akhil, as he implied in e-mails, really have a mole inside U.S. Customs?

Had they overlooked anything?

James Kasson, the top DEA official in Philadelphia, a weightlifter with a New York accent, began with a pep talk. What they were doing, he reminded the agents, was important, cutting-edge.

"The administrator is personally watching," Kasson said, citing Karen Tandy, DEA's top official in Washington.

Congress was pressuring Tandy to do something about illegal online pharmacies. She recognized the emerging public health threat. After all, any kid with a credit card and Internet access could order highly addictive drugs from the safety of home. But so far, DEA had struggled to take down the rogue pharmacies.

Tandy was counting on the Bansal case to make a splash.

In D.C., there was talk that the attorney general himself would announce the bust. In New York, DEA agents were going to let ABC News go along on the raids. In Philadelphia, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan prepped for his news conference.

As the briefing broke up, the FBI agent on the case, Jason Huff, a bright young techie, approached the lead DEA agent, Eric Russ, a no-nonsense former Marine. Huff proposed an overnight stakeout of Akhil's Roxborough apartment, in case he and his roommate tried to flee.

Russ liked Huff, but Russ had a lot to coordinate, too much to accomplish before morning, and a stakeout wasn't part of the plan. He doubted anyone would run. These targets were computer nerds, not street thugs. If they hadn't detected surveillance trailing them for the last nine months, they weren't likely to be spooked at the eleventh hour.

Huff offered to have his FBI squad sit on the Roxborough apartment. Russ wasn't in the mood to argue. He thought, Knock yourself out, bud. I'm going home. I've got to be back here at 5 a.m. to coordinate arrests in five countries.

In the meantime, Kasson walked over to chat with Breeden, the nervous supervisor.

Kasson could see Breeden was tense. He tried some DEA humor.

"All right, Breeden," he said. "It's all on your shoulders now."

Wonderful, Breeden thought, knowing the boss was half-joking. He rubbed his forehead.

DOJ_NMG_0096229

NEW DELHI

The deputy director of investigations for India's Narcotics Control Bureau (NCB) was senior enough to rate an air-conditioner in his office. Yet Ahmad Payam Siddiqui was sweating anyway.

As the top official involved in the country's first Internet investigation, he knew the next 24 hours were vital.

For six months, Siddiqui had kept the Bansal case a closely guarded secret. Leaks and corruption were endemic in the Indian government, and Siddiqui feared someone would tip the targets in Agra or Delhi.

Akhil Bansal's father, Brij, was wealthy. If he knew what was coming, he might flee to nearby Nepal.

On the eve of the arrests, Siddiqui had had no choice but to let dozens of officials know about the case - agents, their superiors, local police. Who knew whom they might tell?

Siddiqui felt helpless. So much was at stake. The case. His reputation. The reputation of NCB. Of India.

If we screw this up, he thought, the Americans will think we are incompetent.

DUNKIN' DONUTS, NORTHEAST PHILA.

Prosecutor Barbara Cohan handed the search warrants to the magistrate judge on call.

It was well past 9 p.m.

Cohan ordered a large black coffee and an egg-and-bacon bagel, her first meal since breakfast, her first chance to exhale.

While the judge reviewed the paperwork, Cohan joined two cops at another table. They toasted her silently, clicking styrofoam. This was her last case as a federal prosecutor, probably the last time she would meet a magistrate after hours to get warrants approved. After 24 years - a career that included the successful prosecution of a KGB spy - Cohan was leaving the U.S. Attorney's Office.

That her last case was so important, so fascinating, so challenging, gave Cohan special satisfaction. Akhil's business acumen both impressed and repulsed her.

The prosecutor bit into the bagel, sipped some coffee. She looked up at Lower Merion Police Officer Christine Konieczny.

"Do you think he has any idea what's about to happen to him?"

"If he did -" Konieczny said.

"He'd run," Cohan said.

Everyone laughed.

They talked about that sweet moment - hours away - when agents would cuff Akhil.

Cohan said, "Wouldn't you just love to see the look on his face?"

ROXBOROUGH

About 10 p.m., Akhil received a call from India.

It was his mom, worried about his dad. Brij had a serious heart ailment, and twice since January Akhil had flown home to take him to specialists. Now Brij's hands and feet were swelling, a sign his heart wasn't pumping properly. Though he was a doctor, Brij was a stubborn patient.

Akhil tried to calm his mother. He promised to see her soon.

He hung up and sat down.

The timing couldn't be worse: He was days away from buying a $400,000 medical transcription business; his best friend and his roommate were in South Carolina to close the deal. He was feuding with his sister over control of their father's business. And, in 12 days, he had final exams at Temple.

Then there was that odd New York situation. When his client, a New York Web site operator, had failed to respond for a few days, Akhil had Googled the man's name. The headlines shook him: "Internet Drug Ring Smashed," "Cyber Gangs Charged."

Akhil recalled his father's warning: Keep an open ticket... leave...

Akhil got online and checked his favorite airline, Virgin Atlantic. A flight was leaving Newark, N.J., for London in nine hours. He booked it and pulled out his Bank of America debit card.

The card was rejected.

Akhil tried again. Rejected again. He tried another card. It didn't work, either. He tried an Air Canada flight from Toronto, leaving in 19 hours. No luck.

How could the bank screw up this badly? He had $401,881 in that account!

He logged on to bankofamerica.com. The account showed a negative balance.

He dialed the bank's 800 number. A woman who answered told him to call a Philadelphia number in the morning. She said, "Legal restrictions have been placed on the accounts."

Legal restrictions?

Legal restrictions. An arrested customer. A warning from his father.

DOJ_NMG_0096230

Akhil hunted through his wallet and found a credit card that worked. He bought two tickets home - one departing Toronto on Air Canada and one departing Newark on Virgin Atlantic. Booking two flights gave him a backup, and a decoy.

Then Akhil called a classmate. He needed a big favor; there was trouble. Could the friend come over?

Akhil explained that he needed to leave for Toronto right away but didn't want to use his own car. Akhil's friend could sleep in the passenger seat while Akhil drove all night. To cross the border, Akhil reserved a rental car in Detroit, a Ford Escape.

At 1:40 a.m., Akhil emerged from his apartment into the crisp night air. He rolled his canvas suitcase to his friend's SUV and put his laptop in the backseat. He pocketed a handful of the pick-me-up Provigil, his drug of choice.

Then Akhil got behind the wheel and headed west.

BREEDEN'S HOME, DOWNINGTOWN

The DEA supervisor's cell phone woke him from a deep sleep at 1:42 a.m. He groped for the phone, but the call slipped to voicemail.

As Breeden fumbled to retrieve the message, the phone rang again. It was a DEA agent on the other side of the world.

The guy in India got right to it: There was a new wiretap from Brij's phone. It looked like Akhil planned to flee his Philadelphia apartment and probably leave the country. In fact, he might already be gone.

"Jeff," the agent said, "we need to get out there." p>

For online extras throughout the series, including audio, video, photos and more, go to http://go.philly.com/drugnet

DEA Administrator Karen Tandy (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 20, 2006

Drug Enforcement Administration head Karen Tandy discusses why it is important for law enforcement agencies to focus on the distribution of prescription drugs over the Internet. Inquirer staff writer John Shiffman conducted the interview. First, Shiffman asked Tandy to discuss the overall threat of Internet pharmacies.

[...or click here to listen with your Windows Media / RealPlayer]

[Click here for an MP3 version of the interview.]

© 2006 Philadelphia Inquirer and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.philly.com

The Bansal Pill Network (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 20, 2006

1. The Bansals smuggle pills into the U.S. To avoid U.S. Customs, which targets small pill packages from overseas Web sites, Dr. Brij Bansal in India and his son, Akhil Bansal in Philadelphia, ship millions of pills in bulk from Delhi to their Queens, N.Y., distribution center.

2. A customer orders pills American consumers, responding to spam or using Google to search for drugs, place a credit-card order with a Web site. Unregulated sites do not require a legal prescription and are not registered with DEA.

3. The Web site forwards the order The Web site charges the consuner's credit card, then forwrds the order to the Bansals' operations in Agra, India, and Queens. Immigrants at the Queens depot fulfill the order, stuffing pills inside envelopes for UPS pickup.

4. Pills arrive Within a day or two, UPS delivers the pills to the consumer's doorstep.

5. Bansals get paid Every few weeks, the Web-site operators wire payment to one of Akhil's bank accounts.

© 2006 Philadelphia Inquirer and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.philly.com

Origins (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 20, 2006

THE STORY SO FARHours before DEA agents are to arrest Internet drug dealers in a worldwide sweep, Temple grad student Akhil Bansal races from his Roxborough apartment to flee home to India. Today's installment takes us back to the day the case began. It is February 2004.

PHILA. INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

It all began on a frigid February 2004 morning - back when Akhil Bansal still viewed shipping pills as a chore for his father, back when DEA agents didn't even have Internet access at their desks.

At the airport, a squat Airborne Express supervisor noticed three suspicious packages on the green conveyer belt and, because they lacked manifests, broke them open.

Inside the first, he found 120 tablets of generic Valium. Inside the others, he found more Valium and knockoff Viagra.

Anonymous packaging. No dosage directions. No evidence of a prescription.

The supervisor called police.

NEAR UPPER CHICHESTER

Carlos Aquino, tired from a three-day training session in Quantico, Va., pulled into the driveway of his canary-yellow suburban home. He planned to take the rest of the day off as comp time, maybe tinker with his fishing boat, an 18-foot Manatee.

The DEA investigator, his once-trim body softened by desk work and agency meetings, hauled his suitcase inside.

He had found the seminar interesting enough - DEA had established a new priority, targeting Internet pharmacies. But Carlos had left the session hoping he never got such a case. It looked complicated, a pain.

"Little cases, little headaches," he'd say. "Big cases, big headaches."

Carlos had had enough big cases. He'd spent 24 years as a Philly cop, nine of them assigned to a DEA task force, busting crackheads, kicking down doors, recovering kilos of dope, nearly getting himself killed working undercover against Jamaican thugs. He could be a hard-ass, but his warm smile revealed an empathetic nature.

Now, at 56, Carlos worked for the DEA division that regulated pharmaceuticals. He carried a clipboard instead of a gun, pursuing a softer kind of criminal, often doctors and pharmacists who violated prescription laws. As bad guys went, they made easy targets. He would say, "Doc, whatcha been doing, huh?" Usually, the doctor would confess on the spot, case closed.

Carlos found the work safe, satisfying, simple - a solid way, he thought, for a Puerto Rican raised in South Philadelphia to end a fine career as a narc.

After lunch on the day he returned from Quantico, his Nextel cell phone chirped. It was Bill Knightly, a state trooper Carlos knew from an old DEA task force. Salt-and-pepper crewcut, medium build. A good guy.

"Carlos, you know anything about Internet pharmacies?"

"Yeah, a little..."

Knightly briefed him: 119 packages seized at Airborne Express at the airport. Generic Valium and Viagra. In a month's time, the same shipping company, Abbas Enterprises in Chester, had sent 4,100 similar packages.

Here's the fun part, Knightly said: Two different men had delivered the Abbas packages, each signing "Leroy Jones."

Leroy Jones No. 1 was a hulking, bald African American.

Leroy Jones No. 2 was a flabby Indian fellow with a comb-over.

Carlos laughed.

Knightly continued: The latest shipment arrived without a manifest, giving Airborne the legal right to open the packages. The depot supervisor found scores of generic Valium and Viagra inside.

Knightly and local police planned to confront the shipper. Was DEA interested? Did Carlos want to go along?

Not really, Carlos thought. The case sounded complicated, probably insignificant.

On the other hand, Carlos valued the cop-to-cop network he had built over 30 years. He liked being a fed locals could work with. As a Philadelphia cop, he had hated it whenever the feds whizzed on stuff he brought them. When Carlos moved to DEA, he'd vowed never to be so rude, so turf-conscious.

"Dude," he told the trooper, "I'm in."

ROXBOROUGH

Akhil scanned an e-mail from his father and saved it.

Helping his father's business hadn't been part of his plan. Akhil had come to Philadelphia to earn an MBA and a master's in health-care finance. Classes kept him busy enough; his life in a dim Henry Avenue apartment - mattress on the floor, food stacked haphazardly in the kitchen - was a testament to that.

But as an only son, even at 25, Akhil had a duty to do whatever his father wished. Helping his dad ship Indian-made knockoff pills from inside the United States took only an hour or two a day.

Besides, when Akhil was young, Brij had given him whatever he desired - the latest computers, cell phones, stereo, CDs - things available to only 2 percent of Indians his age.

In return, Brij, a successful doctor, had demanded academic excellence in high school. "Get top marks and I will buy you a car," he used to say. "Get good marks and I will buy you a bicycle. Get low marks and I will buy you a taxi, and you will drive it for the rest of your life."

Late many nights, Akhil cloistered himself in his room with books, the air-conditioning and stereo turned up high. Outside, 10-foot walls separated him from Agra's poverty and chaos, a life he hoped to avoid.

"A very responsible boy," his high school report card said. "Artistic, capable."

DOJ_NMG_0096232

Akhil excelled at St. Paul's Church School, where students wore stiff navy blazers and striped ties and could be caned for an incorrect answer. He scored best-in-class on a national standardized test, and when he turned 16, Brij bought him a new, Korean-made sedan.

Akhil entered medical college in Gwalior and took residence in a dorm, to his father's horror. No son of his would live among commoners. Brij got Akhil a proper apartment and installed a servant.

After graduation, Akhil worked for a few hospitals, an expected step before joining his father's clinics. He grooved in Delhi's party scene with fellow doctors, assumed comic postures in group pictures, and grew a goatee. He used "Dr." on credit cards and signed up for the e-mail address drakhil@hotmail.com.

Then he threw everyone a curveball: He was going to graduate school in America.

With his grades, he believed he could go anywhere. His research revealed that Temple University offered both the MBA and health-care diplomas he sought.

His parents were wary. Philadelphia was halfway around the world.

"Just stay," Brij said. Akhil's mother, Kamlesh, laughed, "Who will cook for you?" The joke masked his parents' biggest fear - that some white American woman would fancy Akhil's piercing eyes and thick hair, and he would never return. Brij and Kamlesh devised plans to keep their son in India.

First, to renovate his room in Agra, they spent $16,000 - more money than most Indians spend for a house.

When that didn't work, they found him an attractive Indian woman to marry, of the same business-class caste, the Baniya. He rejected her, too.

"I'll not let you go away from me," Brij said. "How much can you earn if you go? $5,000 a month? I'll give you $6,000 a month to stay with me."

"Papaji," Akhil said. "Please understand. I want to get these degrees so someday I will be in a position to offer my son a job for $6,000 a month."

When Akhil left for Temple, Brij was so distraught he didn't go to the airport.

And yet, within six months, father and son found themselves working together again - Brij in India, Akhil in Philadelphia.

By February 2004, business had become so good, they had hired some help, a guy with an account at Airborne Express.

WASHINGTON

DEA Administrator Karen Tandy joined the nation's top narcotics officials inside the National Press Club, in a white banquet room overlooking the top of the East Wing of the White House. They were there to announce the government's first strategy to combat online pharmacies.

"What we have seen," Tandy told reporters, "is the incredible path of misery and wake of family destruction and addiction left by the illegal use of prescription drugs.

"Let me be clear: When Internet pharmacies serve legitimate patients receiving care under accepted medical standards, we welcome those Internet sales. When they are merely crime impersonating medicine, we will put them out of business."

A CNN reporter asked, "Why is it not a very simple matter for DEA to identify the individuals that are spamming offers for Vicodin, Xanax... and shut them down tomorrow?"

Because, Tandy said, "there are hundreds of thousands of sites" online, virtually all cloaking their identities.

"You don't know where to find them. They could shut down one day and pop up under a new name the next."

JAIPUR, INDIA

Akhil's sister, Julie, was in charge of marketing, or spam.

Sir,

We wish to introduce ourselves as wholesale distributor and supplier of generic and branded medicines manufactured by top multinational pharmaceuticals companies of India. We can drop ship to your customers in US 100% delivery without any customs problems.

We charge the following generic: Viagra $1; Valium, $60.00 per 100 tabs; codeine $50 per 100 tabs...

Let me know if you are interested. Thanks and regards, Julie.

A reply came the next day, from discountmedsonline.com:

Hi Julie,

What is the total delivery time frame? Will you be carrying Xanax, Ativan, Diazapam, Ambien, anytime soon? I may be very interested in your business.

Thank you.

CHESTER

To trace the suspicious Valium found at the airport, Carlos and two local officers, Chester Police Sgt. Joe Bail and Delaware County investigator Michael Boudwin, drove to a storefront at 214 Lamokin St., the return address on the package.

DOJ_NMG_0096233

The storefront's owner met them there.

Richard Dabney was a bald, heavyset, 61-year-old ex-con with drug and bank robbery arrests dating back to 1969. Carlos expected Dabney to lie.

Indeed, he told them a story: A mysterious Indian he had met at a Radnor computer store had offered him $3 a package to use his Airborne account. The guy paid cash, and Dabney never asked what was inside.

"Dude," Carlos said quietly, "you're BS-ing me."

Dabney tried again. He'd met the Indian driving a cab.

Carlos gave a cold stare. "Dude, don't lie to me."

Dabney insisted the story was true.

Fine, Carlos said. Help us catch this guy. Wear a wire.

Dabney agreed.

As Carlos drove back to his Chinatown office, he called a federal prosecutor.

"Hey, it's Carlos. I've got a new one, a quick-hit indictment. A no-brainer. Interested?"

ROXBOROUGH

Akhil confronted his roommate, fellow Temple student Atul Patil.

Where was Dabney? Patil was the one who had met him in the cab and had his cell-phone number.

Akhil didn't trust Dabney. He seemed like a hustler. And his English was terrible. Akhil liked to joke that Dabney, who was African American, spoke "Ebonics."

Still, mailing pills for Brij was beginning to interfere with Akhil's studies. He needed a shipper, one who did the job and didn't ask questions.

The Bansals did not operate Web sites. They were bigger than that. They were wholesalers who fulfilled the orders American consumers sent to online pharmacies.

To circumvent U.S. customs, Brij shipped large packages of generic pills from India to Akhil in Philadelphia. Here, Akhil and Patil took up the mindless task of reshipping; while listening to B-101's soft rock, they wrote labels and stuffed packages with generic Ambien, Xanax, Viagra, Valium, codeine, morphine, steroids.

Father and son told themselves what they were doing was legal because both were doctors in India and because Brij had an Indian license to ship pharmaceuticals.

Besides, they told associates, if the authorities concluded that shipping the medicines was illegal, someone would send a warning notice. Which the Bansals would, of course, honor.

In the beginning, two or three dozen packages from India were no trouble. But by exam time, Akhil and Patil were receiving 100 packages at once. A day's shipment could contain 5,000 or 10,000 pills.

So they had found Dabney and paid him $3 a package. For fun, they tipped him with surplus Viagra.

Now Dabney had vanished. Akhil pressed Patil. What had Dabney done with their drugs?

A month passed. Then in April, Dabney called. Could they meet in Chester?

Patil said, How about the Friendly's on Ridge Avenue? It was closer.

Sure, Dabney said.

NEAR FRIENDLY'S, ROXBOROUGH

Carlos stood by as a detective flipped on the recorder:

"Today's date is 4-7-04," the detective said. "Time now is approximately 4:30. This will be a consensual intercept by Richard Dabney and two Indian males."

The feds hoped Dabney could get the Indians to admit they were selling drugs - or, better still, provide details about a larger operation, anything that might lead to the smuggler behind it all.

But when Dabney met the Indians at Friendly's, his hostile, accusatory tone implied he'd had no idea the packages contained drugs. It caught the Indians off guard, as well as the agents listening in.

"If I get caught with drugs, I got a problem," Dabney told Akhil and Patil. "... Either you or the police set me up."

Patil was skeptical. "But you knew what we were doing. We were clear on that."

"You said Viagra and antibiotics... . You guys are playing games, man."

"If we were playing games with you, we wouldn't be here."

Dabney kept talking, but agents listening by wire already knew the whole thing was a disaster. Dabney dominated the session, in a clumsy attempt to exonerate himself. The Indians said little. They seemed unsophisticated, small-timers.

Besides, the agents already had another, promising lead.

While searching Dabney's storefront in Chester, they found a letter from an angry woman in Olympia, Wash. She'd returned 50 tablets of Valium and a MasterCard receipt for $154. She'd ordered 1-milligram tabs, not 0.5-milligram.

DOJ_NMG_0096234

The woman's letter was addressed to "Rx-mart.com." The FBI quickly traced the Web site. It was in Texas - and, ultimately, would lead them to Australia.

FRIENDLY'S, ROXBOROUGH

Akhil and Patil dismissed the Dabney encounter, too.

Dabney might be hoping to scam them out of more money. Well, Akhil and Patil were moving to a new system anyway.

Akhil's father had put them in touch with an Indian couple living in Queens, N.Y., David and Elizabeth Armstrong. From now on, the Armstrongs would handle the shipping.

Under the improved scheme, bulk quantities - pills by the tens of thousands - would be shipped from India to a Queens rowhouse. In the basement, newly arrived Indian immigrants would earn $6 an hour repackaging and labeling pills. Already, the Armstrongs were filling 400 orders a day.

From: Akhil Bansal

To: David Armstrong

Please send the following order and let me know the tracking number. Alprax, 2,000 tabs. Thanks. Success is a journey not a destination!

To further shield the operation, the Armstrongs had UPS pick up the packages from their home, a few miles away. The Armstrongs lived on a busy thoroughfare in Queens called Utopia Parkway.

PAGOSA SPRINGS, COLO.

On a lonely canyon road in southwestern Colorado, a deputy sheriff discovered a middle-age woman facedown outside her Chevy Tahoe, dead.

Inside her SUV, the deputy found packets of the blood-pressure medicine Catapres, pills often abused as a sedative.

The woman's husband knew she had been suicidal. But until he began to go through her things, he did not know that she had been ordering Catapres, Valium and other sedatives online.

The husband gave the receipts and envelopes to police. Some of them bore a return address in Queens - 5028 Utopia Parkway.

Missed yesterday's chapter? Catch up, and get extras including audio, video and more at http://go.philly.com/drugnet

HOW THIS SERIES WAS PRODUCED

This series is based on multiple interviews with more than 50 sources; U.S. and Indian judicial, e-mail and bank records; and secret U.S. grand jury transcripts, Indian wiretaps, and DEA and Homeland Security investigative reports obtained by The Inquirer.

Quotes, details, interpretations, thoughts, conversations, even facial expressions, have been substantiated by firsthand observation, documents or multiple sources.

Interviews were conducted in New Delhi and Agra, India; Washington; and Philadelphia. Those interviewed include Akhil Bansal, Foram Mankodi and Bansal relatives; six Indian drug agents; 22 American federal agents, including DEA's Carlos Aquino, Eric Russ and Gerard Gobin; and eight current and former prosecutors, including Barbara Cohan. People who bought drugs online are identified by first name only because they have not been charged with a crime.

For an exhaustive list of sources, go to http://go.philly.com/drugnet

27 Nabbed In Major Drug Ring (HA)

Hattiesburg American, November 18, 2006

The indictments of 27 people - including five Hattiesburg men - as well as the seizure of $15.7 million worth of drugs and $2.9 million in cash and property resulted from breaking up one of the largest and most sophisticated drug-trafficking operations in Mississippi history, officials said Friday.

The Hattiesburg men indicted include:

Ivory Charles Kindred, 41, owner of the now-closed Hi-Hat 2000 Club

Ricky Wilson Barnes, 33

Johnny Grindle, 35

Lester Carpenter, 41

Brooks Stallings Jr., 33

Kindred, Barnes and Stallings have already entered guilty pleas and are awaiting sentencing.

Carpenter has been sentenced to 37 months in federal custody.

Grindle has only been indicted.

"This is really the big, top-tier guys," Stephen Luzinski, assistant special agent in charge of Mississippi Drug Enforcement Administration, said of the 27 suspects. "It was especially significant in that agents were able to successfully trace the movement of both drugs and money from the hands of high level Mississippi traffickers into the hands of some of Mexico's most powerful drug traffickers."

DOJ_NMG_0096235

Operation Central Hub, which began in April 2005, targeted drug trafficking in the Jackson and Hattiesburg metro areas, but the 19-month Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation uncovered a link to Mexico and other cities in the U.S., including Dallas, Atlanta, Little Rock, Detroit and Laredo, Texas.

Large shipments of cocaine and marijuana were transported across the border from Mexico, authorities said. Once inside the U.S., drug shipments were shuttled from Texas to various cities, including Mississippi. Cocaine shipments destined for Mississippi were sent via commercial tractor-trailers operated by truck drivers employed by Mexican drug bosses.

The drug shipments were sometimes hidden in secret compartments within trucks or trailers or co-mingled with legitimate cargo.

A second transportation method was the use of large gooseback trailers pulled by dual wheel pickups. The trailers were outfitted with sophisticated hidden compartments accessible only through a hydraulic remote control system.

Marshall Fisher, director of Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics, said the drug trafficking operation is one of the top two or three in MBN's history since it was created in 1971.

An affidavit by a DEA agent said a confidential source provided information that suspect Michael Andre Travis had telephone contact with another suspect, Oscar Gomez, a known trafficker of cocaine residing in Texas, who had ties to cocaine traffickers in Mexico. The informant also provided information on others. Surveillance of Travis showed all his movement and meetings with others involved in the alleged drug operation.

The government is seeking forfeiture of all items they believed were purchased with illegal drug money, including a home in southwest Hinds County valued at more than $500,000.

The home belongs to Wilbert Newell and his wife, Audrina. Wilbert Newell has pleaded guilty to a drug charge and is awaiting sentencing.

He could not be reached Friday. His wife, who answered the phone at the Newells' home, told The Clarion-Ledger he wasn't there. She began to cry and said she didn't know anything about her husband's activity or if he was involved with drugs.

Audrina Newell said she is aware that the government is planning to try to seize the home.

"I wish they would just leave me alone," Audrina Newell said. She has not been implicated in any of her husband's activities.

The Hattiesburg American reported earlier this year that during a May 26 hearing for Kindred, Stallings and Barnes, prosecutors said the suspects are part of a drug network that allegedly brought almost 6,000 pounds of marijuana from Texas to Mississippi since August 2005.

According to an affidavit filed by DEA special agent J. Derryle Smith Jr., a confidential informant tipped agents that marijuana was to be delivered to the owner of the Hi Hat 2000 on May 3.

Agents from the DEA and the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics observed Barnes unloading 1,500 pounds of marijuana from a tractor-trailer on May 3 near 309 Northgate Road, Hattiesburg, the affidavit said.

The maximum penalty for the drug trafficking charge on each defendant is up to 40 years in prison.

Post a Comment

This article does not have any comments associated with it

Originally published November 18, 2006 Print this article Email this to a friend Subscribe Now

Indicted list

Names of some of those indicted who have not been arrested are sealed. Listed below are those indictments that have been made public. Unless noted, specific charges were not provided:

Michael Travis, 37, of Byram pleaded guilty to drug trafficking and is awaiting sentencing.

Wilbert Newell, 45, of Jackson pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Lester Carpenter, 41, of Hattiesburg has been sentenced to 37 months in prison.

Charles Johnson, 34, of Jackson pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Johnny Grindle, 35, of Hattiesburg.

Timothy Jackson, 35, of Jackson.

Alonzo Farmer, 30, of Ridgeland.

Brooks Stallings Jr., 33, of Hattiesburg. He pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Ricky Wilson Barnes, 33, of Hattiesburg pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Charles Ivory Kindred, 41, of Hattiesburg pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Marvin McDonald, 38, of Atlanta.

DOJ_NMG_0096236

Victor Thomas, 46, of Jackson. He was indicted on federal charges, but is incarcerated in Texas on state charges arising from the investigation.

Manuel Villarreal, 31, of Laredo, Texas.

Michael Martinez, 30, of San Antonio.

Oscar Fierro Cantu, 53, of Dallas.

Eloy Lira Jr., 33, of Laredo, Texas.

Tommy Gholar, 50, of Jackson.

NFL Testers Step Up Fight (NYDN)

By T.j. Quinn, Daily News Sports Writer

New York Daily News, November 20, 2006

As more of the NFL's Drug Program Agents join a potential lawsuit for tens of millions of dollars over back payroll tax and benefits, the league has changed its plan to replace them in midseason.

After the IRS ruled over the summer that the DPAs, the men who collect urine samples from players, were employees, not independent contractors, the NFL told the 80DPAs that they would be replaced by an outside company called Comprehensive Drug Testing (CDT) in mid-November. CDT handles collections for Major League Baseball and the NHL.

In a memo sent to DPAs last week, however, DPA supervisor Warren Welsh wrote, "It has become apparent that ongoing discussions between the Management Council and CDT make the original date unrealistic....it seems, more likely than not, that the change will not take place until the end of the season."

But the DPAs, most of whom are former FBI, IRS and DEA agents and police detectives, also want to know when the NFL is going to abide by the IRS' ruling. Attorney Robert Costello, whose client roster has gone from three to "many dozens" of current and former agents, said yesterday that he is giving the NFL less than a month to make a determination.

"Either we will settle or we will sue," said Costello, a partner with Levy, Tolman and Costello in Manhattan.

As Costello sees it, and as IRS documents seem to agree, the NFL has little choice other than to start writing checks to DPAs for the payroll tax they have been paying without help from the NFL since the program was created in 1988. Costello also has asked the NFL to say what benefit plans the DPAs should be entitled to join.

The NFL might have a much larger problem than a lawsuit if it doesn't come up with a solution. According to the IRS, if an employer is audited and found to be in violation of the agency's ruling, it could face "massive" penalties far in excess of the amount of money in dispute, one spokesman said. Many DPAs told the Daily News that they never complained because the job was well-paying with "no heavy lifting," as one put it. When anti-doping experts criticized the NFL before Congress last year, saying the league should turn to outside collectors, the NFL dismissed the suggestion.

But after two DPAs asked the IRS to determine whether they truly were independent contractors, the arrangement started to fall apart.

The NFL, as has been the case since The News first reported the spat with the DPAs, refused to comment.

What Welsh's memo does not say, and what the DPAs do not know, is why the negotiations with CDT are taking longer than expected. Those talks come as the NFL is looking at other revisions to its drug-testing program.

League officials met with members of the House Government Reform Committee earlier this fall to discuss ways to improve their policy, and the NFL and the NFL Players Association have had ongoing discussions about adding more tests and closing potential loopholes.

Whatever the changes, many of the DPAs hoped to be hired by CDT, as the NFL originally suggested they might be. But according to last week's memo, the company has yet to contact any of the collectors, and one DPA said collectors who contacted CDT couldn't get information about the company's plans.

But several admit their chances of continuing with CDT may be slim, as the NFL has grown frustrated over stories about the standoff, and a story last week in which The News revealed that the league's testing program had large gaps during the season when players were not tested. The NFL denied there were gaps, but numerous DPAs and even some players disputed the league's claim.

Colombia Sends An Anti-drug Bouquet To U.S. (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

IPIALES, COLOMBIA — With the destruction of a 12-acre opium poppy crop in southern Narino state on Sunday, the Colombian government declared it had rid its territory of all "industrial" plantations of the flower used to make heroin.

DOJ_NMG_0096237

Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos made the declaration during a media trip to a mountainside poppy field 375 miles southwest of Bogota near the Ecuadorean border, minutes before dozens of troops destroyed the crop with machetes. It was perhaps no coincidence the assertion came as the U.S. Congress was considering extending Plan Colombia, the $600-million anti-drug and terrorism aid package whose effectiveness has been called into question.

Santos described the elimination of sizable poppy fields as a "great accomplishment in the struggle against narcotics. We're not saying some poppies won't reappear in six months, but for now they are gone."

Santos is the Cabinet member who oversees the national police and armed forces, which have carried the fight against Colombia's drug traffickers. Heroin production and trafficking continues — a 130-pound load of heroin was seized on the Colombian island of San Andres in the Caribbean last month.

But even critics of Plan Colombia say strides have been made. Poppy cultivation fell to less than 4,500 acres last year, or 10% of what was farmed in the early 1990s, according to Colombian statistics. Colombians also report that seizures of the gummy substance collected from poppies that is the basis of heroin are up a hundredfold since 2000. U.S. drug authorities report increases in street prices in cities such as Chicago and Boston, an indicator of diminishing supply from Colombia and elsewhere.

But the relative success of poppy eradication only puts in bolder relief the stubbornness of cocaine production in Colombia. After seven years and $4 billion in U.S. aid under Plan Colombia, cocaine continues to be nearly as plentiful as it was before 2000.

In response, there are growing calls for a change in tactics, toward more incentives and fewer punitive measures. On Sunday, Santos told reporters that the government would offer farmers more subsidies to grow crops other than coca and poppies.

"Crop substitution programs have been the missing link in the struggle against drugs," Santos said. "That's going to change."

About 300,000 acres of Colombian coca were fumigated with an industrial herbicide last year.

A shift away from massive spraying would be in line with calls from the United Nations, several nongovernmental agencies and Democratic Party critics of Plan Colombia in Congress. All have long insisted that for drug eradication to work, more farming alternatives must be offered to peasants.

"People grow poppies because we are all poor and we have been forgotten by the government," said farmer Alirio Quitiyan, who happened upon the eradication scene. Quitiyan denied that he ever grew poppies.

Guerrillas in the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, offer peasants about $50 a year to use their land to grow poppies, Santos said.

A top United Nations official here said recently that for crop substitution programs to work in Colombia as they have in Southeast Asia, officials must offer farmers similar incentives.

Santos said eight possible crop substitutes had been identified for Narino state, including African palm and rubber.

Such incentives "would be the only way to make any crop reductions sustainable," said Adam Isacson, a researcher at the Center for International Policy in Washington, a watchdog group that monitors Plan Colombia spending.

IMMIGRATION:

Signs Of Hope On Immigration (NYT)

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

The political earthquake in Washington has knocked loose some of the big obstacles to fixing the immigration system. A decent solution is now there for the taking, if President Bush and the newly Democratic Congress are willing to grab it.

It won't be easy. Some of the debate's loudest shouters, liars and dead-horse beaters were ushered by voters from the room — people like J. D. Hayworth and Randy Graf in Arizona, John Hostettler in Indiana and Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania. But the public is still in a prickly mood. All those shrill Republican ads about Mexicans stealing your Social Security failed as an electoral strategy, but that doesn't mean politicians always lose by being immigration hawks. Voters approved tough ballot measures. In Arizona, they made English the official language and restricted illegal immigrants' ability to sue, receive bail and qualify for benefits.

And except for the losers on the border-fixated fringe, not many in the restrictionist camp seem particularly chastened by the election. Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, an opponent of the comprehensive reform bill that passed the Senate this year, won his race, as did several new Democrats who ran as immigration hard-liners. Local lawmakers in Texas and other states are still going after illegal immigrants with fervor.

DOJ_NMG_0096238

The roots of a divisive, grinding immigration debate have not gone away. But it is crucial that the Democrats find their voice. The effort to revive immigration reform should start in the Senate. There is a decent bill under the barnacled hulk of legislation that passed the Senate last May. It used to be called McCain-Kennedy, before other senators tacked on tough-posing amendments that made it fundamentally unworkable and unjust. The Senate should strip those away, like the ones that divide immigrants into three arbitrary tiers of worthiness and needlessly force those seeking legal status to trek to a border state to apply for it.

The principles that guided the original McCain-Kennedy bill are those that should guide the coming reform effort: laws should be enforced at the border and workplace, fairly and evenhandedly; temporary worker programs must not be used to create a permanent official underclass; and any reform must be designed to work and not just create another smothering bureaucracy.

Immigration remains a high-voltage issue that Congress may be too timid or distracted to touch. The new Democratic leaders, including Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi, have conspicuously not listed immigration among their most urgent priorities. Even Senator John McCain, who is an architect of the most reasonable bill out there but also has presidential primaries on his mind, spent a lot of time this fall stumping for misguided restrictionists like Mr. Graf. We hope he and his moderate colleagues have the integrity to honor their sensible immigration views now that the dismal '06 campaign is done.

Many voters who scorned Republicans over immigration reacted as you would expect them to after being mocked and exploited by a party that elevated the issue into an urgent crisis and then offered nothing to solve it but faux hearings, strident campaign ads and a pretend fence. The same fate may await any Democrats who posture, deceive and dawdle over immigration reform in the next Congress.

TAX:

IRS Advisory Committee Wants Online Auctioneers To Have To Pay Taxes (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, November 20, 2006

Attention online auction sellers: An IRS advisory committee wants you — to pay federal income taxes on your profits.

Anyone who sells goods online should first be required by law to submit a federal tax identification number, a change that would enable the IRS to track the transactions and seek any taxes owed, the committee recommended in a new report to the federal tax-collection agency. The recommendation is similar to an enforcement option raised in August by the staff of the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation.

The IRS advisory panel of tax specialists, citing the rapid growth of Americans selling via eBay, uBid and other online sites, said it's likely that "a significant number of those users either choose to ignore income reporting requirements or are unaware of their obligations."

"We're trying to help close the tax gap" between what Americans actually earn and what they report to the IRS, said committee member Rachel Paliotti, corporate tax manager for Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island.

The non-government panel's report cited IRS data that estimated non-farm sole proprietors under-report 57% of their annual income. The committee also highlighted a 2005 eBay-commissioned report by ACNielsen International Research that said more than 724,000 Americans described the top online auction site as their primary or secondary source of income.

"These kinds of transactions probably contribute to the tax gap," Paliotti said.

Although the IRS has no estimate of under-reporting specifically by online sellers, the agency estimated that unreported capital gains by all businesses totaled $11 billion for the 2001 federal tax year.

The IRS could target suspected online under-reporting by requiring Internet business sites to get tax identification numbers from all sellers, the committee recommended. Sites like eBay and uBid would use the numbers to file duplicate reports of sales transactions with the IRS.

The IRS website already features a page designed to remind online sellers that they "may have tax responsibilities." Supplementing that effort with a new income-reporting requirement would require an amendment to the tax code, Kevin Brown, head of the IRS Small Business/Self-Employed Division, told the committee. He said the IRS would forward the recommendation to the Treasury Department.

Hani Durzy, an eBay spokesman, declined to say how the firm might respond if Washington enacted an income-reporting requirement aimed at online sellers. However, he said, "We've always encouraged our sellers to comply with the law, whatever the law might be."

DOJ_NMG_0096239

Time For Tax Reform (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

TWENTY YEARS have passed since President Reagan signed the landmark Tax Reform Act of 1986, a bipartisan effort to simplify the egregiously complex federal tax code. Since then, Washington has taken about 15,000 steps backward — enacting an average of 750 new or modified exemptions, deductions and other wrinkles to tax law every year. The code not only grew more burdensome, it became less efficient, more likely to distort markets and more prone to evasion. The latter is a huge problem, as seen in the estimated $350-billion tax gap — the difference between what taxpayers should be paying the feds each year and what the Internal Revenue Service collects.

In short, it's time for Congress to take another stab at a major rewrite of the tax code that eliminates most of the preferences and loopholes. By broadening the tax base — in other words, requiring more corporate and personal income to be taxed — lawmakers can lower rates without reducing the total amount collected by the IRS.

A blue-ribbon advisory panel led by former Sens. Connie Mack (R-Fla.) and John Breaux (D-La.) last year called for this kind of approach, floating a proposal to reduce the number of individual tax breaks and to vastly simplify the recordkeeping done by businesses. Although there are some differences on the details, the concept's backers include both conservatives and liberals. Two Democrats — Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon and Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois — have introduced bills that would simplify and flatten federal taxes even more drastically.

In the coming year, the new Democratic majority will have an unusually strong incentive to work with Republicans on fundamental tax reform. More than five dozen tax breaks passed in President Bush's first term are set to expire over the next four years, while the number of filers subject to the dreaded alternative minimum tax will mushroom from 4 million in 2006 to 22 million in 2007. If Democrats don't act, they risk being pilloried for raising taxes. A revenue-neutral measure that dramatically simplified the tax code would effectively change the subject.

The tax code should be about raising money to finance the federal government's operations. Lawmakers should eliminate all but the most vital and effective tax breaks and tailor those as precisely as possible to the goal they want to achieve. For example, if the goal is to make homeownership affordable, why extend the break only to taxpayers who itemize their deductions, or to those buying mansions or a vacation home?

Bush's support would be critical to the effort, but he had little to say about the advisory panel's report. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson, who is widely respected on Capitol Hill and Wall Street, needs to start championing the panel's cause while there's still time left in Bush's presidency. Tax simplification was one of the signal accomplishments of Reagan's second term; if Bush throws himself behind tax reform now, he may be able to say the same for himself.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

Rush hours

What was the huge attraction at a sold-out Warner Theatre on Thursday night that caused a double line of adoring fans to stretch all the way around the corner?

Rush Limbaugh, ladies and gentleman, or more specifically, as the bright lights of the marquee shone: "An Evening With Rush Limbaugh."

The nation's top radio broadcaster and commentator (heard locally Monday through Friday noon to 3 p.m. on WMAL-630 AM) didn't disappoint his Washington-area faithful, opening his two-hour act with a hilarious joke about an elevator encounter with a frustrated Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat. (Call us and we'll tell you the punch line.)

On Wednesday evening, Mr. Limbaugh was the dinner guest of Vice President Dick Cheney at the vice president's mansion in Northwest. The host shared a table with, among others, White House senior aide Karl Rove and Republican strategist and bookseller Mary Matalin.

And yes, that was soon-to-be-crowned House Majority Leader Nancy Pelosi that Mr. Limbaugh bumped into in the lobby of the Four Seasons Georgetown, where he stayed while in Washington. The broadcaster said it was difficult to gauge who was more horrified by the chance encounter, him or the nation's top Democrat.

In fact, Thursday's rare live appearance was bittersweet for Mr. Limbaugh, who earlier had endorsed the outspoken Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania to be Mrs. Pelosi's No. 2 man on Capitol Hill. Instead, the leadership position went to Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland.

"They don't want him in the leadership. We do," Mr. Limbaugh told his radio listeners. "We want him there, folks, we want him in the Democrat leadership because we want the Democrats to be who they are."

Thanks for my job

"To this day, I'm still impressed with his effective performance in a case called Bush v. Gore."

Or so commented Vice President Dick Cheney, on hand for this past weekend's Federalist Society national convention at the Mayflower Hotel, heaping praise on Washington lawyer and former solicitor general Theodore B. "Ted" Olson, who represented then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush before the Supreme Court in his bid to become commander in chief during the hotly contested 2000 presidential election.

All's well within

Democrats and Republicans have chosen their respective party leaders for the upcoming 110th Congress, and for at least one congressman who was unsuccessful in his bid to become Republican Conference chairman, there are no hard feelings.

"While we came up short, 91-to-100 [votes], it was a close race, and I feel good about it," Georgia Rep. Jack Kingston told Inside the Beltway after his loss to Florida Rep. Adam H. Putnam, who will have the task of directing day-to-day operations of the conference office -- the organizational vehicle for all Republicans.

"I know many people were praying, especially me -- and at this moment of defeat, I'm comforted in a great peace," he said. "As the old hymn says, 'It is well with my soul.' "

And on your right

There's one group of tour guides in Washington that always looks forward to the next political scandal -- the more outrageous and disgusting the better.

We're referring to Scandal Tours, an Inside the Beltway mainstay for 17 years. Publicist Deb Fiscella of Center Stage Marketing calls it the "tour that highlights the lowlifes."

She forwards word to Inside the Beltway that the tour has been updated to include a new Mark Foley attraction on Capitol Hill, obviously honoring the former Florida Republican congressmen who couldn't keep his fingers off his keyboard.

Other new attractions include K Street, site of recent shady lobbying activity; a Donald H. Rumsfeld departure stop; and updates on the general lame-duck mayhem at the White House.

And if you think from those new attractions that the tour guides (all actors from Gross National Product) are picking on the Republicans, think again. The guides are proud to be "equal-opportunity offenders," confident "new majority rules scandals will be added as Washington moves into an era of Democratic control in Congress."

Scandal Tours is gearing up for the holidays, with tours taking place Saturdays at 1 p.m. starting Nov. 25, departing from the Warehouse Theater at 1021 Seventh Street NW. Reservations are required through the Gross National Product box office at 202/783-7212.

Hoyer Claims No 'Bad Blood' With Pelosi (AP-Y)

By Hope Yen

AP, November 20, 2006

Rep. Steny Hoyer acknowledged Sunday he was seeking assurances from incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi that she would not retaliate against his supporters after he won the No. 2 House leadership post.

Hoyer, D-Md., insisted there was "no bad blood" with Pelosi after she publicly supported Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania for the job of majority leader. Hoyer said he was confident Pelosi would not punish House colleagues who voted 149-86 last week to make Hoyer the majority leader when Democrats take control in January.

"We're going to talk about that," said Hoyer, when asked whether Pelosi had made promises not to retaliate by denying choice committee assignments. "One of the reasons it's going to not happen is that there are a lot of them."

"It's one thing ... if you have a margin of one or two or five or even 10, but when you have a margin as decisively as the caucus made a decision, then it's time to move on," Hoyer said.

Last week, Democrats chose Hoyer — who has long had a difficult relationship with Pelosi, D-Calif., — after unanimously backing her as the first female speaker.

On Sunday, Hoyer sought to play down any personal differences or ill will, noting that the two have worked together in the House Democratic leadership for many years.

"The American public have just given us a big mandate for change and taken the country in a new direction," he said. "Nancy and I share that obligation together. That's our objective and we're going to work very closely to accomplish that."

Former GOP Speaker Newt Gingrich called Pelosi's decision to support Murtha a "mistake" but said Republicans should not underestimate her.

DOJ_NMG_0096241

"Republicans, instead of chortling about ... the fact that she backed Murtha rather than Hoyer ... need to start by saying, you know, if she has these weaknesses, how come she's going to be speaker? She won," Gingrich said.

"She did make a mistake with Murtha," he added. "I think if she appoints Alcee Hastings to be the head of intelligence, that will be a further mistake in the direction of making her far too left-wing and far too insensitive."

Pelosi has not said whom she would appoint to lead the House Intelligence Committee. Hastings, D-Fla., and Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, are considered front-runners to take over in what has been considered a snub to the current senior Democrat on the panel, Rep. Jane Harman of California.

Pelosi has told Harman she will not be reappointed to the committee after her position expires at year's end. Hastings, the next senior Democrat on the committee, is a former federal judge who was charged in an FBI bribery sting but was acquitted by a federal jury. Later, he was impeached by the House and removed from the bench in 1989 by the Senate.

Rep. James Clyburn, D-S.C., who was elected to the No. 3 House post as majority whip, said, "I very well would support him if that's what Nancy would like to happen."

Gingrich said the main challenge for incoming House Minority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and other Republican leaders is to focus on regaining control of the House in 2008 rather than being the "White House's floor leader."

"They are very different jobs," Gingrich said, citing the danger for Bush in the final two years of his presidency to get caught up on "legacy concerns" rather than working for the broader interests of the Republican Party.

"The House Republicans have a different institutional challenge. How do they reach out in very closely contested districts, recruit the candidates, build the record, create the excitement and the energy to regain a majority?" Gingrich added.

Separately, Rep. Charles Rangel said tax increases are not on the Democratic agenda. But he said there are some taxes that "we Democrats and hopefully some of the new Republicans would like to see more targeted to the working class and to the middle-class people."

Rangel, incoming chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, declined to say whether he would support a 100 percent deduction for college tuition up to $3,000 a year.

"The problem is that, if you're talking about credits and you're talking about tax reform, it's inconsistent," said Rangel, D-N.Y.

Hoyer appeared on ABC's "This Week," Gingrich spoke on "Fox News Sunday," Rangel was on CBS' "Face the Nation," and Clyburn was on "Late Edition" on CNN.

Democrats Set Out To Heal Divisions (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Newly elected House Democratic leaders vowed to quickly reunify their Caucus in the wake of a bitter leadership contest last week, but offered few details and left some rank-and-file Members questioning how the party will mend its divisions as it prepares to take control of the chamber in the 110th Congress.

“We've had our debates. We've had our disagreements in that room, but now that is over,” Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Thursday following a closed-door meeting at which Democrats elected Rep. Steny Hoyer (Md.) to be Majority Leader, defeating Pelosi’s close ally and preferred candidate, Rep. John Murtha (Pa.).

But at least a few Democratic lawmakers remained angry Thursday over allegedly heavy-handed tactics employed by Murtha supporters in the contest, and others publicly suggested that House leaders could have a difficult time alleviating any lingering bruises.

“I think the Caucus is fractured,” Rep. Allen Boyd (Fla.), who will be a co-chairman of the Democratic Blue Dog Coalition in the 110th Congress, said Thursday, adding, Pelosi’s “biggest challenge is figuring out how to wrap her arms around all the Caucus.”

Several Members, however, asserted that with the election completed Democrats will focus on readying their legislative agenda, rather than dwell on differences. “We just want to move forward,” said Rep. Elijah Cummings (Md.), who endorsed Hoyer in the race.

“The majority of us in the Caucus didn’t see this as a battle between Steny and Nancy,” said Rep. Mike Ross (Ark.), another incoming Blue Dog co-chairman. “By the time we get back on Dec. 4, you’ll see a reunited Democratic Party.”

One Democratic lawmaker, who requested not to be identified, evaluated the outcome of the election by stating that the Speaker-in-waiting “has more egg on her face than a broken arm.” But the Democrat added that to return the Caucus to unity, Pelosi must exert as much effort privately as she has pledged in public.

“If people want to continue this, then we’ll know. ... Nancy will set the tone,” the lawmaker said.

DOJ_NMG_0096242

At least one House Democrat who backed Murtha in the contest, Rep. Jim Moran (Va.), had alluded Thursday to the possibility that lawmakers who had pledged support to Murtha privately but cast their ballots otherwise could face retribution when committee assignments are distributed.

"It remains to be seen whether all their wishes for committee assignments will be fulfilled," Moran said, referring to the freshman Democratic lawmakers, nearly two-thirds of which are believed to have supported Hoyer in the race by some estimates.

But while top Democrats on nine House committees endorsed Hoyer's bid, Rep. Kendrick Meek (D-Fla.), who had endorsed Murtha, said he expects those Members will shore up Pelosi's leadership when they hold the gavels next year.

"Many of the ... to-be-chairpersons are going to make sure she's a strong Speaker," he said Thursday, adding of any lingering animosity: "It doesn't continue ... We continue to move forward."

The House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, led by Rep. Rosa DeLauro (Conn.), is expected to establish its membership for the 110th Congress in coming weeks, and will begin work in December on the selection of committee chairmen, as well as panel assignments for rank-and-file Members.

After losing his bid for elected leadership, Murtha is expected to chair the Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, which controls a significant portion of federal spending, and perhaps more significantly will allow him to to continue in his role as the Democrats' point man in opposition to the Iraq War.

"I was proud to support him for Majority Leader because I thought that would be the best way to bring an end to the war in Iraq," Pelosi said Thursday. "I know that he will continue to take the lead on that issue for our Caucus, for this Congress, for our country."

In the aftermath of the election, Hoyer went on to offer his support to the California lawmaker.

"Our Caucus is unified today," Hoyer said. "I intend to do everything in my power to make Nancy Pelosi the most successful Speaker in the history of the House of Representatives."

A Pelosi spokesman said Friday that the Speaker-designate was not slated to formally meet with the new leadership team — also made up of Majority Whip James Clyburn (S.C.), Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) and Caucus Vice Chairman John Larson (Conn.) — before departing to her San Francisco district for the Thanksgiving holiday next week, although he added that Democrats would likely have casual discussions before returning for the Dec. 4 lame-duck session.

In addition, Pelosi is expected to appoint a new DCCC chairman in the near future, filling the remaining Democratic leadership position. There were no indications Friday when the Speaker-designate would make her selection, but previous chairmen have been tapped late in December or in early January.

Several current DCCC lieutenants are considered likely candidates for the post, including Reps. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), Debbie Wasserman Schultz (Fla.), Artur Davis (Ala.) and Mike Thompson (Calif.), who is a close Pelosi ally.

In the meantime, Clyburn said he plans to establish his Whip team for the new Congress, and said Thursday that he would consult with the new leadership team on potential deputies. While he said he will consider the seven current Chief Deputy Whips, the South Carolina lawmaker said he has decided on at least one new addition, Rep. G.K. Butterfield (N.C.).

Did Nancy Pelosi Get The Message? (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty, Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, November 27, 2006

There's only one thing dumber in politics than picking a fight when you don't have to; it's picking one when you can't win. That's why pretty much everyone in Washington is mystified by Nancy Pelosi. Through a midterm-election campaign in which Republicans had tried to caricature her as a fuzzy-headed and dangerous San Francisco liberal, she succeeded in keeping the focus on them. And the first woman Speaker-to-be was pitch-perfect in the euphoric days that followed the Democrats' big win. She said the right things, and she did the right things, like quietly reshuffling her ranks to avoid a showdown between Rahm Emanuel, the campaign-committee chief who delivered her majority, and James Clyburn, a senior member of the black caucus. Even the arrival of her sixth grandchild seemed auspiciously timed to remind everyone of her motherly side. Yet before many Democrats across the country had even taken down their yard signs, Pelosi decided to step on her own coronation by turning what would otherwise have been an all-but-ignored secret ballot for majority leader into a gang war. Instead of quietly accepting that her rival Steny Hoyer would continue to be her second in command, she threw herself into a fierce and ultimately unsuccessful campaign for John Murtha, an old friend whose ethics didn't seem to match Pelosi's talk of a new day in Congress.

All that raised a lot of new questions about Pelosi herself--about her judgment, her political instincts and her real ideology. Was her endorsement of longtime ally John Murtha over Hoyer a testament to her loyalty or proof that she is incapable of letting go of old grudges? Was putting her muscle behind the hero of the party's antiwar wing a sign that she would steer her fractious and fragile coalition over the guardrails on the left? Did her support for a man who is notorious for slipping special-interest earmarks into spending bills prove that she didn't really mean all that talk about cleaning up Congress? In other words, was Nancy Pelosi really up to the job?

DOJ_NMG_0096243

THE FALLOUT

Pelosi will have to answer those questions with her actions in the months ahead. "It was a serious misstep and inexplicable to me," former Republican leader Dick Armey chortled. "I just hope she does more of it." But the Murtha defeat will be largely forgotten if the Democrats under Pelosi's leadership rack up a series of victories on the agenda that she had laid out for her first 100 hours as Speaker, which includes raising the minimum wage, forcing Medicare to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices, cutting student-loan rates and making the national-security fixes recommended by the 9/11 commission. Then there is the biggest issue of all, now that the Democrats are partners in governing and not just critics: charting a course on Iraq. Hoyer insists the phased withdrawal he supports is not all that different from the exit strategy that Murtha and Pelosi are pushing, but his victory tells Pelosi her caucus members will not tolerate her getting too far ahead of them.

Pelosi may now have to reconsider how she plans to deal with another rival, fellow California Congresswoman Jane Harman. Pelosi has already made it clear that she does not want to give Harman the top job on the Intelligence Committee when the party formally takes over in January. Harman, whose qualifications no one doubts, says she was promised it by earlier Democratic leaders; Pelosi says her term is up. But by shutting out Harman, Pelosi would be setting another trap for herself. The next in line after Harman is Florida's Alcee Hastings, who in 1989 was impeached and removed from his federal judgeship by Congress over allegations that he had conspired to take a $150,000 bribe (charges of which he was acquitted in court). If Pelosi passes him over, she is certain to infuriate the Congressional Black Caucus, with whom her relations are already strained.

The new Speaker will also be under more pressure to push through lobbying and ethics reform but may find that harder to accomplish. After an election in which exit polls showed that voters are more concerned about corruption than the Iraq war, Pelosi needs to recover the high ground she lost with her endorsement of Murtha, who said he thought her reform measures were "total crap." It was bad enough that Murtha's candidacy turned the cable-news networks into a film festival of the grainy tapes from the Abscam sting in 1980, in which the Pennsylvania Congressman told an agent posing as an Arab sheik that he couldn't be bribed "at this point." But on ethics reforms or any other tough issues that lawmakers like to publicly support and privately fight, Pelosi might now lack the backroom clout needed to get results. "When key votes like the budget come around, this will make it a lot harder for her to pressure members," said a Democratic Congressman who backed Hoyer over Murtha. "It's going to be a lot harder for that pressure to be as meaningful."

THE FIGHT CLUB

Speaker of the House is one of the most treacherous jobs in Washington. Tip O'Neill was the last one to leave the big chair voluntarily, nearly 20 years ago. The four who have followed him have been ousted. Pelosi may have taken a different path to power than her predecessors--she was 47 and had raised five children before she ran for office the first time--but by rising rapidly in an institution where getting ahead has always meant waiting in line for your turn, she ensured that she would have a large target on her back. Now the qualities and impulses that fueled her rise--making bold moves, keeping and settling scores, trusting only a small circle of loyalists--could be disastrous in a new role that is all about building alliances that can get you to 218 votes.

To adapt, she will have to understand that today's opponent could be tomorrow's ally. Few in Congress have such a memory for slights and betrayals. She still bristles at the fact that when she first went to Washington, many in the Democratic establishment didn't take her seriously and opposed her march up the leadership. As she told TIME earlier this year, "They couldn't control me, so they tried to take me down." When her former House colleague Martin Frost was running to head the Democratic National Committee after the 2004 elections, she lobbied against him with a determination that all sides attributed to Frost's challenging her for Democratic leader two years before. Asked about those conflicts, Pelosi refused to discuss them specifically but said, "Anybody who's ever dealt with me knows not to mess with me."

And yet she is capable of bringing people back into her fold. When Frost's wife, a retired Army major general, was buried in September, he was touched that Pelosi interrupted her frantic campaign schedule to attend the service at Arlington National Cemetery and then walked more than a mile behind the caisson and riderless horse that took Kathryn Frost to her grave. Afterward, Pelosi asked Frost to visit her in her office. She appreciated the work he was doing to help Democratic candidates, she told him, and added that if the party won the House, she would be turning to him for more. "She could not have been more gracious," Frost says. "I was very appreciative. Whatever she needs me to do, I will do."

Still, pulling together is not something Democrats do well--even in victory. As the Pelosi-Hoyer-Murtha battle was heating up, Democratic consultant James Carville and pollster Stan Greenberg--both of whom are close to the Clintons--loudly called on Howard Dean to resign as Democratic chairman, saying the party could have won more House seats if he had spent its money more wisely. Liberal bloggers were slamming Emanuel, head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, saying he was taking credit for their victories. And the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of the most conservative House Democrats, was mounting a rear-guard campaign to save Harman's post at the Intelligence Committee. Savoring a team victory, it seems, is something the party has yet to get the hang of.

DOJ_NMG_0096244

THE BALTIMORE EFFECT

Even as Democrats scratched their heads over Pelosi's judgment last week, they knew where it was coming from. "This isn't San Francisco," said a former Democratic-leadership aide. "This is Baltimore." The latter is where Pelosi grew up and where she got her first lessons in politics, from the best teacher anyone could want. When Nancy D'Alesandro was a child, her father used to collect yellow sheets of paper that were stacked and stapled together at the end of each week. They were called the "favor file." That was the way Baltimore's legendary Mayor Thomas D'Alesandro Jr.--later known as "Big Tommy," to distinguish him from his namesake son who also became mayor--kept track of who had been given a job or some other benevolence. The record always came in handy at election time. From the age of 13, his only daughter Nancy took charge of the desk in their home on Albemarle Street, where people came to tell their stories and ask for help.

Knowing that also explains why the lefty caricature that Republicans paint of Pelosi has never quite stuck. Hers is not the loopy liberalism of San Francisco, where you can be branded as a right-wing extremist if you vote, as Pelosi once did, for cracking down on rave parties. The politicians in her family were progressives of a rougher cut, rooted in the Depression and the New Deal and in doing things for desperate people who turned to the government when there was nothing else for them to do.

You also didn't last long in big-city machine politics if you buckled at the first sign of a fight. When Big Tommy once threatened to fire striking garbage workers, Jimmy Hoffa himself sent an emissary to tell the mayor he wasn't happy. As D'Alesandro's former press secretary Tom J. O'Donnell recounted the story to the Washington Post, "The mayor spoke up and said, 'You go back and tell Mr. Jimmy I'm very unhappy with the garbage piling up on the streets of Baltimore, and I'm not going to stand for it.'" The following Monday, most of the garbagemen were back at work.

That fighting philosophy has defined Pelosi's leadership style as well. Her predecessor Dick Gephardt was known as "Ironbutt" for the hours he spent sitting and wheedling his colleagues. "Gephardt would plead with people to do the right thing, and they would know that there was no penalty for it," recalls a veteran senior aide on Capitol Hill. Not Pelosi. "Once you cross her," he says, "your life is not going to be very pleasant."

The Speaker-to-be puts it in more graphic terms. At lunch with a group of TIME correspondents a few months ago, she said Republican attacks on her would not work, because she wouldn't let them. "If people are ripping your face off," she said, picking at a chicken salad dressed only with lemon wedges, "you have to rip their face off."

THE ROAD AHEAD

It was not entirely clear that Pelosi would ever make the family business anything more than a hobby. After graduating from an all-girls Roman Catholic college in Washington, she married Paul Pelosi, whom she met at summer school at Georgetown University and who would eventually make a fortune in investment banking and real estate. They moved first to New York City and then to San Francisco. Pelosi had five children in six years. Between diapers and laundry, she raised money for Democrats and ultimately became the state-party chairwoman.

But it turns out she was compiling a favor file of her own. Not only was she a prodigious fund raiser in a state that functions as a political ATM for Democratic candidates across the country, but she also helped bring the national convention to her city in 1984. In 1987 she decided to run for the seat left vacant by the death of Sala Burton, the widow of Phillip Burton, who had run his own storied political machine. One of Sala's final acts was to give her endorsement to Nancy Pelosi.

In 2001 Pelosi made her first move toward the leadership with a bid for the No. 2 job, which pitted her against Hoyer. As it happens, the two had interned in the office of Senator Daniel Brewster of Maryland in 1963. That experience also introduced Pelosi to the different opportunities that Capitol Hill offered men and women. Hoyer "worked directly for me and helped me with a number of different projects," recalled Brewster, 83, in an interview last week with Capital News Service. Pelosi was a receptionist--or, as Brewster put it, "an excellent front person."

That first whip race intensified her rivalry with Hoyer and also cemented her bond with Murtha, who managed her campaign. Not only did he get her the votes to win that job but his support also made it possible for other old bulls in the House to begin to imagine a woman rising to the top. The former Marine had a reputation for male chauvinism that stood out even in an institution where the only private rest room adjacent to the chamber is for men. (Women members have to go around the corner and through a reception area to use a facility in Pelosi's office suite.) Murtha's backing "was the answer to sexism in the place," says an aide to Pelosi. "If he didn't have any problem with a woman in leadership, no one else would either."

But Pelosi has also found a way to make her gender a weapon in political combat. She was one of the loudest voices demanding an investigation into what G.O.P. leaders knew of the sexually explicit instant messages that Congressman Mark Foley, who has since resigned, was sending to congressional pages. While Republicans booed her on the House floor, Pelosi insisted "as a mother and a grandmother" on putting the question to a recorded vote.

DOJ_NMG_0096245

She won that round over the Republicans, but that victory and all the others will be forgotten unless she can regain control over her own caucus. She didn't just politely suggest that people vote for Murtha; she fought hard. Her lieutenants plied the House with phone calls and none-too-subtle threats, including suggestions that anyone who bucked her might lose committee assignments. After Hoyer still drubbed Murtha by a vote of 149-86, Pelosi emerged from the ballot room and pronounced Hoyer's win "a stunning victory." By the look on her face, she meant it. Pelosi went to Hoyer's party that night but retreated afterward to the downtown- Washington restaurant Tosca with a dozen or so of her closest allies. They entertained one another with stories about an old rivalry between Phil Burton and Texas Congressman--ultimately Speaker-- Jim Wright that had divided the Democrats decades ago. Pelosi seemed cheerful and relaxed--anything but war weary. It was a reminder of something else that is true about Capitol Hill: what really matters in a fight is whether you're standing at the end of it.

Fineman: Can Speaker Pelosi Hold Dems Together? (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

George Miller was reared in the liberal Democratic Party of Northern California—not the fancy Nob Hill kind, but the fiery kind bred in the docks, shipyards and canneries of the East Bay. His father was state party chairman and taught his son to distrust Big Money and to "go to work like you're killing snakes." Elected to Congress in 1974 at the age of 29—in the wave of Democrats sent to Washington by Watergate and Vietnam—Miller is now the Man of the House: the closest ally of and adviser to the already-embattled speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco. "It sounds corny," he told me, "but I was taught that you acquire power for one reason: to help the seriously disenfranchised."

Ellen Tauscher was reared in business. Her dad was a grocer in New Jersey, and after college she went to Wall Street, where she became one of the first women with a seat on the New York Stock Exchange. In 1989, she migrated to an upscale East Bay suburb. Elected to Congress in 1996—in a district next to Miller's—she now chairs the centrist New Democrat Coalition. Her politics lean toward tax cuts and free trade, but she has a productive working relationship with Pelosi, the proudly quintessential San Francisco liberal. "Nancy and I come from different places," Tauscher says. "But we put our big-girl pants on every day and go to work."

Two fault lines appear on Bay Area maps of Planet Pelosi: the geological San Andreas and the Democratic Miller-Tauscher. The Speaker's task (and, by extension, her party's) is to avoid an intramural earthquake. "This isn't just about the next two years," says Rep. Ed Markey of Massachusetts. "We have to show we are a governing majority."

First comes the relatively easy part, at least in the House. Republican-style "values" issues aren't a problem. While it is true that most of the new wave of "new" Democrats are from suburban or even rural districts, there is no new Democratic Bible Belt in Congress. Virtually all Democrats and Democratic candidates (including Miller and Tauscher) backed Pelosi's carefully drawn initial agenda: to raise the minimum wage, to trim interest on college loans, to use tax money for stem-cell research and to allow Medicare to negotiate bulk purchases of drugs.

But the tectonic plates move in dangerous ways when the topics are taxes, trade, torts and terrorism. Miller voted against reducing the federal tax code's "marriage penalty"; Tauscher was for it. He was against liberalizing trade with China; she was for it. He was against limiting awards in lawsuits; she was for it.

Then there is terrorism—and Iraq. Tauscher, with her lower Manhattan ties and her swing district (which includes two of the government's most important defense-research labs), voted to authorize the war in Iraq and is wary of the consequences of a too-hasty exit. To Miller, the war is an unsalvageable blunder. Com-ing of age in antiwar San Francisco, his view is framed by Vietnam. He voted against authorizing the invasion. He admires Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania for having come forward last year to denounce it. "Everyone discounted the criticisms of people like me because we were the 'antiwar crowd'," Miller says. "Jack gave the Democratic Party a place to stand."

Miller backed Pelosi's decision to try to reward Murtha by making him majority leader. Tauscher organized her coalition allies on behalf of the man who trounced Murtha, Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland. It was an embarrassing strategic debut for the Speaker-to-be. Not an earthquake, to be sure, but a tremor that may be worth remembering.

GOP Keeps Team, Promises Changes (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Despite efforts by a small band of House Republicans last week to convince their colleagues that a change in leadership was important, if not critical, to winning back a majority in 2008, the House Republican Conference overwhelmingly sided with the status quo Friday and handed landslide victories to Minority Leader-elect John Boehner (Ohio) and Minority Whip-elect Roy Blunt (Mo.).

DOJ_NMG_0096246

Both leaders recast themselves in their campaigns and argued they would be agents for change in the 110th Congress, committing to return the Republican Party to its roots of fiscal conservatism and reform and to battle the new Democratic majority tooth and nail.

"We are going to work as a team and we are going to earn our way back into our majority," Boehner told reporters after his victory, stressing the need "to fight for a smaller, less costly and more accountable federal government." Boehner defeated Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, in a landslide 168-27 vote. One vote was cast for Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (Texas), who withdrew from the race Wednesday.

Similarly Blunt was candid about the need to shakeup the party agenda. "Frankly, [we need] to get rid of the bad habits that we may have developed in the 12 years in the majority," he said. "It's not our job to defend business as usual, it's not our job to try to define the federal government in the biggest possible way, we need to do the right things. Our Conference is ready to do that." Blunt soundly defeated Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) 137-57, with one Member abstaining.

Speculation brewed all last week that some combination of Members would attempt to nominate Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) for the Whip job, or write in his name on the ballot, but there was no mischief during Friday's leadership elections. The Conference also ruled the day before elections that write-in ballots would not be tallied in final vote counts. Blunt will maintain Cantor as his Chief Deputy Whip.

While the top elected leaders invoked the 1994 spirit that swept in a Republican House majority that year, Friday's elections were a significant defeat for prominent conservatives Pence and Shadegg. Pence has been a darling of the outside conservative establishment — much of which endorsed his leadership candidacy — and Shadegg is also a former RSC chairman and a member of the 1994 class.

Rep. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) contended that his colleagues did not heed the call from voters on Election Day for reform within the party. "We haven't hit the first stage, we're still in denial," Flake, a Pence ally, told reporters. "When you're here you kind of drink your own bath water," he said, a reference to a supposed inside-the-Beltway mentality.

Flake's comments were seen as particularly critical of Blunt, who is the longest serving member of the current leadership team. Flake said it might be "doubly difficult" to convince voters the party got the message to change the way it does business.

There were few surprises in any of the downballot leadership races, with the exception of the four-way race for Republican Conference chairman. GOP Reps. Adam Putnam (Fla.) and Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.) were widely seen as the frontrunners against Reps. Dan Lungren (Calif.) and Jack Kingston (Ga.).

However, Blackburn secured an unimpressive 31 votes on the first ballot, with 29 votes for Lungren. Blackburn received 30 votes on the second ballot and was removed per Conference rules, leading to a showdown between Putnam and Kingston. Putnam bested Kingston, the current Conference vice chairman, in an unexpectedly close 100-91 vote. "I have no regrets, it was a good campaign," Kingston told supporters in an e-mail following his defeat.

Blackburn spent the better part of the year laying the groundwork for her campaign, including frequent radio and TV appearances. One Member contended that Blackburn's eagerness could have also led to her demise. "Marsha worked really hard, but there was just this perception that Marsha was in it for Marsha, and not for the team," said one Republican who asked not to be named.

"I will continue doing my best to support our leadership and support our Party's principles," Blackburn said in a statement following her defeat.

Texas is back at the leadership table as well, with the election of Texas GOP Reps. Kay Granger and John Carter to Conference vice chairwoman and Conference secretary, respectively. Granger beat Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) 124-63 and is the only woman on the leadership team. Carter was unopposed and was approved by voice vote.

Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (Mich.) soundly defeated Rep. Darrell Issa (Calif.), 132-63, for Republican Policy Committee chairman.

The first test of the new leadership team will be in the coming weeks as it transitions into the minority. The internal Conference rules and the makeup of the GOP Steering Committee, which determines committee ranking members and rank-and-file assignments, will have to be reconfigured as they are largely written for majority status.

For instance, the current 28-member Steering Committee provides for a weighted voting system, with five votes granted to the Speaker, two to the Majority Leader and one for the remaining 26 members.

Minus a Speaker, it remains to be seen how many votes the Minority Leader and Minority Whip will be granted. Regional representation on the Steering Committee may also be shifted to account for the geographic loss of Members.

Republicans also will have to clarify an internal Conference rule regarding how many years a Member can serve as chairman or ranking member of a committee to try to fend off potential turf wars.

Currently, chairmen are term-limited to six years, but some Members have made the argument that the rule is unclear and should allow for six years as chairman, and six years as ranking member.

DOJ_NMG_0096247

Transportation and Infrastructure Chairman Don Young (Alaska) and Judiciary Chairman Jim Sensenbrenner (Wis.) are term-limited, but both are expected to try to claim rights to the ranking memberships on their committees due to their interpretation of the rule.

Additionally, GOP leadership sources have suggested that Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (Calif.), who is under federal investigation, may not be able to hold on to the ranking member slot when it comes before Steering. When asked Friday if he expected to serve as the ranking member in the 110th Congress, Lewis deferred. “That is a pay grade that’s different than mine,” he said.

Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.) is expected to get the ranking slot on the House Ways and Means Committee. McCrery is a close Boehner ally and gave a nominating speech for Boehner during elections last Friday.

As leader, Boehner will have sole decision-making power over who will head up a handful of committees, including Rules, House Administration, Intelligence and ethics.

According to knowledgeable GOP sources, Rules Chairman David Dreier (Calif.) is expected to remain as ranking member as the exclusive committee is not subject to term limits.

Similarly, Intelligence Chairman Pete Hoekstra (Mich.), a public Boehner supporter, is also expected to remain. Ethics Chairman Doc Hastings (Wash.), who currently is investigating the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and his interaction with underage male House pages, is expected to remain on the panel if asked.

Also Friday, the incoming Republican freshman Members held class elections. Rep.-elect Bill Sali (Idaho) is class president, Rep.-elect Doug Lamborn (Colo.) will serve as the representative to leadership, Rep.-elect Adrian Smith (Neb.) will serve as representative to the Policy Committee, and Rep.-elect Kevin McCarthy (Calif.) will serve as the freshman representative on the Steering Committee.

Leadership Lessons (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

November 20, 2006; Page A16

House Democrats and Republicans elected their leaders for the next Congress last week, and the results suggest there's a reason Democrats will have the majority. They seem to have absorbed the election's lessons better than the GOP.

Rank-and-file Democrats ignored Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi's endorsement of Pennsylvania's John Murtha as majority leader and instead voted to keep Maryland's Steny Hoyer as their second in command. The vote was a rout, 149 to 86, despite not-so-veiled leadership threats about committee assignments for those who favored Mr. Hoyer. In rejecting the ethically challenged Mr. Murtha, Democrats showed good judgment and a desire to set a higher ethical tone than have the Tom DeLay Republicans.

Despite their recent defeat, however, Republicans also easily re-elected their top two leaders in the face of challenges from younger conservatives. Ohio's John Boehner, the new minority leader, had only taken over from Mr. DeLay in January and so he could fairly dodge some responsibility for this month's debacle. On the other hand, Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri was a key part of Team DeLay, in addition to being a vocal defender of spending earmarks and pork-barrel incumbent protection.

House Republicans are talking a good game of recovering their small-government principles, but their leadership choices suggest they think their defeat had little to do with their own image or performance. Instead -- and we also hear these whispers privately -- they blame everything on President Bush and Iraq. Mr. Blunt is said to have impressed the Members with a plan to defeat freshman Democrats in 2008; so much for self-reflection and new ideas.

The Revival Of Trent Lott (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, November 27, 2006

Hello, Mr. President. This is Lazarus speaking." That is how Trent Lott answered a phone call last week from George W. Bush, the man who helped force him out of the Senate's top job in 2002 after Lott praised Strom Thurmond's 1948 segregationist presidential campaign. Maybe Lott is selling himself short. After all, Lazarus was in the tomb for only four days, but it took Lott, 65, four years to mount the improbable comeback that culminated in his election last Wednesday as minority whip, the second most powerful G.O.P. position in the Senate. But if Bush, who called from Air Force One en route to Singapore, was spooked by the Mississippi Senator's resurrection, he did his best to hide it. Lott says Bush laughed off the Lazarus analogy and said, "Well, we're looking forward to working with you."

Why would Senate Republicans choose the controversial Lott after an electoral drubbing that saw them lose, among other things, the hard-fought progress they had made with nonwhite voters, especially African Americans? And why pick someone who is known to have an ax to grind with the White House at a time when the party should regroup and unify?

DOJ_NMG_0096248

The answer is that Lott won (by one vote over Tennessee's Lamar Alexander) because he spent the past four years quietly making himself as useful as possible to his colleagues. He lent his old strengths as a backroom dealmaker and a master of arcane Senate rules to sometimes thankless tasks. He not only won back allies that way, but he also sharpened the exact skills that his party will need for the next two years, when its main goal will be to stop Democratic bills from seeing the light of day, let alone the President's desk. As the whip--a position named after the switch-wielding valet at fox hunts who keeps the hounds in line--Lott will keep his party disciplined and frustrate the Democrats with amendments and filibusters. "He understands the rules. He's a strong negotiator," says New Hampshire's Senator John Sununu. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich says he's "the smartest legislative politician I've ever met." Even Senator Ted Kennedy calls him a "worthy opponent."

And smooth relations with the Bush White House aren't the priority they used to be. In the upcoming Congress, with every Republican Senator seemingly running for re-election or for President, proof of one's independence from the White House will be an asset, not a liability, especially if Bush's approval ratings remain mired in the mid-30s. As he was campaigning for the whip job, Lott says, he told his colleagues that when it came to White House pressure, "there's nothing they can do to me or for me that they haven't already done. I'm not mad, but I am a little bit of a liberated guy these days."

The Democrats are the ones who should fear Lott the most: they are desperate to pass bills that will show voters they can govern. That might explain why some of them are already trying to reach across the aisle to him. While Mel Watt of the House Congressional Black Caucus released a statement after Lott's election saying, "The sting of Trent Lott's hurtful words are unlikely to expire anytime soon," Barack Obama, the freshman Senator from Illinois, seemed not to carry a grudge as he left the Senate floor the day after Lott's victory. "[Lott] obviously paid a price and comes back a little bit wiser, as all of us hopefully do after a mistake," Obama said.

The White House is doing its best to mend fences too. Vice President Dick Cheney, an old hunting buddy of Lott's from their days together in the House, called him soon after the Senate vote. And as I was interviewing Lott late last Thursday evening, Rob Portman, the White House director of Management and Budget, patiently waited until I finished so that he could tell me how great he thought Lott was. "He's very effective," Portman said. "He's a skilled tactician and strategist. A rare combination of unparalleled experience."

By then Lott had moved back to the floor of the Senate, where he was working the room, accepting one congratulatory handshake after another for his return to power. When one well wisher added his compliments to the chorus, Lott beamed at him and called out in his trademark baritone, "Hey, hey! I can still count votes!"

'Gang Of 14' Mulls Script For Next Act (RC)

By Emily Pierce And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Having successfully averted what could have been an explosive partisan showdown over judges in the Senate last year, Senators in the "Gang of 14" believe they have attained a relevancy that will allow them to play an even more prominent role in the 110th Congress — not just on judicial nominations but on other issues as well.

Though their original mission vanishes at the end of this year, Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) said she expects that a broader role for the holdover gang members, and perhaps other like-minded Senators, likely will develop in the coming weeks.

It will be "somewhat formal, it will be regular and it will be real," she said.

"The 12 of us still remaining [in the Senate] will have that discussion sometime soon to see what the mood is. There have been many individual and group meetings about how to advance a civil and productive agenda."

Landrieu said that while the details haven't been worked out, she expects that several of the gang's Democratic Senators, and perhaps more, will participate. On the Republican side, the Louisiana Democrat said, Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) is helping lead efforts to engage the gang's GOP Senators and other moderates.

Other Gang of 14 members, echoing Landrieu, said that now, more than ever, they have a part to play in helping negotiate agreements and advance legislation around which both parties can agree.

This possible re-emergence of the gang comes even though the group saw two key GOP players — Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) — go down in defeat on Nov. 7.

Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), who led the group along with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), said the gang would be useful in instances "where the leadership can't get together," such as "issues that otherwise get snagged or require 60 votes" to overcome a filibuster.

It was the filibuster of 10 judges that prompted the gang's genesis. With a majority of Democrats blocking judges during the 108th Congress and again in the spring of 2005, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) came close to invoking the "nuclear" option, in which he would demand a ruling from the chairman that filibustering judges is unconstitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0096249

Frist would have needed only 51 votes to ratify that ruling, rather than the 60 needed to break a filibuster, and such a maneuver would have eviscerated the ability of the Senate minority to block objectionable judicial nominees for years to come.

Then the Gang of 14 — seven Republicans and seven Democrats — emerged, pledging to oppose filibusters of judges except in "extraordinary circumstances," in exchange for all of them voting against the nuclear option — enough to rule out the maneuver.

Because of the bipartisan deal, Frist never brought up the nuclear option for a vote; several controversial judges were voted through, while Democrats could continue to block other nominees, the gang agreed.

Though he supported the nuclear option at the time, Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said, "In retrospect, I have to admit they served a useful purpose in diffusing a stalemate. ... Looking back, the outcome was positive."

Cornyn said he could envision the remaining members — Nelson, McCain, Landrieu and Collins, plus Sens. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), Olympia Snowe (R-Maine), John Warner (R-Va.), Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) and Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii) — playing a similar role in upcoming judicial and policy battles.

"Those Senators could very well serve a useful function," Cornyn said.

Graham acknowledged that the most recent Senate fight over judicial nominations almost certainly is a chapter for the history books. But he said the group has not lost sight of its guiding philosophy, saying, "The idea of maintaining a functioning Senate and not destroying the judiciary will always have resonance and viability."

"It could spill into other areas after we've lived through that experience," he said. "We get along very well on a variety of issues, not just judges."

Salazar said that he, too, believes the original gang members can remain integral players going forward. He pointed to issues such as immigration reform, where a centrist-oriented group worked behind the scenes to try to broker a Senate deal earlier this year.

Salazar said he's hopeful that gang members "will have a reason to come up with an agenda" in the next Congress.

Nelson agreed, saying that one option may be for the gang to devise a compromise budget next year.

And even with pledges by President Bush and incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to renew efforts at bipartisanship, gang members suggested that there will be a need for them to step in. In fact, the future balance of power may make the gang even more essential than before to helping broker compromise, Senators said.

"With a Republican president and a Democratic Congress, there will have to be bridge builders," Landrieu said. "We're not about compromising our principles. We're just trying to find common ground."

Pryor agreed, but added that he believes the extreme partisanship that has characterized the past few years would be less common with Reid at the helm.

"I don't think you're going to see as many politically charged issues that come through" the Senate, he said.

On judicial nominations, Senators in the gang said they still could be relevant, but likely less so, given that the dynamics will be radically changed in the 110th Congress.

Republicans won't have the 51 votes they'd need to institute the nuclear option and force votes on nominees. What's more, Reid will have the power to stop any nomination — not just judges — from coming to the Senate floor. Plus, incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) can simply refuse to schedule committee hearings and votes.

Cornyn acknowledged that his party would have a "tougher" time pushing judicial nominations this year.

"It's not like an amendment that we can offer to a bill," he said. "We've got to get them out of committee."

Nelson acknowledged that the gang would have less sway over judicial nominations, because "I don't see the Gang of 14 working to get a name brought up. By the same token, there are other steps that could be taken. Something could be done informally, rather than formally."

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the newly elected Minority Whip for the next Congress, helped form the Gang of 14 before dropping out in deference to Frist. Lott said he foresees instances in which gang members could influence whether a judicial nomination is brought up, simply by stating whether they believe a nominee meets the filibuster test they agreed to.

In any case, he said, the spirit of the Gang of 14 most definitely will live on: "It's the kind of thinking and cooperation that we've got to do a little more of."

Compromised (WSJ)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

During the recent off-year elections, the president repeatedly pointed to the booming economy and noted that his tax cuts were responsible. With growth strong and unemployment low despite the ending of the stock-market bubble, terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq, he had every reason to be proud. Moreover, both economic theory and the actual timing of the economic revival support his claims regarding the tax cuts.

DOJ_NMG_0096250

That is why it is so odd that rumors swarm around Washington that the president may be willing to raise taxes as part of a "deal" on entitlement reform. In particular, the rumors suggest the president might be willing to get rid of the provision that caps the income level used to compute Social Security taxes and benefits. These rumors aren't without substance; last year the president would not rule out raising the cap when asked.

Doing so would raise the marginal tax rate on the entrepreneurs that Mr. Bush credits for having led the economic recovery by more than 10 percentage points. The new effective rate would be five percentage points above the level when he took office. Moreover, in 2011, the rate would go up a further 4.3 percentage points to an effective 53% marginal rate on entrepreneurial income. The president would thus be not just raising taxes on entrepreneurs to well above the levels that prevailed in the Clinton administration, but to a rate higher than that which prevailed in the Carter administration. Most of the improved incentives for entrepreneurship and work brought about under Reagan would be repealed.

Should the president do this, he doubtless would be thinking that saving Social Security would be worth the price. He would be wrong. In practice this idea would both destroy the basis on which Social Security was started and fail to produce the expected revenue that supposedly would save the system. Social Security was set up as a contributory pension plan, not a welfare scheme. Benefits are linked, by statutory formula, to contributions. Congress and the president could choose to maintain this relationship. Traditional supporters of Social Security like AARP have long insisted on this link and argued against turning the program into another welfare plan by ending the linkage between contributions and benefits.

There are two problems with that approach. First, an increase in the cap on taxes and benefits would produce very little net revenue for the system. Even if one assumed higher taxes did not hurt the economy, the increased benefits would consume much of any increased revenue. Second, the benefits that high income people would get would be politically unsustainable. A retiree who earned a million per year would receive a monthly Social Security benefit of $13,500. This is politically unimaginable. So, expect both the universality of Social Security and the link between taxes and benefits to go, and this most enduring element of the New Deal to become a welfare program.

But it is the damage to the economy and to the fiscal system that is more important. Economists differ on how much such a dramatic increase in tax rates on entrepreneurs would damage the economy. Certainly given the statements of the president earlier this year he believes it would be significant. Consider some figures.

Published IRS data from 2004 show that taxpayers with incomes over $100,000 earned $1.9 trillion in wages, salaries, bonuses and self-employment income. Of that, roughly $800 billion was above the Social Security maximum tax threshold. Levying the 12.4% Social Security tax on that income would produce $99 billion in revenue. Of that, employers and the self-employed would be able to deduct half of that tax from their corporate or personal tax returns. Thus, $17.4 billion of the $99 billion would not be a net gain to the Treasury, but a transfer from the general fund to the Social Security trust fund. So the net gain to the government would have been about $82 billion in 2004.

That assumes that taxpayers would not have changed their behavior when their marginal tax rate rose to 48.6% from 38.4%. No one believes that, although economists do disagree on how much. These are a very sophisticated group of taxpayers with both the knowledge and the means to adjust to taxation by changing the form of business, converting income to capital gains, or other methods. A cautious estimate that enjoys wide acceptance in the tax community says that for every 1% reduction in the share of their income they take home, high income individuals cut their taxable earnings by four-tenths of a percent. My own research from the Reagan tax cuts indicates the response by this group is higher, roughly seven-tenths of 1%.

Although these numbers may seem small, when they are applied to a massive tax rate increase like this, they can have important ramifications. Remember, taxpayers will be seeing the share of income they keep dropping from roughly 61 cents on the dollar to just 51 cents -- and that is before state taxes are figured in. This implies a decline in the tax base of between 7% and 13%.

Under the lower assumption, total federal revenues would only increase by $27 billion, with the behavioral response of taxpayers offsetting 70% of the static revenue increase. True, Social Security tax revenues would still rise by $82 billion, but this would be offset by a net decline in personal income taxes of $55 billion. Under the higher assumption about a behavioral response, total federal revenues would decline. While Social Security taxes would rise by $69 billion, personal income taxes would drop by $95 billion.

Whatever one's assumption, lifting the Social Security tax cap would have to be viewed as an economically and fiscally risky proposition. I seriously doubt that the president would be interested in agreeing to a deal that purports to "save Social Security" when the reality is that it seriously undermines the economic and fiscal basis that underpins the system.

There is another argument that the president will have heard that might persuade him to do what the rumors say he is considering: fairness. It is true that high income earners do not pay Social Security taxes on all of their earnings. As already noted, it is also true that they do not receive benefits on those earnings. So, if you think that Social Security should be a welfare program with benefits unlinked to contributions, then in a sense this may be unfair.

DOJ_NMG_0096251

But, consider the total tax system. An urban myth has arisen that the so-called "rich" do not pay their "fair share" of taxes despite the fact that the top 10% of taxpayers pay 68% of federal income taxes in the country. A comparison between a relatively high-income entrepreneur, of which I am one, and a "typical" worker might be illustrative.

Last year an entrepreneur similar to me would have paid federal taxes equal to 33.9% of total income. That is, income before any exemptions, exclusions, adjustments or deductions. By this measure all of the fringe benefits that an entrepreneur provides himself as a self-employed individual are included in income. His federal income taxes and the employer and employee shares of his Social Security taxes are all counted as "taxes."

For comparison, consider a married worker earning a salary of $75,000, who like our entrepreneur, has three children. To compute his total income on the same basis, I gave him the same level of benefits as an average worker and the same level of capital income as others making his income. I also followed convention to impute to him both his own Social Security taxes and all of those paid by his employer. On that basis, his average tax rate was 14.5%.

Based on a 40-hour week, while he finishes paying his Federal taxes on Monday afternoon at 2:48, our entrepreneur will work all day Monday until about the same time on Tuesday until he finishes, another full day. If the plan to eliminate the cap on Social Security earnings is adopted, he will work all day Monday, all day Tuesday, and then Wednesday morning until 10:26 to finish paying his federal taxes. Then he can start paying his state taxes.

That assumes he keeps working as hard as he is and doesn't rearrange his income to take more fringe benefits or shelter it in other ways. This suggests another way to think about just how risky this plan is. Using those 2004 figures cited above, all it would take would be for one of these workers in ten to decide it wasn't worth it to work until 10:30 Wednesday morning just to pay Uncle Sam and this plan the president is reportedly considering would actually cost government tax revenue. Don't make it too tough on him, or Atlas may actually decide to shrug.

Mr. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group, was President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Picking Up Where Ron Brown Left Off

One was a snazzy dresser, a major African-American force who thrived on the Washington social circuit. The other is a buttoneddown white Vermonter, an excitable but nerdy med school kind of guy. But there's something about the similarities between the late Democratic National Committee Chairman Ron Brown and current DNC boss, Howard Dean, that has folks talking--even Dean. "My model is Ron Brown," he says flatly. Don't laugh. Sure, their personalities and styles are radically different, but party insiders and friends of both say Dean has attacked his job of reforming the party just as Brown did--with similarly winning results.

Some examples: Both entered the job as outsiders under fire from moderates who worried that they were too liberal. Both surprised the establishment by raising tons of money. Both took a shattered party and built a national organization geared to winning a presidential election. "He was incredibly inclusive, and he was an outsider, of course," Dean says," so I identify with him that way." And both focused on the key Democratic demographic-- blacks. Brown brought African-Americans to the table. Dean, who's studied Tracey Brown's bio of her dad, wants more: putting more blacks on the ballot. "It's going to be about opportunities and a place on the ticket," says Dean. "Ron Brown was really the beginning of that."

Why Not Impeach Bush? Dick Cheney

The degree to which the new Democratic leadership on Capitol Hill despises Vice President Dick Cheney is a big plus for President Bush. Consider why incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid scrapped an idea to impeach Bush: "Two words: Dick Cheney," he says, joking that it would vault the veep into the Oval Office.

Globe-trotting to Iraq Hot Spots

The troops in Iraq are about to get their hoops fix, thanks to the storied Harlem Globetrotters. The team of roundball magicians departs November 25, visiting Iraq as part of a 21-day trip to 12 bases in the Middle East. And, yes, owner Mannie Jackson and his 10 stars will return in time for the 193-city U.S.-Canada "Nothing Like It" tour opening December 26.

These Marines Forgive and Forget

It was party time for Sen. John Kerry's staff and alumni from his 2004 presidential campaign last week at the Democrat's favorite Capitol Hill hangout across from the U.S. Marine Corps Barracks and HQ when a group of marines approached him. But they didn't scold him for recently suggesting that the military attracts mediocre students. Instead, they yukked it up and even bought the vet a shot of tequila--which he downed.

DOJ_NMG_0096252

Score One for the Airport Ziploc Rule

Kip Hawley is a rarity among federal execs: He relishes the chance to experience their own onerous security rules. While traveling, the head of the Transportation Security Administration has been looking to see if the new rule requiring that small amounts of liquids be put in zip-top bags is a good one. With stops in St. Louis, Orlando, and even Brussels, he finds it A-OK. "It's great to see [our screeners] doing such a top-notch job," says Hawley.

MSNBC, CNN Hop Democratic Wave

There's lots of buzz in the cable TV world that having Democrats running Congress will hurt Fox and help MSNBC and CNN. It certainly looked like that election night when CNN won the key viewership demographic of 25-to-54-year-olds. "We're clearly the place to go for information," CNN boss Jon Klein tells us. "Maybe the trick is that you have to actually cover politics. The public seems to be in the mood for facts and information-- not cheerleading." MSNBC, No. 3 but surging, also crowed: "MSNBC is the place for politics." So what about Fox? It simply turned to the numbers. And they show that Fox is still No. 1, with its audience growing. "We'll let the two cable news alsorans battle for second place, and we wish Jon and [MSNBC] well on their quest for relevancy," says an amused Foxie.

From Red Meat to Haute Couture

The conservative American Enterprise Institute has scrapped its magazine and replaced it with a new glossy, The American. Unlike the think tank's old political rag, the jazzy new one is all business and economics, six times per year. "Our perspective," says editor James Glassman, "is not partisan, but it is rooted in liberal, free-market economics." There are no editorials and foreign-policy manifestos. Instead, Reaganite Michael Ledeen writes about why Naples became the center of men's high fashion. It's an old model: The lively conservative American Spectator tried the same thing before finally switching back to politics.

The Ragin' Cajun, Frothing Over '08

Worse Than the White House Press

Former President Clinton is probably rethinking just how tough his White House press corps actually was. His office tells us that after he spoke in Mexico last week, reporters blocked his motorcade, then kicked and punched his security agents, prompting one to draw his weapon and order them out of the way. Clinton was fine. So what was the problema? Clinton's Jay Carson says, "Who knows?"

With Bernadine Healy M.D., Silla Brush and Angie C. Marek

Paulson Set To Address US Market Rules (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

Hank Paulson, the US Treasury secretary, will on Monday say what the US needs to do to ensure that its markets remain globally competitive in a landmark speech on capital market regulation.

The move comes amid growing concern in the US that New York is losing out to emerging financial centres in Asia and to London, with its lighter-touch, principles-based regulatory regime.

It is also a sign that the concerns on Wall Street about the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate compliance and controls laws have moved higher up the agenda in Washington since the arrival at the Treasury three months ago of the former Goldman Sachs chief executive.

Senior figures, including Dick Cheney, the vice-president, have said that Sarbox may have gone too far.

But there is increasing recognition that the issue goes well beyond Sarbox, encompassing the entire US regulatory and legal landscape, particularly the proliferation of class-action lawsuits, liability issues and overlapping securities regulations.

Mr Paulson is understood to be aware of the need for a re-examination of US regulation in the light of international competition, cross-border merger of equity and derivatives exchanges and competition between public and private enforcement efforts, which have led to over-zealous corporate litigation.

One senior official said Mr Paulson's arrival at the Treasury had helped "tie a lot of these things together and helped structure a response" in Washington at the President's Working Group of Financial Markets, composed of the heads of the Federal Reserve, Treasury, Securities and Exchange Commission and Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

"I expect the secretary will address an array of issues that impact our capital markets – ranging from our corporate governance requirements to our legal system," said Rob Nichols, president of the Financial Services Forum, a lobby group that represents the chief executives of financial companies.

Policymakers see a need to update the regulatory architecture in the US in the light of rapid innovation, which is blurring the distinction between traditionally separate asset classes.

DOJ_NMG_0096253

A growing number of executives think the US could learn some lessons from regulatory practice in the UK and elsewhere, where a “principles-based” regulation takes a more flexible approach to accounting and market oversight than a “rules-based” system in place since the 1930s in the US.

John Thain, New York Stock Exchange CEO, recently warned that the US needed to “rebalance” its regulatory framework.

Paulson's Stance: Review U.S. Rules Hindering Markets (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, in a speech scheduled for delivery to the Economic Club of New York today, will press the case for a re-examination of government rules and laws he believes are putting U.S. financial markets at a disadvantage amid competition from abroad.

Mr. Paulson, in his first major public comments since Democrats won control of Congress, is expected to stress the need for "regulatory balance" and to outline challenges regulators and policy makers face as they try to juggle the need for regulation with the imperative to make U.S. markets competitive.

He isn't expected to call for any new laws or for repeal of any rules, but Mr. Paulson will emphasize the impact of existing regulations, the legal environment, and the complexity of dealing with multiple, overlapping regulators. He likely will call on federal regulators to tweak a provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, known as Section 404, that requires companies to assess internal controls to ensure financial reporting is accurate and reliable. The Securities and Exchange Commission has said it plans to address that by the end of the year.

Mr. Paulson's speech comes amid a chorus of complaints by business that the regulatory and legal climate in the U.S. puts companies at a disadvantage, driving some firms overseas. Business leaders say the cost of doing business in the U.S. has increased, pointing to the Sarbanes-Oxley law passed in the wake of corporate scandals, class-action lawsuits, and a crackdown by state and federal law enforcement.

Many investor and consumer advocates argue that U.S. capital markets remain the most competitive in the world and regulation has helped attract capital by offering protections.

Since leaving Goldman Sachs Group Inc. to take the reins at Treasury, Mr. Paulson has identified market competitiveness as a domestic priority and backed a private-sector effort to recommend changes to laws and rules that critics say handicap U.S. companies.

The Match Maker How A U.S. Official Promotes Marriage To Help Poor Kids (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

The notion that government can help children escape poverty by promoting marriage for their parents was once considered a fringe idea from right field. It is now federal policy.

In very large part, that's due to Wade Horn, a child psychologist turned bureaucrat who has put marriage atop the Bush administration's limited antipoverty agenda.

As head of the federal Administration for Children and Families, Dr. Horn has employed the zeal of an ideologue and the discipline of an academic to inject marriage promotion into a host of government programs under his purview, even before Congress authorized an official marriage program. Today, more than 200 programs are at work across the country, seeking to change public attitudes surrounding marriage, persuade teenagers to aspire to matrimony and teach relationship skills to young couples.

Along the way, Dr. Horn has co-opted critics, fine-tuned his rhetoric, and persuaded Congress to insert his marriage agenda into this year's welfare legislation, winning $500 million over five years. A host of grants were doled out last month, to organizations ranging from large coalitions of social-services groups to antiabortion pregnancy-counseling centers that plan relationship classes for teens.

"Wade Horn has shown the influence a bureaucrat can have," says Ronald Haskins, a welfare expert who has worked for Congress and the current President Bush's White House. "Anything that wasn't nailed down over there is now devoted to marriage."

Not everyone is persuaded. Women's groups say his emphasis on marriage unfairly demonizes unwed mothers, and pressures women to stay in sometimes unhealthy, violent relationships. Libertarians say government has no business using tax dollars to probe so deeply into people's personal lives. Some note that there's no proof yet that any of these efforts can work. Others say the money would be better spent elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0096254

The idea that poverty is, in significant measure, the result of broken families and unwed mothers has been contentious since Daniel Patrick Moynihan's controversial 1965 warning that the disintegrating black family was an obstacle to black advancement. In that year, 8% of children were born to unmarried parents. Today, more than one-third of all children -- and nearly 70% of black children -- are.

Study after study show children are better off in two-parent homes. They are less likely to be poor, drop out of school, become teen parents or get arrested. The theory: Two parents bring stability and emotional support to children and one another, not to mention providing two incomes. But can government do anything to actually promote marriage? And should it? 3

Dr. Horn offers an emphatic yes, and saw proof on a recent evening in Baltimore where he observed six couples participating in a federally funded effort called Building Strong Families. The program, being tried in seven cities, hosts weekly discussions for unmarried couples who have recently had or are about to have a baby. It doesn't specifically push couples to marry, but the curriculum sets out marriage as the ideal. Group leaders regularly mention marriage. Posters on the wall proclaim "Marriage Works."

On that evening, Myckel Cobbs, age 24, talked about how trust and openness come hard to him. But since meeting his girlfriend, Tashanna Harvey, 21, and joining the Baltimore program, things seemed different. "I came up on the streets, no family," he explained, glancing at Ms. Harvey, nearly nine months pregnant with their child. Now, "this is my family, with her."

On the drive back to Washington, Dr. Horn was still thinking about Mr. Cobbs's fatherless childhood. "Here they are, this young couple, trying to break that cycle. It takes a lot of courage," he said. "If this works, the real impact will be on their kids."

Six years into the Bush administration, Dr. Horn is one of the few remaining political appointees interested in "compassionate conservatism," the slogan from the President's first campaign. Mr. Haskins, now with the Brookings Institution, advised the White House on welfare for only a year. Political-science professor John DiIulio launched the White House's faith-based initiative to direct federal dollars to religious charities, but left after less than a year.

Dr. Horn endured in the Department of Health and Human Services, using his position to push the theory that families with married parents can pave the path out of poverty.

Even before Congress authorized the marriage program in the welfare bill, Dr. Horn began using discretionary funds from his Administration for Children and Families to inject marriage promotion into the agency's programs -- ranging from refugee assistance to aid for Indian tribes to child-support enforcement. The efforts included marriage-awareness campaigns and couples classes. Over its first four years, his patchwork of spending added up to a $200 million program, which Dr. Horn dubbed the Healthy Marriage Initiative.

Dr. Horn didn't always succeed. He failed to get similar marriage-promotion efforts into Head Start, the preschool program, in the face of opposition. "We've never had parents request that," says Sarah Green, president of the National Head Start Association. "Most of them want help in how to get out of marriages that are not healthy." Dr. Horn says he dropped his marriage proposal in order to focus on other Head Start priorities.

Dr. Horn, 51, grew up in New Jersey, one of seven children of a liberal mother and conservative father. Over dinner, they would disagree about Vietnam, Watergate and abortion, he says, yet "no one remembers my parents leaving the table mad at each other."

He earned a doctorate in child psychology at Southern Illinois University and went into practice. He and his wife, Claudia, and their two daughters, moved to Washington in 1986 because Claudia, now a consultant, was promoted to be the associate rehabilitation director at the national headquarters of Goodwill Industries.

'OUR MOST VITAL SOCIAL INSTITUTION'

Read excerpts4 from Wade Horn's speeches, writings and statements to the press from over the past 10 years.

During his years as a therapist, he got interested in the importance of marriage. A divorcing couple asked if he would work with their child to "be sure the child was not impacted by divorce in any way," he recalls. "It was so cavalier. I won't go along with the idea that it is perfectly OK to assume divorce will have no impact on children."

He helped write policy papers for the first President Bush's 1988 presidential campaign and afterward landed the post of HHS commissioner for children, youth and families at age 34.

In 1989, the president appointed him to a commission on children, chaired by Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D., W.Va.). Dr. Horn successfully pushed to have the final report include rhetoric condemning divorce and out-of-wedlock childbearing as bad for children. The White House, fearing Sen. Rockefeller might challenge Mr. Bush for president in 1992, leaned heavily on Dr. Horn to vote against the final report. But Dr. Horn thought Sen. Rockefeller had accommodated his concerns and voted yes. The report was approved unanimously.

After President Bush's 1992 loss left him without a job, Dr. Horn joined the burgeoning fatherhood movement, launching the private National Fatherhood Initiative, which promotes the notion that fathers have a special role to play that isn't always appreciated.

DOJ_NMG_0096255

During those years, Dr. Horn also began thinking about the incentives built into the welfare system that discouraged marriage, such as reducing government benefits for women who got married. Social workers were known to hunt through homes and cut women off welfare if there was a man present. It was no surprise that few single moms married, he says, because the message was, "Don't do it."

BUSH SPEAKS

"As we reduce welfare case loads, we must improve the lives of children. And the most effective, direct way to improve the lives of children is to encourage the stability of American families."

Read the full text5 of the February 2002 speech at the White House Web site.

Then in a 1997 paper published by the Hudson Institute, a conservative think tank, Dr. Horn proposed reversing these incentives for programs such as public housing. "Only after all income-eligible, married, two-parent families are offered the benefit should it become available for income-eligible, single-parent families," he wrote.

After President Bush took office in 2001, he nominated Dr. Horn for an assistant secretary's post at HHS, but 90 groups opposed his confirmation, citing the 1997 paper and complaining his policies would keep women trapped in violent, unhealthy relationships out of fear of losing benefits.

In the hearings, Dr. Horn renounced his earlier comments, saying he was now convinced that preference for married people in social services could translate into discrimination against single moms. Sen. Rockefeller vouched for him and he was easily confirmed.

A key assignment for Dr. Horn was to help develop the Bush administration's proposal for renewing the 1996 welfare law. He pushed to include funding for marriage promotion, despite some reluctance from his boss, HHS Secretary Tommy Thompson. "It wasn't my first priority," Mr. Thompson acknowledges, but says he came to see the political advantages. "The religious right certainly found this a plus and we could find more supporters" for the legislation.

As the job of hashing out welfare reauthorization shifted to Congress, Dr. Horn worked to mollify his critics. He directed that every program work with local domestic-violence experts. And he agreed to hire a domestic-violence expert as part of the national program team.

"One of the smartest things I did," Dr. Horn says, "was put the word 'healthy' in front of 'marriage.'" Every speech and handout on the initiative now uses that phrase.

He also was careful to steer clear of religious overtones. Dr. Horn is religious and active in his Presbyterian church. But he avoids using religious arguments to make the case for marriage.

Dr. Horn put Diann Dawson, a 27-year HHS veteran and an African-American, in charge of outreach to the black community. And, to woo welfare experts and academics eager to attack the program as ideological and unsupported by research, Dr. Horn incorporated evaluation requirements into many early programs and recruited prominent researchers in the field to study them. "He co-opted the whole damn academic world," Mr. Haskins, the onetime White House aide, says admiringly.

He still faced opponents. In Congress, the most vocal was Sen. Max Baucus, the top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, who reflected Montana's libertarian leanings. Marriage is a "personal and private choice, not something the government should interfere with," he told a Washington rally on the welfare bill in March 2002.

To help negotiate the welfare legislation, Sen. Baucus in 2004 hired Kate Kahan, now 32, a single mother and former welfare-rights organizer. Pregnant at 18, Ms. Kahan had married the father, then left him after a year and a half because she says he was violent. She and Sen. Baucus knew that the welfare bill inevitably was going to include a marriage program, but she fought for explicit protections: a promise that the domestic-violence experts hired would be experienced and qualified, and guarantees the programs would be voluntary. Dr. Horn, insulted that anyone would question his commitment to protecting women, pushed back.

WHAT QUALIFIES

Eight types of activities may be funded under the Bush administration's "Healthy Marriage Initiative." · Public advertising campaigns on the value of marriage and the skills needed to increase marital stability and health.

· Education in high schools on the value of marriage, relationship skills and budgeting.

· Marriage education, marriage skills and relationship skills programs that may include parenting skills, financial management, conflict resolution and job and career advancement for non-married pregnant women and non-married expectant fathers.

· Pre-marital education and marriage skills training for engaged couples and for couples or persons interested in marriage.

· Marriage enhancement and marriage skills training programs for married couples.

· Divorce reduction programs that teach relationship skills.

· Marriage mentoring programs, which use married couples as role models and mentors in at-risk communities.

DOJ_NMG_0096256

· Programs to reduce the disincentives to marriage in means-tested aid programs if offered in conjunction with any of the other seven activities.

See a list of programs6 that were awarded money in the most recent round of funding.

Source: Department of Health and Human Services' Administration for Children and Families

The tension came to a head at a meeting during negotiations aimed at writing a bipartisan bill. Ms. Kahan was surprised to find Dr. Horn there. By her account, he began by asking what Sen. Baucus had against marriage. Ms. Kahan shot back that the senator is not against marriage but had more questions than answers about government promoting it. In any case, she said, poverty is complex and isn't going to be solved with marriage classes. Frustrated by her repeated insistence on that point, Dr. Horn threatened to walk out of the room, according to two people in the meeting.

After that, the two couldn't be in the same room, those involved in the talks say, and a Republican Senate staffer says she resorted to "shuttle diplomacy."

Dr. Horn says that characterization overstates the tension. But he allows that he sometimes aggravates his opponents. "There are times when I may push a little bit harder than other people may feel comfortable," Dr. Horn says, adding that he doesn't recall the specific debates with Ms. Kahan. A Republican staffer who participated in the talks confirmed Ms. Kahan's account.

When the welfare bill finally passed Congress early this year, there was $500 million for marriage promotion -- minus the specific guarantees Ms. Kahan had fought for.

Among the programs that received the recent round of grants from HHS last month, some are religious groups, though the recipients say they won't use the federal money to promote religion. For instance, the Meier Clinics Foundation of Wheaton, Ill., which won $2 million, is a Christian counseling group whose Web site gives marriage tips starting with: "Sincerely commit your life to Jesus Christ as Lord." The group plans to conduct relationship classes for teens.

Other recipients are secular organizations, such as the National Multiple Sclerosis Society, which plans to spend $531,000 on marriage education for couples where one spouse is struggling with MS.

Although the newly funded programs are just beginning, previously funded programs are being studied to see how well they work. Research suggests marriage education works for middle-class white families; the new studies will see if it works with poor, nonwhite couples.

In the Building Strong Families program in Baltimore, couples are randomly assigned either to join the program, or to receive no services but be contacted later for follow-up. Researchers will study the relationships -- including how many pairs marry -- and the couples' children.

On the night Dr. Horn visited Baltimore, he spoke to the young couples, without using the word marriage. "There's not a couple that doesn't have problems. It's work," he said. "But it's really worth it when you look at your kids."

Disputed Fla. Race Could Go To House (RC)

By John Mcardle And Matthew Murray

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

With five House races around the country still unresolved as of Friday, election watchers on Capitol Hill believe it is increasingly likely that the contest for the open Florida 13th district seat could end up before the House Administration Committee, which has oversight over federal elections.

Florida's 13th district, where bank executive Christine Jennings (D) and auto dealer Vern Buchanan (R) are competing for the right to replace Rep. Katherine Harris (R) — who, as Florida secretary of state in 2000, was a major player in the disputed presidential election — remains the only district where both Democratic and Republican House Administration Committee staff continue to have observers on the ground. Those observers act as the committee's eyes and ears to monitor the recount and certification process if it appears there is a chance that the race might be contested.

But just as the election itself is under dispute — Buchanan was leading Jennings by 401 votes as of Friday at press time — the process for determining who decides on the winner also could be controversial, with the House about to switch hands from the Republicans to the Democrats.

Florida state election officials are slated to certify the election results Monday morning. But the contest has been marred by allegations of voting irregularities in Sarasota County.

Democrats claim electronic voting machines are to blame for almost 19,000 missing votes in the Jennings-Buchanan contest.

But while Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, concedes that there was a high number of "undervotes" in the Jennings-Buchanan race, he said, "there is no evidence to suggest that anyone in district 13 who wanted to vote was unable to do so."

DOJ_NMG_0096257

Patru added that all of the recounts in the race have produced the same result — Buchanan winning narrowly.

"The automated recount and subsequent manual recounts, it's like a skipping CD — you just keep hearing 'Vern Buchanan won,'" he said. "It's a matter of time before Christine Jennings concedes."

Nevertheless, Florida elections officials are about to proceed with an audit of the equipment used in the 13th district elections. By today, Buchanan's campaign must appoint a representative to the state panel that will be conducting the audit.

A source close to Buchanan said the campaign was in the process of "acquiring" an expert to represent the campaign in the audit. Barring any developments over the weekend, the audit could be the only recourse for Jennings. Then she'd have to decide whether to take her challenge of the election results to the House.

If the audit "is done in a fair way and it's an open process, that's where we might start to get some answers," said David Kochman, a Jennings campaign spokesman.

Candidates have 30 days after a race is certified by state officials to officially contest their race with the House Administration Committee. Once an election is contested, the committee appoints a panel of two majority members and one minority member to head up its investigation.

Along with a report on the investigation, the committee also is charged with coming up with a recommendation for what action should be taken. That recommendation is voted on by the full panel and sent to the House floor for consideration just like any other bill that is reported out of a committee.

Because the Democrats do not take control of the House until Jan. 3, it is likely that any investigation by House Administration would be launched while Republicans are still in charge — meaning the GOP will have the 2-1 majority on the investigating committee. But by the time the full House would be asked to seat the new Member, the Democrats would be in the majority.

Over the years, House Administration usually has recommended to dismiss contests after undertaking its reviews, but some elections have been closer than others.

In late November 1996 the Orange Country (Calif.) Registrar of Voters certified that Loretta Sanchez (D) had beaten the incumbent, Rep. Bob Dornan (R), by 984 votes. But Dornan filed a notice of contest in late December alleging voting irregularities such as noncitizens being allowed to cast ballots.

A task force under the Republican-led House reviewed the case and documented evidence that 748 votes were indeed invalid. But the total was not enough to give the seat to Dornan, and the committee recommended that the challenge be dismissed in February 1997.

But while the House Administration Committee is charged with investigating any challenges, the House of Representatives as a whole is responsible for seating its own membership, and while Sanchez was allowed to take her seat despite the challenge of her election in 1996, it its not unprecedented for neither candidate to be seated until a contested election is resolved.

Perhaps the most notable example in recent years is the infamous 1984 race between the late Democratic Rep. Frank McCloskey and Republican Richard McIntyre in Indiana's 8th district where it took until the following May to swear in a Member for that seat.

In that race, McCloskey was declared the winner by a mere 72 votes, but a recount by the Republican secretary of state gave McIntyre the victory by 34 votes. In February of the following year, with the Democratic-led House unwilling to seat McIntyre, the House Administration Committee organized a task force to investigate the election — one of only four times in the past 60 years where the House initiated its own investigation without an official contest.

The task force found the state's recount procedure to be unreliable and, with the assistance of the General Accounting Office (which since has been renamed the Government Accountability Office), a recount was undertaken of the previous November's votes. In the end, McCloskey was granted a four-vote margin of victory and was seated on May 1.

Meanwhile, the races have not been called in North Carolina's 8th district, New Mexico's 1st district, and Ohio's 2nd and 15th districts. Republican incumbents are leading narrowly in all four races.

Two House races — one in Texas, the other in Louisiana — will be decided in December runoffs.

A Shutdown At The Favor Factory (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

While House Republicans reacted to stinging rejection from America's voters by refusing to change leadership, their Senate counterparts have tried to use their closing weeks in power to enact a last burst of pork-barrel spending. But that effort was stalled last week by independent-minded Republican senators, spearheaded by two abrasive freshmen and one longtime hair shirt. Before Congress recessed Friday for Thanksgiving, the GOP leadership appeared to capitulate.

DOJ_NMG_0096258

The freshmen, Tom Coburn and Jim DeMint, campaigning in 2004 in Oklahoma and South Carolina, promised not to fall in line with GOP leaders. Fulfilling that pledge allied them with the long-termer John McCain. They have been backed by Jeff Sessions of Alabama and another freshman, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire. In the lame-duck session's first week, they played Horatio at the Bridge by combining to block a pork-filled omnibus spending bill.

That would place responsibility for spending excesses on the new Democratic majority taking office next year. It is highly unlikely that Sen. Robert C. Byrd, a legendary king of pork returning as Appropriations Committee chairman, will reverse the habits of a lifetime and listen to ordinary voters' revulsion over excessive federal spending. "Voters want the earmark favor factory shut down, not turned over to new management," said Coburn. He estimates that Congress can save the taxpayers a cool $17.1 billion by passing a resolution that would continue spending at present levels rather than enacting an omnibus bill laden with earmarks.

The bipartisan dismay the dissenters have caused cannot be exaggerated. Hard-working staffers are beside themselves that their lame-duck feast of pork is being thwarted. K Street lobbyists are frustrated that they are being deprived of a vehicle for their special-interest amendments.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran wanted President Bush, in Asia on a trade mission, to phone DeMint and ask him to stop blocking the agriculture appropriations bill. It did not happen, and the Republican leaders mournfully agreed to the cost-cutting resolution. An irate House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, who has taken pride in passing his committee's bills on schedule and filled with earmarks, called the outcome an "absolute disaster and catastrophe."

Among senators wailing that their pet projects are being derailed, none has been louder than Democrat Kent Conrad, who will be Budget Committee chairman in the new Congress. A self-described fiscal conservative (because he wants tax increases), Conrad submitted 41 proposals busting the Bush budget in 2005 alone. He was so distraught last week that the agriculture money bill blocked by DeMint contained $4.9 billion in additional emergency relief that he threatened to stop any money bills from passing in the lame-duck session. He did not follow through with this program of actually closing the government.

The cornucopia that the senators want to sneak through is reflected in 40 pork-stripping amendments to the agriculture bill that Coburn was ready to introduce in the lame-duck session. His key amendments were aimed at $1.1 million for alternative salmon research in Alaska, $591,000 for the Montana Sheep Institute and $194,000 for goose control in the state of New York.

McCain has his own pork-busting list for agriculture appropriations headed by $1 million for the National Sheep Industry Improvement Center and $6 million for sugar-cane growers in Hawaii. McCain also wants to get rid of the earmarks hidden in the Appropriations Committee report on the bill. They include construction costs, not requested by the administration, of $3 million for the Animal Waste Management Research Laboratory in Bowling Green, Ky., and $2 million for the Grape Genetics Research Center in Geneva, N.Y.

The scope and irrelevancy of earmarks are reflected in another target on McCain's hit list: $200,000 for the Lincoln Park Zoo and the Davee Center for Epidemiology, both in Chicago. A stated purpose is "maintenance of health in zoo populations nationwide."

While the Senate's archaic rules can frustrate the will of the majority in passing legislation and confirming presidential nominations, they also can enable a few strong-minded senators to fight excess spending. These senators may well temporarily close what Tom Coburn calls the "favor factory" maintained by Republicans. Will the Democrats try to reopen it next year?

New Justices Take The Podium, Putting Personalities On Display (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The two newest Supreme Court justices took off the robes and took to the stump last week, providing glimpses of the fresh personalities that will reshape a court that had remained constant for more than a decade.

The settings could not have been more different. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was interviewed before a crowd of 3,000 last Monday night at the University of Miami, and his telegenic message of moderation was then broadcast to the nation on ABC's "Nightline."

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. spoke to his fellow members of the Federalist Society, a coalition of conservative lawyers and legal scholars who have gone from rebel outsiders to Washington insiders -- the group drew 1,500 people to its annual banquet and warranted appearances by administration leaders from Vice President Cheney on down.

Roberts's turn on the stage was the most complete, and it showed that his sure-footed performance in his confirmation hearings, where he left even senators opposed to his conservative philosophy aglow, was no fluke.

He has a politician's gift for appearing open while answering only the questions he wants to answer, along with an almost over-the-top humility about being, at 51, the youngest chief justice since John Marshall, and he offers a reassuring middle ground between those worried about threats to judicial independence and those alarmed by activist judges.

DOJ_NMG_0096259

He provided a little something for everyone. For the feature pages, he had a cute explanation of how his jiggling son Jack almost stole the show with his hammy performance before the cameras when President Bush introduced Roberts and his family to the nation last year: "People think Jack was dancing. He was not dancing. He was being Spiderman. He was shooting the webs off."

He gave the scholars caught up in the debate about his affection for legal minimalism a bit more to chew on: "If you're going up a list of what virtues are important when you're deciding a Supreme Court opinion, issuing an opinion, deciding a case, I have to say that I think boldness is going to be closer to the bottom and not the top."

And he showed deference to those he called the "people across the street" in Congress, who have been chosen by "hundreds of thousands of people, millions of people."

"Not a single person has voted for me, and if we don't like what the people in Congress do, we can get rid of them, and if you don't like what I do, it's kind of too bad," Roberts told ABC's Jan Crawford Greenburg, who conducted the interview at the Miami forum. "And that is, to me, an important constraint. It means that I'm not there to make a judgment based on my personal policy preferences or my political preferences."

But as important as what Robert said was how he said it. He went a bit overboard in the humility department: Yes, the rest of the justices call one another by their first names, but they call him "chief." But, he quickly added, "I think it's more a tribute to the office."

And Roberts said he still finds it a little hard to believe that the office is his, for as long as he wants it. When he passes the formal entrance to his office, he said, there's "a little brass plaque on the door that says 'The Chief Justice,' and I still kind of feel that I have to be a little quiet so I don't disturb him."

Dahlia Lithwick, the sharp-eyed legal affairs columnist for the online magazine Slate, called it Roberts's "whole sweet/funny/smart/humble thing" and wrote that the chief justice "sees that the press can be gamed to disseminate a view of judging and the judiciary, and the clarity and effectiveness of his message is indisputable."

Alito, too, drew laughs with his speech Thursday night to the Federalist Society, but there was a scratchier tone to his address. He still seems a little sore about his confirmation hearings, which were tougher than what Roberts faced.

Or maybe Alito was just playing to his audience, which has become increasingly influential in nominations to the federal bench and cheers any reference to frustrated liberal Democrats. So they loved his comment that when he gets near the Hart Senate Office Building, where he spent days last November paying courtesy calls to senators, "invariably without thinking . . . I cross to the other side of the street."

He added: "My membership in the Federalist Society did not become a major factor in my confirmation hearings. Now, I think the reason for that probably was that some senators found so many other objectionable features about my record that they could attack that they had no need."

There's reason for Alito to be a little sensitive. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) last week told the New York Observer that his party's biggest failure during the last Congress was allowing Alito to take the bench.

On the Senate campaign trail this fall, the formula that many Democratic candidates used to show they would be judicious but not recalcitrant when it came to Supreme Court nominees was that they would have voted for Roberts but not for Alito.

Whether there will be that much difference between the two men in their judicial philosophies will be played out over the years.

Both, though, had similar messages last week. Alito said that "all public servants, not just judicial officers, play a role in shaping our law, interpreting our Constitution" and that it is wrong for "any public officials to ignore questions about the bounds of their authority in our constitutional system and simply say that the courts will sort that out for them."

Roberts said nearly the same thing. "The great gift of the founding generation was the right of self-government," he said. "We shouldn't give it up so easily to think that all the important issues are going to be decided by the Supreme Court."

High-Tech Defense Office Takes Lead On Telecommuting (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The Defense Information Systems Agency describes itself as providing "global net-centric solutions" for the White House, the Pentagon and the armed forces.

In other words, it's the AOL, Google and OnStar for the Defense Department -- a crucial part of the government's national security operations.

Most of the engineers, computer scientists, telecommunication experts and technology wizards who work for DISA live in Northern Virginia and work in offices scattered through Arlington and Falls Church. Many are less than thrilled with the idea that by 2011 their jobs will be moved to Fort Meade, Md., as part of Defense Department base closures and realignments.

DOJ_NMG_0096260

"A lot of those people want to stay with DISA but not uproot family because of schools and because of where their spouses work," said Jack Penkoske, DISA's director of manpower, personnel and security.

To keep from losing experienced employees, DISA has embraced telecommuting -- a way of working that the government has been slower to accept than the private sector.

Of the about 2,000 DISA jobs that have been identified as suitable for telecommuting, more than 500 employees have been cleared to work from home.

"I think our numbers for telework will continue to grow, as we get more people comfortable with it," Penkoske said in an interview last week. "We've had a seven-fold increase in the last 10 months, probably a little more than that."

About 4,400 people -- military, civil service and contractors -- work for DISA in Northern Virginia, and more than half are civil service employees. DISA hopes that telecommuting will entice the civil service employees -- all have at least a secret clearance -- to stick with the agency.

Prior to the 2005 base-closing announcement, DISA employees could work from home one day per pay period, or every two weeks. Once it became clear that the agency would be relocated to Maryland, DISA's director, Air Force Lt. Gen. Charles E. Croom Jr., put together a new policy that permits employees to work from home two days a week.

Now, DISA employees who qualify to telework and are on a compressed work schedule (80 hours biweekly in less than 10 days) can be out of the office five of 10 work days.

"There are probably going to be more [telework] days being offered as we move down the line," Penkoske said.

DISA picks up half the cost of installing and subscribing to broadband Internet service. Employees are allowed to work on only nonclassified material while at home. The agency has ramped up purchases of laptop computers so that equipment shortages will not slow the telecommuting program.

Penkoske said officials will be paying special attention to network security and to productivity measures to ensure that employees keep up with their workloads.

Theresa Noll, a senior telework program analyst at the General Services Administration, said research has found that telecommuting programs help agencies retain workers and maintain or improve their productivity.

In contrast, she noted, "it's widely recognized in all managerial circles that when you lose employees or significant parts of your workforce, there is a break in productivity."

Although DISA anticipates that telecommuting will help it keep employees, Penkoske said that telework should also aid in recruiting the next generation of workers, who, by most accounts, are keen on employers that offer flexible work arrangements.

The agency hires about 100 recent college graduates as interns each year and spends $60,000 to $70,000 over three years to train them, an investment that the agency is not eager to lose, Penkoske said.

Terry Holzheimer, director of economic development for Arlington County, said officials are looking to partner with the federal or state government to set up a telework center for DISA employees in Crystal City as they near their 2011 deadline for moving to Fort Meade, where the military plans to build a 1 million-square-foot building for DISA.

"It is one thing to lose the jobs. We don't really want to lose the people," Holzheimer said. "Taking that many people off the Metro and disrupting their lives and commuting patterns is not good public policy."

Setting up a telework center in Crystal City would provide a workplace for DISA employees on those days they do not have to be at Fort Meade or for days when they have meetings at the Pentagon, he said.

Penkoske said DISA is looking into providing daily buses "from different places" in Northern Virginia to Fort Meade so that employees can have a mass transit option for getting to work. DISA also will help employees sell and buy homes if they decide to relocate to Maryland, he said.

Unknown, of course, is how many DISA employees will move, how many will try telecommuting, and how many will quit and take jobs with other government agencies and contractors.

What Ails The CDC (TIME)

By Christine Gorman

Time, November 27, 2006

Julie Gerberding was stillÂ a deputyÂ director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) in 2001 when someone started mailing anthrax spores to newsrooms and politicians' offices around the country. A telegenic personality who connected easily with journalists, Gerberding quickly became the public face of the CDC--a rare cool head among a parade of increasingly confused health bureaucrats. The fumbling she witnessed behind the scenes convinced her that the CDC's troubles extended beyond the need for better communications. She made her case to Tommy Thompson, then Secretary of Health and Human Services (HHS), and within a year was appointed director of the agency--the first woman to hold that job--with a mandate to radically reshape the CDC.

DOJ_NMG_0096261

Five years later, Gerberding finds herself in the public eye once again, but this time she's under attack. The massive reorganization she ordered--combined with painful budget cuts in key divisions--seems to be tearing the agency apart. Six directors of the CDC's eight primary scientific centers have left. Researchers are sniping at one another in public and on the Internet. The agency has been targeted by three different congressional probes. And a blistering report, leaked last week, by an outside consultant who studied the agency's response to Hurricane Katrina found chaos and mismanagement at the very top.

Nobody is claiming that the CDC has become another governmental basket case like FEMA--at least not yet. Indeed, the speed with which this past summer's outbreak of lethal food poisoning was traced to spinach tainted by runoff from a particular herd of cows in California is testimony to the CDC's continuing expertise. But the bad publicity comes at the worst possible time for the agency and its director. Congress is wrapping up its final budget for 2007, and the Administration is starting to draw up a preliminary budget for 2008. If lawmakers believe that Gerberding is floundering, her institution's budget will suffer.

That's the last thing the U.S. needs. As the nation's premier guardian of public health, the CDC is responsible for researching, tracking and counteracting newly emerging infectious diseases like West Nile and SARS. Doctors rely on it to develop unbiased recommendations on a wide range of medical issues from when to vaccinate children to how best to battle obesity. It also directs funds to individual state and local public agencies to shore up their own community health efforts.

Ironically, it is increased CDC funding mandated by Congress for high-profile threats like bioterrorism and flu pandemics that has drained money from areas of public health that may actually be more pressing. Among the hardest-hit programs: AIDS prevention (down 19%), tuberculosis control (down 16%) and preventive-health block grants for outbreaks of West Nile disease and other unexpected events (down 17%).

But what really troubles the most vocal critics is their sense that the CDC's devotion to pure science--a long-established mandate to follow the trail of medical evidence wherever it leads--has been sabotaged. AIDS specialists today feel that they are being constrained not to say anything positive about condoms, while others complain that more cash bonuses are being given to administrators than to researchers. "It's the policies and the direction of the institute I'm most concerned about," says Dr. Brad Woodruff, an epidemiologist in the organization's Maternal and Child Nutrition Branch. Woodruff is particularly incensed that the agency's new jet, which is supposed to be for medical emergencies, was used by HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt to make promotional appearances on behalf of President Bush's Medicare drug plan.

The centerpiece of Gerberding's reorganization was her decision to replace the agency's 11 often insular centers with four coordinating bodies that would, in theory, respond to emergencies with more agility. Closer contact between infectious-disease and environmental experts, Gerberding says, has already resulted in faster tests for detecting botulism.

But some within the agency complain that the main difference they have seen so far is that their work is more likely to be second-guessed. "Scientists feel less empowered to make decisions," says Dr. Stephen Cochi, who has worked at the CDC for 24 years, currently in the Global Immunization Division. "There's more bureaucratic filtering." Decisions that were routinely made in Atlanta, he and others say, must now be approved by higher-ups in Washington. Requests for anything but emergency travel have to be made 90 days in advance.

As in so many other internecine battles, it can be hard to tell where the whining stops and the real problems begin. The CDC was due for a major overhaul, and it's human nature--even among scientists--to resist change. What started off as hallway grumbling, however, has grown into an ugly public ruckus, thanks to an unofficial employee blog www.cdcchatter.net and a few well-directed Freedom of Information requests from the Atlanta Journal-Constitution.

Through it all, Gerberding has stood firm. "The CDC was not broken," she says. "The reason to undergo this [reorganization] is that the world was changing so dramatically." As for charges of political interference, she is unapologetic. "This is a public-health agency, and by its very nature, we're never going to satisfy every single constituency," she says candidly. "I tell [Administration officials] this is the science. This is the recommendation. What they do with it is beyond my control."

Not everybody blames Gerberding for the turmoil. "I don't think anyone denies that there's a morale problem at the CDC," says Dr. Georges Benjamin, executive director of the American Public Health Association. But he attributes much of the upheaval to government-wide belt tightening rather than to Gerberding's reorganization, noting that core programs at the CDC have been cut 4.5% in each of the past two fiscal years. He and other experts believe that the agency needs at least $15 billion a year to do all the jobs it has been assigned--nearly twice the current budget of $8.5 billion.

Perhaps the most immediate problem is the number of senior-level people who are leaving. Part of that is an unavoidable function of aging--40% of the CDC's 9,000 employees will be eligible to retire in 2008. But there's also speculation that older scientists are being pushed to leave early. Either way, "you don't replace the experts at CDC easily," says Robert Keegan, deputy director of the agency's Global Immunization Division. "Management has said they've enacted better emergency standards, but until there's an emergency, you don't know."

State and local public-health officials are keeping a close eye on all the drama. "The most difficult organization in the world to change is a successful organization [like the CDC]," says Paul Halverson of the Arkansas department of health and human services. "If you're a company that is losing money every month, then it's easy to see the need to make a change." Of course, in this case, it's not just money but lives that are at stake.

DOJ_NMG_0096262

Coin Of The Commanders In Chief (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, November 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Can George be successful where Sacagawea and Susan failed?

The U.S. Mint today is unveiling designs for its newest additions: dollar coins that will feature deceased presidents on a rotating basis, similar to the popular state quarters.

The coins will enter circulation with George Washington on Feb. 15, four days before President's Day, and will be gold in color like the Sacagawea to distinguish them from other coins. Like the Sacagawea, they will be slightly larger than the quarter.

While the presidential coins are expected to be popular with collectors, it's doubtful they will be used by consumers and businesses on a daily basis, some experts argue. Instead, with dollar bills still an easy alternative, they likely are doomed as a means of commerce, as Susan B. Anthony and Sacagawea before them, says David Sklow, a numismatic expert and former director of the library and research center at the American Numismatic Association.

“I hope it does get accepted, but I wouldn't hold my breath,” he says. “Americans do not like dollar coins, they just don't. You want to carry three or four of these around? If you are a man (and carry money in your pocket), I don't think so.”

A dollar coin hasn't widely circulated for more than 70 years, when the silver Peace Dollar was in use.

David Didriksen, owner of Willow Books & Cafe in Acton, Mass., says there's a reason for that. Dollar coins are often miscounted by customers, store clerks and banks, he says. He hopes people don't use them.

“As it is now, a typical trip to a bank involves carrying a bag of 20 or 30 pounds or more,” he says. “The last thing we need now is more coins.”

But many people, including Mint Director Edmund Moy and the lawmakers who sponsored the legislation to create the presidential dollar coins, beg to differ. They argue that the state quarter program has set the stage for acceptance and use of a dollar coin.

“We have an opportunity to build on the success of the state quarter program,” says Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H.

Greater use of dollar coins instead of bills would save the government hundreds of millions of dollars each year, even though the coins are more expensive to produce. That's mainly because coins last for about 30 years, more than 16 times longer than dollar bills.

The Federal Reserve estimated in 1995 that replacing dollar bills with coins would save $500 million a year. The savings would likely be much bigger today, because the number of $1 bills in circulation has risen 40% in the past decade. More than a third of U.S. circulating currency is dollar bills, according to the Fed.

Dollar coins “cost a lot less in the long haul,” says U.S. Treasurer Anna Escobedo Cabral, who oversees the nation's money production.

Studies, including those from the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, suggest consumers will embrace dollar coins only if dollar bills are pulled from circulation.

But the idea of replacing the dollar bill with coins has met stiff resistance from lawmakers, printing unions and paper manufacturers.

The public has also opposed eliminating $1 bills. In a USA TODAY/Gallup survey of 1,002 adults conducted Oct. 20-22, more than half said it was a “good idea” that the Mint was introducing presidential dollar coins.

But when asked their opinions on replacing dollar bills entirely, 79% said they would oppose such a move. Even when told that replacing bills with coins would save the government $500 million a year, 69% said they still opposed making such a change.

“It's just easier to carry the bills,” says retiree Ellen Barlow, 74, of Culbertson, Neb., who opposes replacing dollar bills with coins. “Five dollars of coins weighs a lot more than five dollars of bills.”

Other countries have done away with their low-denomination bills. Canada has replaced its one-dollar and two-dollar notes with coins, while in Europe, some euro coins have replaced bills.

Machine repairman Patrick Lawson, 35, of Cold Brook, N.Y., says he liked using coins for lower denominations when he was stationed in Germany in the military. It makes sense for the USA to get rid of the dollar bill and use coins instead, he says.

“People are afraid of change,” Lawson says. “If you get rid of the dollar bill and they actually start to use it, they will realize they are easy to use.”

Says Francois Velde, co-author of The Big Problem of Small Change and senior economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, “Americans are creatures of habit.”

DOJ_NMG_0096263

The last dollar coin to be introduced, featuring Sacagawea, a Native American interpreter and guide on the Lewis and Clark expedition, was largely a failure. Due to lack of demand, the Mint stopped making the Sacagaweas in 2002, a little more than two years after they were first introduced with much fanfare.

Demand has been so minimal that the Federal Reserve and the Mint as of June 30 had more than 200 million Sacagawea dollars in combined inventory, according to the Fed. That's enough to meet current demand for 31/2 years.

The Mint's Moy says that when he was nominated to be Mint director this summer, he went to five banks and asked for a Sacagawea. None had one.

The Mint spent more than $67 million to promote the Sacagawea coin from 1998 to 2001, according to the GAO. The money was used for marketing, advertising and partnerships with a variety of industries, including banking and retail. A float promoting the coins was in the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade in 1999, and they were featured on boxes of Cheerios cereal.

More than $40 million of the funds were used for a national advertising campaign starring George Washington.

The Sacagaweas are gold in color to distinguish them from other coins. That decision came after repeated complaints that the Susan B. Anthony was too similar in size and color to the quarter, creating confusion.

But despite the changes and promotions, the public did not embrace Sacagawea.

“The Mint's new dollar coin marketing program raised public awareness of the new coin but did not produce long-tem increases in circulation,” a 2002 GAO report said.

Instead, people had trouble finding the coins after the initial flurry, when they were handed out as change at Wal-Mart. Banks stopped ordering them, and they largely faded from view.

But supporters of the new dollar coins say this time, it's different.

That's because the new coins will rotate, introducing four new presidential dollars each year, starting in 2007. Plus, for the first time in more than 70 years, the coins will feature writing on the edge of the coin rather than just on the fronts and backs. The writing will be engraved, but will be detectable by touch.

Those two features, particularly the rotation of the coins, will lead to excitement about the money in a way that wasn't generated before, Moy says.

“Casual collectors will focus their attention on the dollar, just as they have with the 50-state quarter program,” Moy says.

“If they start collecting them and seeking them out, we hope that one positive benefit of that is that they'll start using them more and say, ‘Hmmm, this isn't as bad as we thought.' ”

The Mint is also planning a different approach in promoting the new coins. The plan is for a more bottom-up program, in which the goal is to get consumers excited about the coins, leading them to demand the dollar coins from banks, retailers and others.

With Sacagawea, the Mint tried a more top-down approach, in which banks and retailers were encouraged to use the coins to try to create a buzz among consumers.

The Mint is planning to spend approximately $5 million for the initial marketing campaign, far less than it did with Sacagawea.

The presidential dollar coins come as the highly successful state quarter program nears completion in 2008. From 125 million to 130 million people in the USA — or close to half the U.S. population — are collecting the state quarters, according to the American Numismatic Association.

The Littleton Coin Company has already sold thousands of specially designed folders with slots for the new dollar coins to collectors. Part of the interest is coming from people who became collectors with the quarter program, says Jeffrey Marsh, head of marketing for the Littleton, N.H.-based company.

“I definitely could see it as being as popular as the state quarters,” Marsh says. “It's just another one that ties in nicely with education and history.”

But being collected and being used are two entirely different things, says Beth Deisher, editor of the publication Coin World.

“The Mint is really in an uphill battle,” Deisher says “No other nation has successfully circulated a coin equivalent of the paper money. It doesn't happen. Human nature is such that you would take the paper money.”

But Moy says comparing the presidential coins with previous dollar coins is not fair. He notes that unlike with the Sacagawea, the Mint will have 10 years to generate buzz about the new coins.

“The better analogy is the 50-state quarter program than prior dollar coin programs,” Moy says.

“If we can build on that sort of momentum, the chances of a dollar being successful really increases,” he says.

“We really need to make it big.”

Presidents, Well Known Or Not, Will Have Their Day On A Dollar (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0096264

By Matthew Healey

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

The United States Mint is unveiling four designs for one-dollar coins today, featuring likenesses of the first four presidents. They begin a series that is to last a decade and portray every deceased president.

The first coin, displaying George Washington on one side and the Statue of Liberty on the other, will go into circulation in mid-February, in time for Presidents' Day. After that, coins with John Adams, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison will be issued at three-month intervals.

Four more will appear, in order of each president's service, every year until 2016. Designs are based on presidential medals made previously by the Mint and on portraits in the National Portrait Gallery at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, where today's unveiling takes place.

The size, color and metal content of the $1 coins will be identical to those of the current Sacagawea dollars, but their luster should last longer because of a new anti-tarnishing compound that will be applied to blank coins between the time they are annealed, or softened by heating, and struck with the design.

The date and some inscriptions will be stamped into the edge, airing out the designs.

The director of the Mint, Edmund C. Moy, said the number of each presidential dollar coin issued would depend on circulation demands forecast by the Federal Reserve, regardless of how well known a president was. "This could be a renaissance for some of our lesser-known presidents," Mr. Moy said in an interview.

The coins were authorized last year by a law that also provides for a series of 24-karat $10 gold coins honoring all the presidents' wives, which will be sold to collectors and investors rather than released for general circulation. The first of those, showing Martha Washington, will be issued before the end of 2007.

The law also calls for four new designs for the penny in 2009, to commemorate the bicentennial of Abraham Lincoln's birth.

Hopes are that the new dollars will be as popular as the state quarters, many of which have been taken out of circulation by collectors. The government has earned $4 billion to $5 billion on the state-quarter series since 1999.

The Mint made three billion state quarters in 2005 but only five million Sacagawea dollars. By law, it has to continue making the Sacagawea dollars, which will circulate along with the new presidential dollars and the Susan B. Anthony dollar.

Implants And Science (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

It took 14 years, but science finally trumped politics Friday, with the Food and Drug Administration's lifting of its longstanding ban on silicone-gel breast implants. Women will at last be allowed to make their own decisions about cosmetic surgery. This is especially welcome news for mastectomy patients.

The FDA removed them from the market in 1992 during the reign of Commissioner David Kessler, a politically ambitious bureaucrat who was courting support from the left. The agency cited health concerns that have long since been debunked, and silicone-gel breast implants have since been at the heart of one of the trial bar's biggest scams. Class-action lawsuits raked in billions of dollars and drove implant makers out of the business. Dow Corning went into bankruptcy. Throughout it all, the trial bar was abetted by a gullible press, only too happy to ignore the science and play up sensationalist stories of supposed "victims."

Meanwhile, as we reported in editorials at the time, study after study showed no linkage between silicone breast implants and cancer, lupus, the skin-hardening disease scleroderma or other serious illness. As far back as 1994, doctors at the Mayo Clinic found "no association between breast implants and the connective-tissue diseases and other disorders" that they studied. In 1999, the Institute of Medicine found no systemic health problems caused by implants. In 2003, an FDA advisory panel advised that the ban be removed.

Last week's FDA decision notes that women with implants still run the risk of complications from leakage -- a risk that the industry has never denied and that patients have always been informed of. In approving implants made by two companies, Allergan Inc. and Mentor Corp., the FDA urged patients to get regular MRI exams. That's surely wise, but in any case it's a risk that patients and their doctors are perfectly capable of weighing against the benefits of the procedure.

One of the ugliest aspects of the breast-implant controversy has been the irresponsibility of the feminist movement, whose championship of a woman's right to "choose" doesn't extend to breast implants. It's all the more outrageous given the tens of thousands of breast-cancer victims seeking reconstructive surgery each year. Silicone-gel implants tend to feel and look more natural than the saline alternative.

It would be nice to think that the FDA's move closes the chapter on this nasty episode, but given the anti-implant crowd's reaction to Friday's announcement, that's probably too much to hope for. Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women, called it a "reckless decision" and promises to seek reversal "when the new Congress takes office." Sidney Wolfe, head of Public Citizen's Health Research Group -- the Naderite outlet that spearheaded the campaign against silicone in the 1980s and is a front for the trial bar -- called breast implants "the most defective medical device ever approved by the FDA." He also vowed to seek Congressional action.

DOJ_NMG_0096265

While we're glad the FDA has overturned 14 years of politicized medicine by approving silicone breast implants, it's worth remembering the enormous price that has been paid: to the credibility of the legal system, in jobs lost, and in public health. And it's worth asking what is more toxic: the silicone implants preferred by thousands of women, or the trial bar that purports to "protect" them.

Hill Scrum Blues (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

US News and World Report, November 27, 2006

Americans had ethics on their mind when they took control of Congress away from Republicans. In fact, 41 percent of voters in a post-election survey said corruption and scandals were "extremely important" factors in their vote. And both the winners and the losers promised to heed the message; Republicans said they'd learned their lessons, while Democrats pledged substantive reforms. Steny Hoyer, the current minority whip, followed that lead in a meeting with reporters, as he talked of the Democrats' legislative priorities come January. Yes, the party had called for upping the minimum wage and passing the 9/11 commission recommendations. But last week, Hoyer seemed to have those midterm voters on his mind. "Clearly Iraq was a major reason for their vote," he said. "Corruption was also a very important reason."

That was then. As the week wore on, and both parties turned to the business of electing new leaders, the lofty rhetoric seemed in the view of many to be giving way to the same old thing. In fact, the internal wrangling on Capitol Hill gave more credence to Washington's age-old pursuit of personal politics, strong-arm tactics, and backroom dealing. Congress is a club, after all, and in the light of day, it looked plenty clubby-even if all the members weren't getting along. By week's end, reform-substantive or otherwise-was looking like a mighty tall order.

Misstep. There was, however, enough drama to fill a play of several acts. Democratic Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi indelicately stepped into her own party's leadership elections, managing to turn their first week after 12 years out of power into a divisive intraparty brawl. Pelosi put her chips on an old friend, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania. It was a matter of loyalty, she said, and an attempt to credit Murtha for pushing a new course in Iraq. But her bold initiative bombed, damaging not only her own leadership credentials but the unity of her caucus as well. Murtha lost in a landslide to Hoyer in the race for majority leader. Even Pelosi allowed afterward that it was a "stunning victory" for the 12-term congressman from Maryland.

Murtha, the Vietnam vet who ran Pelosi's own leadership campaign, had helped shift the Iraq debate when he called for troop redeployments this year. But the longtime power player on the Appropriations Committee, who has championed millions of dollars in earmarks, faced mounting questions about his murky ethics record. His leadership candidacy brought back stories of the 26-year-old Abscam bribery scandal, in which Murtha was implicated but never charged. He punctuated the doubts by telling a group of moderates that the lobbying reform bill pushed by Democrats this year was "total crap."

Hoyer has long-established roots within the party and had helped many of the freshman representatives raise money, but watchdog groups aren't wild about his independence, either. Public Citizen ranked Hoyer fifth in the House for receiving money from lobbyists, three spots behind Murtha. "I'm sure that many voters who voted on the issue of corruption were hugely disappointed by the Democrats this week," says Melanie Sloan of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. "That this was the first action out of the box-putting up a guy with serious ethics problems-if I was a voter who had crossed over or was independent and then they did this, I'd be thinking, 'What did I do?'"

OTHER NEWS:

A Brisk Rise In American Wages (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, November 20, 2006

American paychecks are rising again at a pace not seen since the 1990s.

The pay increase amounts to 4 percent on average over the past 12 months, and it comes at a very helpful time for millions of households.

For three years, pay increases haven't kept pace with the rising cost of living. Then came this year's housing slowdown, which has further squeezed family finances.

Those setbacks, however, are now being offset by rising income. Four percent may not sound like much, but you have to look back to 1997 to find a calendar year with a gain that big.

DOJ_NMG_0096266

Equally significant, tamer energy prices mean that the "real" wage gains, after inflation, are above 3 percent for the past 12 months. That, too, hasn't happened since the 1990s, even though the economy has been expanding over the past five years.

"The striking feature of this expansion has been that ... real wages for the typical worker haven't risen that much," says Richard Berner, US economist at the investment bank Morgan Stanley in New York. But with real incomes rising, he says, "you get a picture of an economy that can weather this housing storm."

The risk of recession hasn't disappeared, he and other economists say. But with a fairly tight job market and low unemployment, many expect that paychecks will keep rising solidly in 2007.

Sandy Nelson has seen the strength of rising incomes first hand this year.

She runs Mulberry Road, a children's store near Boston's trendy Newbury Street, and says traffic has been increasing.

More customers means more income for her - and more money to keep investing in her young business.

"I have more of what people are looking for," she says, pointing to racks of colorful clothing for toddlers.

In other words, Ms. Nelson is ready for the vital holiday season.

"I'm just hopeful that it will be as good as what they're saying," she says, citing retail forecasts that New Englanders will spend more than $700 on gifts this season, on average.

The average private-sector paycheck is now $573 per week, according to Labor Department figures that cover about 8 in 10 workers - those in production or nonsupervisory jobs.

As recently as this past October, weekly pay adjusted for inflation was below where it was when President Bush took office in 2001. In effect, rising prices for things like healthcare, college tuition, and especially for energy ate up all the wage gains of an expanding economy, and then some.

The spike in energy costs was extreme, but the pattern was a common one. Wages generally rise fastest when the economy is strong and inflation is low.

That's why this moderation in fuel prices is so important.

Dan Thompson, who drives a DHL delivery truck in Boston, can hardly remember the pay raise he thinks he got earlier this year. But lower gasoline prices lately have been like an instant addition to his income.

"Thank God for that," Mr. Thompson says. He fills his tank often, since he drives to work every day from Salem, N.H.

Although the wage trend nationally has been steadily upward this year, it's unclear how much the inflation side of the equation will continue to benefit workers. Last week, the Labor Department reported not just tame inflation but an outright drop in consumer prices. The more typical pattern - and the one expected in the months ahead - is modest inflation, not deflation.

Even so, many analysts see a climate that's promising for more growth in real income.

"Expect wages to maintain a decent clip at least through the first half" of 2007, says Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal-leaning research group in Washington.

Those gains lately have been fairly broad-based across all pay levels, but they come at a time when wage growth seems to be harder to come by than in the past.

One key reason, Mr. Bernstein says, is an increasingly global market for labor.

"If your work can be routinized and digitized, you're in global competition in a way that you weren't a decade ago," he says.

The key questions for the economy - and for worker pocketbooks - are whether the job and wage growth continues, whether the housing slump deepens, and what happens to energy prices.

"With oil prices down, we're less worried" about a recession, says David Wyss, economist at Standard & Poor's in New York.

Another positive sign: Companies are laying off fewer people this year, says John Challenger, who heads the outplacement firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas in Chicago.

Big Pharma On A Mission To Woo Democrats (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

The pharmaceutical industry was in the enviable position two years ago of having the right friends in the right places in Washington.

Billy Tauzin, the Republican lawmaker, and Thomas Scully, who ran Medicare during President George W. Bush's first term, were leaving their respective posts to lobby for the drugs industry after securing the addition of a pharma-friendly prescription drug subsidy in the federal healthcare programme for the elderly.

Another ally in the Senate, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, had emerged as a powerful player in Congress and was considered a presidential hopeful.

DOJ_NMG_0096267

The industry's mirrored that of other big companies and trade associations that had strengthened their ties with the Republican majority by hiring only Republican lobbyists for top positions – a practice championed by Mr Santorum that was known as the "K Street project".

Now the prospects of the industry's giants have taken a turn. After spending an estimated $10m (£5.3m, €7.8m) on Republican incumbent candidates ahead of this year's mid-term elections – Democrats received about $4.5m – no other sector is expected to face as hostile a reception on Capitol Hill after the Democrats take over in 2007.

Shares in US and European pharmaceutical companies tumbled in the days after the election, with Pfizer, Eli Lilly and Novartis each down 5 per cent or more. The New York Stock Exchange Healthcare Index recovered slightly last week after a sharp drop.

Nancy Pelosi, incoming Speaker of the House, who once accused Mr Tauzin of "selling seniors down the river" for $2m – the sum the Louisiana Republican was reportedly paid to join the association he now runs, PhRMA – says one of her priorities will be to give the government the power to negotiate Medicare drug prices.

Other lawmakers, including Henry Waxman, the representative, are expected to target the industry by calling hearings on issues ranging from marketing to drug safety. Congress is also expected to increase its scrutiny of the industry's chief regulator, the Food and Drug Administration. The industry will face this harsh new reality without the support of Mr Santorum, who lost his re-election bid.

"Clearly, it is a new day. After the election, we woke up to a new world and I think you will see industry-wide actions that will reflect that new world," says Ken Johnson, senior vice-president at PhRMA. "There will be a renewed emphasis on making new friends and reaching out to Democrats, and especially pro-business Democrats," he says.

The industry has already recruited at least one high-profile Democrat to help it make inroads with the incoming majority party. John Breaux, the former senator and Patton Boggs lobbyist who was also involved in the passage of the Medicare provision, told the Financial Times he was working with clients in the industry on strategies for the upcoming Congress, including spending a "great deal of time" with editorial boards explaining the positive attributes of the Medicare prescription drug benefit.

Steve Jenning, a Democratic drug lobbyist at Capitol Health Group, says the industry is seeking lobbyists who maintained "some semblance of a relationship with the minority" to gain influence, not only with rank-and-file Democrats on important congressional committees but also with the new leadership – Ms Pelosi and Harry Reid, incoming majority leader in the Senate.

Given the barbs the industry has traded with Ms Pelosi, in particular, Mr Johnson says it will "take some time to heal" the "old wounds".

But for all the emphasis some lobbyists pin on hopes of making new friends in the Democratic caucus, others privately admit that the Democrats' narrow victory in the Senate means the industry is not in dire straits. Instead of reaching out to Democrats, says one senior lobbyist, the drug industry will simply have to ensure it has 41 votes in the Senate to block harmful legislation, instead of the 60 votes they had been seeking in a friendly Senate.

"The Senate is a killing chamber, it always has been. The game you are going to play is, 'how do I stop that from happening?' " the lobbyist says.

But Mr Breaux disagrees with that strategy. "I would do more than that – not just play defence, play offence and send a positive message about what they [the pharmaceutical industry] do and why they do it. We have a good story to tell," he says.

Mr Breaux's task may be made easier by a recent changing of the guard at several big drugmakers, including Pfizer, the world's largest. Democrats may be more willing to lend an ear to chief executive Jeffrey Kindler than former chief executive Hank McKinnell, who was a large donor to the Republican party.

Records collected by the Center for Responsive Politics show that Mr Kindler donated $10,200 in this election cycle. The beneficiaries were all Democrats.

G.O.P. Explorers (TIME)

Time, November 27, 2006

Potential presidential candidates used to take their time deciding whether to run; now, you can't be coy. Several Republicans are already forming exploratory committees. Betting site Tradesport.com gives the odds for each to win the nomination.

John McCain Odds: 10 to 11 He's John McCain! War hero, anticorruption crusader, George W. Bush's best frenemy in the world. And it doesn't hurt that the press loves him. The G.O.P. base doesn't trust anyone loved by the media, and his liberal fan base may offend a few conservatives. Plus, he wants to send more troops to Iraq.

Rudy Giuliani Odds: 47 to 1 America's Mayor led New York City through 9/11; he has a no-nonsense attitude toward crime, budgets and basically anything else that annoys him. He might lose the family-values vote with two divorces behind him. He has supported gays but not guns. Republicans don't know his blue side now, but they will.

DOJ_NMG_0096268

Tommy Thompson Odds: 124 to 1 Former Wisconsin Governor and Secretary of Health and Human Services under Bush. He's the original welfare reformer and loves health care. Wisconsin. Campaigning on health care and welfare? Not very exciting. And his other talking points--energy conservation and the Iraq war--aren't exactly original.

Duncan Hunter Odds: 142 to 1 House Armed Services chair co-wrote a bill to put a fence along Mexico's border. Will protect the unborn and military contractors too. Lack of name recognition may end up hurting his chances, plus he's been tainted with connections to disgraced former Representative Randy (Duke) Cunningham.

Bill And Hillary Clinton's War Plan (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, November 27, 2006

For right-wing conspiracy theorists, this is the belly of the beast—a dinner at the Four Seasons in New York for the 20th anniversary of Harvard's Joan Shorenstein Center on the Press, Politics and Public Policy. Portentous Ivy League professors, Upper East Side gazillionaires, Precambrian media pooh-bahs; Dan Rather and Al Franken and Paul Pelosi, spouse of the Speaker-elect. Almost all in attendance cheer the results of the midterms while bemoaning the demise of old media. Suddenly, shimmering over the tabletops, comes a vision of what was and might yet be again: in full plumage, arriving and departing separately per their insane schedules, Bill and Hillary Clinton—"two for the price of one," as the Arkansas governor liked to say back in 1992, before Dogpatch went global.

This audience knows about the ex-president's ability to put other people's money where his mouth is. Big money. At the second annual Clinton Global Initiative in September, he extracted more than $7 billion in commitments to address world problems. Hosting a conference of the Slate 60 largest charitable givers in the United States last week at his presidential library in Little Rock, he joked to the assembled billionaires, "I looked in the mirror and realized I'd become an NGO."

But can a "nongovernmental organization" like Clinton Partners retake the U.S. government? On this evening, Hillary is in the audience, Bill the featured performer. Even for a crowd of old friends unimpressed by his celebrity, the former president's seemingly offhand stump speech does not disappoint. In the past year, he has taken his already-impressive rhetorical game to a new level, offering a thoughtful synthesis of the world's problems and opportunities.

He's a master of display. Statistics that would be deadly in other hands ("Denmark's had a 50 percent increase in its economy with a zero percent increase in energy consumption") come alive. Describing fluorescent lighting, new windows and other ways to go green and get rich at the same time, he deadpans, "Boring, right?" before answering his own question with patented casual intensity: "But it's important." Like a high-tech camera circumnavigating a subject, he clicks images from a dozen angles, then defends complexity, flexibility, uncertainty.

The beauty of the Democratic Party midterm victory, Clinton muses, is that voters said no to ideology. They wanted to move past fearmongering and demonizing toward true debate. "America rejected shorthand," he says. "People are thinking again." But they are not thinking of a set of liberal policy prescriptions. He argues that the election was about more than Iraq and corruption; it turned on the unmet needs of middle-class voters for whom the country "isn't working anymore." And yet no one is exactly sure how to make it work again. "The people didn't give Democrats a mandate," the former president cautions. "They gave us a chance."

But a chance to do what? To compromise with the president to achieve something to show voters the next time? Or to lay out an agenda to run on in the 2008 campaign? (The first cattle-call primary debates, if you can believe it, are only six or seven months away.) The answer will be some of both, of course, with the calibration of the two approaches determined as much by Hillary Clinton and her husband as by Nancy Pelosi or Harry Reid. All that is clear so far is that "the chance" will inevitably take centrist form. Just as every Republican candidate has for decades been required to describe himself as a conservative, every Democratic candidate in 2008 will don the Clintonesque cloak of moderation. It's a vindication of Clinton's "Third Way" presidency, though ironic considering that the Democrats lost the Congress in the first place in 1994 in part because of the alleged excesses of "Hillarycare." Now the former First Lady, whose impressive 67 percent re-election to the Senate showed she could win the support of independent swing voters and even a quarter of Republicans, is betting that a moderate image will erase the phony national impression of her as a left-wing harridan.

Chance, as Louis Pasteur said, favors the prepared mind, and none is more prepared in the Democratic Party than that of HRC. Her orderly and substantive approach to issues has brought raves from colleagues in both parties. Her political orbit, dubbed "Hillaryland," is a frighteningly disciplined constellation of aides, none of whom (to the annoyance of the press) will talk out of school about a 2008 presidential race. While the campaign-in-waiting has not done as much recruitment of workers in Iowa as rivals assume, it would not take long to put the pieces in place. It's still possible that she'll forgo a 2008 campaign in order to stay in a job she loves in the Senate (and become majority leader within a few years). But unless personal concerns surface soon, the odds strongly favor her jumping in early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0096269

If she does, it will not be because her party is clamoring for her to do so. While her celebrity and command of issues always draw friendly crowds, they cannot be fairly described as tumultuous. While Bill is a virtuoso at weaving together seemingly unrelated threads, Hillary is still too often what one of her biographers, Michael Tomasky, calls the "Laundry Lady," reciting a laundry list of worthy ideas that don't yet add up to a compelling vision.

One conventional take on Hillary is that while she is a prohibitive favorite to win the Democratic nomination, she cannot win the general election. But the reverse may be closer to the truth. With the map of the Electoral College shading blue, any Democrat strong enough to win the nomination can conceivably prevail in November. The last four Democratic nominees have all received more than 250 electoral votes (with 270 needed to elect). Bill Clinton used to tell friends that the first woman president of the United States would be like Margaret Thatcher in Great Britain—a conservative. He no longer makes that argument. The challenge in the 2008 general election might be less about Hillary's gender (or any collateral damage caused from a failure by Pelosi) than her core political skills. Could she avoid being Swift-Boated as a lefty? Probably so. Hillary has the thick skin and war-room experience to fend off the GOP demonizers, who are not quite so formidable after their 2006 wipeout.

The bigger problem for her would be getting past Barack Obama, who now seems poised to run. With much less name recognition than Clinton, he trails her by only 12 points in the latest Gallup poll (the rest of the Democrats are far back). And Obama won the first trial heat of '08: he was the biggest draw for other Democratic candidates this fall with a magnetism on the trail unmatched by anyone in politics. (HOT CHICKS DIG OBAMA read one button at a Nashville rally). His stump speech is rousing and redemptive and more compelling than, say, Bill Clinton's was in 1991.

Of course, Obama is inexperienced and untested: while he'd likely have enough Internet-generated money to be competitive, he could wilt under the relentless scrutiny of a presidential campaign. But the Illinois senator, who in 2008 will be three years older than JFK was when he was elected in 1960, brings two big advantages that have not been fully appreciated.

The first is on the war in Iraq. You know what's coming if he runs: "Obama is like a Grand Marnier soufflé still rising in the oven. It will taste delicious when it's finished, but it's not there yet. A trip to Israel and a trip to Africa are not going to give him foreign-policy credentials," says one Clinton backer unwilling to criticize Obama on the record. But should Hillary and other experienced candidates jab at Obama's lack of foreign-policy experience, he would quickly reply that he was right and they were wrong on the critical question of going to war in 2003. (Obama was an early and outspoken critic of the war before being elected to the Senate.)

More important, the primary schedule favors Obama. Hillary Clinton has no Rove-like master strategist yet (other than her husband), but the logic of her front-runner game plan suggests building a firewall in the South to recover if she's upset in Iowa or New Hampshire. Bill Clinton's popularity with blacks has been presumed to carry over to her and help her win the important South Carolina primary, where nearly 50 percent of Democratic voters are African-American, and other similar Southern primaries critical to the nomination. But that doesn't account for Obama, who would likely crush her among black voters.

The larger danger for Hillary is that for all the novelty of her gender, she becomes a variation on former vice president Walter Mondale in 1984—strong on organization but weak on passion, a candidate of the past instead of the future. And Clinton Fatigue may be lurking in the party's central nervous system. If Hillary were elected and re-elected president, it would mean the presence of a Bush or a Clinton on every ticket from 1980 to 2016—36 years.

The team that would try to make that happen is mostly from the East Wing of the Clinton White House (Patti Solis Doyle, Caprice Marshall), not the West Wing. "Some of us who were with him will be with her; a lot of others won't be," says one former White House aide unwilling to publicly identify which is which. Pollster Mark Penn, fund-raiser Terry McAuliffe and media adviser Mandy Grunwald are onboard, and James Carville and Paul Begala would help from the sidelines. The Clinton camp is not the monolith conservatives make it out to be. Carville's call last week for the ouster of Howard Dean as chairman of the Democratic National Committee was his initiative, and came without the approval of the Clintons, who aren't spoiling for a fight with Dean. "I'm 62 years old and my parents are gone. I don't ask permission," Carville says.

Of course, the Democratic nominee could easily be neither Hillary Clinton nor Barack Obama. Two years before the 1992 election, the presumed Democratic front runners were Mario Cuomo and Al Gore. Virginia Gov. Doug Wilder, an African-American candidate, was considered an intriguing choice. Far down the list of possibilities, languishing in polls as Evan Bayh and Chris Dodd are today, was an obscure governor named Bill Clinton.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

Kissinger's view

Military victory is no longer possible in Iraq, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said in a television interview yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0096270

Mr. Kissinger presented a bleak vision of Iraq, saying the U.S. government must enter into dialogue with Iraq's regional neighbors -- including Iran -- if progress is to be made in the region.

"If you mean by 'military victory' an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible," he told the British Broadcasting Corp.

But Mr. Kissinger, who has advised President Bush about Iraq, warned against a rapid withdrawal of coalition troops, saying it could destabilize Iraq's neighbors and cause a long-lasting conflict, the Associated Press reports.

"A dramatic collapse of Iraq -- whatever we think about how the situation was created -- would have disastrous consequences for which we would pay for many years, and which would bring us back, one way or another, into the region," he said.

Mr. Kissinger, whose views have been sought by the Iraqi Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, called for an international conference bringing together the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, Iraq's neighbors and regional powers such as India and Pakistan to work out a way forward for the region.

"I think we have to redefine the course, but I don't think that the alternative is between military victory, as defined previously, or total withdrawal," he said.

Dean's agenda

Howard Dean said the Democratic Party needs to look beyond getting homosexuals and minorities a place at the table and instead work toward getting them on the ballot.

"We've got to share power, not just responsibility, from now on," Mr. Dean told about 200 people in Houston on Saturday at the International Gay & Lesbian Leadership Conference, an annual gathering of homosexual public officials.

Mr. Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said little about issues such as same-sex "marriage" or discrimination laws, and instead addressed broader Democratic agendas, such as raising the minimum wage.

Flush from big Democratic gains in the Nov. 7 elections, Mr. Dean emphasized that the "new Democratic Party" reaches out to all citizens, even those less likely to vote for them. The downfall of the "old Democratic Party," he said, had been its acceptance to represent half the nation.

"We've got to take the attitude: Everyone's our boss," Mr. Dean said.

He then outlined the issues he thinks the party should focus on now that Democrats control Congress, including increasing college financial assistance and passing an energy independence bill, the Associated Press reports.

Unusual attitude

"A postelection stay in the cool, cloudy capital reveals a sober Republican Party attempting every day in conversations throughout Capitol Hill a rancor-free analysis of why the party lost, and in a way that was so killingly close and yet brutally decisive," Peggy Noonan writes at www.opinionjournal. com.

"There is a general sense the loss was not undeserved -- this is an unusual attitude for runners just back from the race -- and that it was not so much a vote for something as against something: them. And roiling, rudderless Iraq. And an unpopular president," Miss Noonan said.

"There is a sense the nation's culture and politics are and have been changing, shifting, and agreement that the election was not a realigning one, but could yet prove to be if, among other things, Republicans fail to step back, refind and rethink their philosophy, style, priorities and meaning. They must develop a conservatism that speaks for and to the times. And stop being pigs -- i.e., earmarking careerists who started with belief and wound up with hunger.

"As for Democrats, they have a unique opportunity, one they haven't had in 14 years, to redefine for the public what their party is. It is their chance to change their public label. Now, with the cameras of the country trained on Capitol Hill, they can throw off the old baggage of the 1960s and '70s and erase the cartoon version of their party, which is culturally radical, weak in its defense of America, profligate, McGovernite, bitterly devoted to the demands of its groups as opposed to the needs of America."

No chips at the table

Reuel Marc Gerecht of the Weekly Standard is hearing the calls for an international conference on Iraq, from such quarters as Capitol Hill Democrats and possibly the Iraq commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. He is skeptical.

"Let us set aside for the moment the virulently anti-American Islamist ideology of Iran's ruling clergy and their praetorians, starting with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Let us also not inquire how much influence Iran's mullahs actually have over the Shia of Iraq ... . Let us put aside whether the Iraqis themselves would favor inviting foreigners to intrude further into their affairs; and, for those who care deeply about Sunni Arab participation in a new Iraq, whether legitimizing an Iranian role could possibly win Sunni friends.

DOJ_NMG_0096271

"Let us also not ask how much pull Saudi Arabia and Jordan have with the Sunni rejectionist camp of Ba'athists, Sunni supremacists, Salafi and Wahhabi fundamentalists, and martyrdom-loving foreign holy warriors. None of these takes his orders from the royal families of Jordan and Arabia," he writes at the Weekly Standard's Web site.

"Instead, let us consider the question at the heart of any negotiation: What can be traded and bargained? What in the world can the United States give the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Alawite mafia of Bashar Assad in Damascus [Syria] that they do not have already?

"Or to put it in the vernacular of the region: Can the Americans actually hurt me, and will they refrain from doing so? What have Damascus and Tehran lost by the turmoil in Iraq? If the violence in Iraq diminished, would they lose or gain?

"For realists, the answers to all of these questions aren't good. When you're weak -- when you're seen to be weak and see yourself as weak -- you don't have much to offer."

By the numbers

"There's a lot of buzz in the cable TV world that having Democrats running Congress will hurt Fox and help MSNBC and CNN," Paul Bedard writes in the Washington Whispers column of U.S. News & World Report.

"It certainly looked like that election night when CNN won the key viewership demographic of 25-to-54-year-olds. 'We're clearly the place to go for information,' CNN boss Jon Klein tells us. 'Maybe the trick is that you have to actually cover politics. The public seems to be in the mood for facts and information -- not cheerleading.'

"MSNBC, No. 3 but surging, also crowed: 'MSNBC is the place for politics.' So what about Fox? It simply turned to the numbers. And they show that Fox is still No. 1, with its audience growing. 'We'll let the two cable-news also-rans battle for second place, and we wish Jon and [MSNBC] well on their quest for relevancy,' say an amused Foxie."

When Religion Loses Its Credibility (USAT)

By Oliver "buzz" Thomas

USA Today, November 20, 2006

What if Christian leaders are wrong about homosexuality? I suppose, much as a newspaper maintains its credibility by setting the record straight, church leaders would need to do the same:

Correction: Despite what you might have read, heard or been taught throughout your churchgoing life, homosexuality is, in fact, determined at birth and is not to be condemned by God's followers.

Based on a few recent headlines, we won't be seeing that admission anytime soon. Last week, U.S. Roman Catholic bishops took the position that homosexual attractions are "disordered" and that gays should live closeted lives of chastity. At the same time, North Carolina's Baptist State Convention was preparing to investigate churches that are too gay-friendly. Even the more liberal Presbyterian Church (USA) had been planning to put a minister on trial for conducting a marriage ceremony for two women before the charges were dismissed on a technicality. All this brings me back to the question: What if we're wrong?

Religion's only real commodity, after all, is its moral authority. Lose that, and we lose our credibility. Lose credibility, and we might as well close up shop.

It's happened to Christianity before, most famously when we dug in our heels over Galileo's challenge to the biblical view that the Earth, rather than the sun, was at the center of our solar system. You know the story. Galileo was persecuted for what turned out to be incontrovertibly true. For many, especially in the scientific community, Christianity never recovered.

This time, Christianity is in danger of squandering its moral authority by continuing its pattern of discrimination against gays and lesbians in the face of mounting scientific evidence that sexual orientation has little or nothing to do with choice. To the contrary, whether sexual orientation arises as a result of the mother's hormones or the child's brain structure or DNA, it is almost certainly an accident of birth. The point is this: Without choice, there can be no moral culpability.

So, why are so many church leaders (not to mention Orthodox Jewish and Muslim leaders) persisting in their view that homosexuality is wrong despite a growing stream of scientific evidence that is likely to become a torrent in the coming years? The answer is found in Leviticus 18. "You shall not lie with a man as with a woman; it is an abomination."

As a former "the Bible says it, I believe it, that settles it" kind of guy, I am sympathetic with any Christian who accepts the Bible at face value. But here's the catch. Leviticus is filled with laws imposing the death penalty for everything from eating catfish to sassing your parents. If you accept one as the absolute, unequivocal word of God, you must accept them all.

For many of gay America's loudest critics, the results are unthinkable. First, no more football. At least not without gloves. Handling a pig skin is an abomination. Second, no more Saturday games even if you can get a new ball. Violating the Sabbath is a capital offense according to Leviticus. For the over-40 crowd, approaching the altar of God with a defect in your sight is taboo, but you'll have plenty of company because those menstruating or with disabilities are also barred.

DOJ_NMG_0096272

The truth is that mainstream religion has moved beyond animal sacrifice, slavery and the host of primitive rituals described in Leviticus centuries ago. Selectively hanging onto these ancient proscriptions for gays and lesbians exclusively is unfair according to anybody's standard of ethics. We lawyers call it “selective enforcement,” and in civil affairs it's illegal.

A better reading of Scripture starts with the book of Genesis and the grand pronouncement about the world God created and all those who dwelled in it. “And, the Lord saw that it was good.” If God created us and if everything he created is good, how can a gay person be guilty of being anything more than what God created him or her to be?

Turning to the New Testament, the writings of the Apostle Paul at first lend credence to the notion that homosexuality is a sin, until you consider that Paul most likely is referring to the Roman practice of pederasty, a form of pedophilia common in the ancient world. Successful older men often took boys into their homes as concubines, lovers or sexual slaves. Today, such sexual exploitation of minors is no longer tolerated. The point is that the sort of long-term, committed, same-sex relationships that are being debated today are not addressed in the New Testament. It distorts the biblical witness to apply verses written in one historical context (i.e. sexual exploitation of children) to contemporary situations between two monogamous partners of the same sex. Sexual promiscuity is condemned by the Bible whether it's between gays or straights. Sexual fidelity is not.

For those who have lingering doubts, dust off your Bibles and take a few hours to reacquaint yourself with the teachings of Jesus. You won't find a single reference to homosexuality. There are teachings on money, lust, revenge, divorce, fasting and a thousand other subjects, but there is nothing on homosexuality. Strange, don't you think, if being gay were such a moral threat?

On the other hand, Jesus spent a lot of time talking about how we should treat others. First, he made clear it is not our role to judge. It is God's. (“Judge not lest you be judged.” Matthew 7:1) And, second, he commanded us to love other people as we love ourselves.

So, I ask you. Would you want to be discriminated against? Would you want to lose your job, housing or benefits because of something over which you had no control? Better yet, would you like it if society told you that you couldn't visit your lifelong partner in the hospital or file a claim on his behalf if he were murdered?

The suffering that gay and lesbian people have endured at the hands of religion is incalculable, but they can look expectantly to the future for vindication. Scientific facts, after all, are a stubborn thing. Even our religious beliefs must finally yield to them as the church in its battle with Galileo ultimately realized. But for religion, the future might be ominous. Watching the growing conflict between medical science and religion over homosexuality is like watching a train wreck from a distance. You can see it coming for miles and sense the inevitable conclusion, but you're powerless to stop it. The more church leaders dig in their heels, the worse it's likely to be.

Oliver “Buzz” Thomas is a Baptist minister and author of an upcoming book, 10 Things Your Minister Wants to Tell You (But Can't Because He Needs the Job).

New Tactic In Fighting Marriage Initiatives (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

TUCSON -- A pair of retirees keeping house in a concrete bungalow, with snapshots of their 30 grandchildren and great-grandchildren in the living room and an American flag out front, may not look like the face of gay America.

But this month Al Breznay, 79, and Maxine Piatt, 75, were pivotal in defeating an Arizona initiative that defined marriage as the union of one man and one woman -- the only one of 28 such state measures ever to fail.

Breznay, a retired mechanic who still does odd jobs to bring in extra cash, and Piatt, a former bank teller, are at the forefront of a strategy to defeat a tide of same-sex marriage bans by talking about straight people.

Of those 28 state marriage initiatives, 17 have included language outlawing domestic partnerships. Gay rights advocates see this as an opening to highlight for heterosexual voters the impact such initiatives may have on them, and in Arizona, activists kept the spotlight on couples such as Breznay and Piatt, registered domestic partners whose faces appeared on fliers and television ads.

"The majority of people in Arizona don't support gay marriage. That's clear, they do not," said Marty Rouse, national field director of the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy group. "Once you say gay and lesbian, people hone in on that. We have to focus on the majority of people that will be affected by this. And the majority of people are straight couples."

The campaign against the Arizona measure, Proposition 107, avoided almost any mention of gay marriage, except in small liberal pockets of the state. Instead, the message was about the section of the measure that would have banned government agencies from recognizing civil unions or domestic partnerships.

That apparently struck home in the state's sizable senior-citizen enclaves, where many older couples do not marry because their retirement income would be affected. The initiative was defeated, 52 percent to 48 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0096273

"It's not a liberal-versus-conservative issue," said Steve May, a former Republican state representative who is gay and who served as treasurer of the campaign against Proposition 107. "It's about, 'I don't need to take away health care from Al and Maxine, this nice old couple in Tucson.' "

In fact, the couple's health coverage would not have been affected by the measure's passage, although their ability to pay for the coverage or to visit each other in intensive care would change, as they discovered when Piatt got sick two years ago.

Such generalizing upsets supporters of the initiative, who accuse opponents of fear-mongering.

"They misled voters. They scared seniors into believing they would lose Social Security benefits," said Cathi Herrod, spokeswoman for the pro-107 campaign. "Our problem was we did not have funds to respond to the attacks."

Her campaign spent about $1 million, she said, compared with the $2.1 million spent by the measure's opponents.

Talking to straight couples does not always work; the strategy failed in Virginia this year, where a marriage law passed with 57 percent of the vote.

The differences in Arizona were a longer campaign and a relentless focus on benefits and health care, Rouse said.

In Virginia, "most of the media coverage talked about a gay marriage ban," he said, "whereas in Arizona, you did hear about a ban on same-sex marriage, but it was still focused on health care."

This month's results may prove instructive in setting the debate in the next state where same-sex marriage is likely to appear on the ballot: Florida, in 2008.

"Florida might be able to learn from Arizona," Rouse said. But "campaigns are campaigns. If you do your research and you find out what voters care about, then you know what to focus on."

For some gay activists, it was bittersweet to defeat a same-sex marriage ban by avoiding the subject of homosexuality.

"To truly win the freedom to marry and end discrimination, we can't just play defense," said Evan Wolfson, executive director of the gay rights group Freedom to Marry. He added that proponents of same-sex marriage must "avoid messaging that blocks further attacks and does not move us further ahead."

Wolfson says he takes heart in the reelection of legislators who support same-sex marriage and in the narrowing margins by which initiatives banning same-sex marriage have passed. In 2004, 71 percent of voters voted for such initiatives on average; that dropped to 56 percent this year.

"Even if, in the short-term battles, we may have to emphasize the overbreadth, the dangers to non-gay people and the general unfairness, the trend is in our favor," Wolfson said.

That is not how it looks to Bill Maier, vice president and psychologist in residence at Focus on the Family, a proponent of state same-sex marriage bans.

Voters in states with marriage initiatives this year tended to be more libertarian than those voting in 2004, so they shied away from constitutional changes, he said.

"When you see more of these amendments pop up in 'red states,' I think you're going to see more of those large percentages," Maier said.

Maier also sees a backlash on the horizon. He points to New Jersey, where civil unions or same-sex marriage could be legalized in the next six months after an order by the state Supreme Court.

"When people see gay people standing on the courthouse steps saying, 'I'm getting married come hell or high water,' among the general population there tends to be a recoil," Maier said.

For their part, Breznay and Piatt are pleased that Arizona's initiative lost, though same-sex marriage has never been their cause.

"We didn't care one way or the other. It didn't involve us," Piatt said. "That's what makes me so angry, is people linked this gay marriage to domestic partnerships."

Foley Ends Treatment (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Sources tell us disgraced ex-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) ended his stay at a rehab facility in Arizona that treats alcohol addiction as well as sexual addiction and compulsion before he headed back to Florida to attend the funeral of his father.

“It was more for that,” said one source, referring to sexual addiction.

We’re told that Foley’s sister, Donna Winterson, went to fetch her brother and check him out of the facility, called Sierra Tucson, in the final days of their father’s struggle with cancer. Their father, Edward Foley Jr., died Tuesday at a hospice center in Palm Beach County, Fla.

DOJ_NMG_0096274

Foley, who now faces a Florida criminal investigation into his sexually explicit Internet messages, declared that he was an alcoholic in the days after he resigned over the page scandal. Sierra Tucson treats alcohol and drug addiction, as well as eating disorders, sexual addiction/compulsivity, obsessive-compulsive disorder and depression, among other mental health problems.

The Florida Department of Law Enforcement reportedly has launched an active criminal investigation into Foley's instant message chit chats with male teenage pages, which cost Republicans that very safe GOP seat and may well have been the nail in the coffin for their majority.

Speaking of Which ... Kirk Fordham, who resigned as chief of staff to Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) amid the damning page scandal, was seen around Capitol Hill last week.

Fordham was spotted Thursday coming out of the National Republican Congressional Committee, chaired by Reynolds. On Friday, he was seen hanging around the Longworth House Office Building as House Republicans chose their new leaders.

Aides were surprised by Fordham's presence.

"What the hell is he doing here?" asked one, who requested anonymity. "He's one of the reasons we're in the minority."

Fordham was casually chatting up a reporter when approached by HOH. He said he had been "over at Reynolds' office" and wanted to come by Longworth to see what was happening.

Fordham was chief of staff in the New York Republican's personal office when the Foley scandal erupted. He served for several years as Foley's chief of staff.

"I've just been having some good downtime," he added.

Birthday for Old Blue Eyes. Winning his race for Minority Leader was the best birthday present Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) could get after losing the majority. Having his colleagues sing the famous "Boehner Birthday Song" that he wrote himself surely was second-best.

Boehner emerged victorious from the secret-ballot leadership elections on Friday, which coincided with his 57th birthday. The throng of reporters waiting for him outside demanded that he sing his famous birthday song.

"It's my birthday — I," Boehner said, pointing at himself indignantly, "shouldn't have to sing it!"

So the entire new leadership team sang it for him, perfectly off-key, with Boehner joining in to make sure they didn't screw up the lyrics: "This — is — your — birthday song, it doesn't last too long. Hey!" The second verse is the same as the first. "This — is — your —birthday song, it doesn't last too long. "Hey!"

The "Boehner Birthday Song" is so famous it's on YouTube, where you can see a video of Boehner singing the little ditty on the House floor to Rep. Ralph Hall on the Texas Republican's 83rd birthday in May. Everyone on the floor joined in, as poor Hall implored Boehner to stop.

Apparently the birthday song induces much cringing among Boehner's staff. Spokesman Kevin Madden said as soon as he walked back to the office after the little sing-a-long media availability, "Everyone was saying, 'Why did you let him sing the birthday song?'"

"Yeah right," Madden said. "Like I could have stopped him."

But they didn't mind singing along with the boss in the privacy of the office. "I'm shocked that some windows didn't crack," Madden said.

Kerry, Marines and Tequila. You might be able to accuse him of being the most boring guy IN the party, but ya can't really say he's the most boring guy AT the party. Not after Wednesday night.

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) was hanging out with about 30 staffers and former '04 presidential campaign alumni at the Senator's favorite Capitol Hill hangout, Finn MacCool's, down on Barracks Row by the Marines' headquarters. A group of Marines started chatting with the Senator and invited him to belly up to the bar with them. Kerry eschewed his button-downed staff for a good 20 minutes while he chatted with his new Semper Fi pals. They bought the Senator a tequila shot, which our trusty sources say Kerry downed in a flat second.

Food Banks Have Less To Work With As They Try To Meet Holiday Demand (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, November 20, 2006

The nation's food banks are scrambling to serve a growing demand for help during the holidays at a time when government food donations and private cash contributions have fallen.

More people are asking for food even as the amount of government commodities available — milk, cheese, canned goods and other staples — is down 55% from 2005, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. A second USDA program of emergency food aid has stayed about the same. Together, they supply about one-fourth of what food banks give away.

USDA buys fewer commodities when it has less need to boost farm prices. It gives 80% of purchases to America's Second Harvest, a network of more than 200 food banks.

DOJ_NMG_0096275

The loss of USDA commodities is "huge," says Paul Ash of the San Francisco Food Bank. He says his group is increasing visits to stores to pick up food with "sell by" dates about to expire.

Ash says the Bay Area's cost of living is forcing more low-income workers to seek help. He has managed to increase his holiday distribution 35% this year but says that remains "far short" of the need.

High rents have increased demand in Hawaii, doubling it in some areas, says Dick Grimm, president of Hawaii Foodbank.

Demand is up 34% from two years ago in the Dallas area, says Colleen Brinkmann of the North Texas Food Bank, and 39% from five years ago in Washington, D.C., and its suburbs, says Brian Smith of the Capital Area Food Bank.

"We have a lot of empty racks in our warehouse. That's unusual," says Carey Miller of the Food Bank of Iowa.

Despite reports of higher demand, a USDA report last week said the number of people who couldn't put food on the table at least part of the year fell in 2005 to 35 million, down from 38 million in 2004. It was the first decline in six years. But the report found the number of those worst off increased slightly.

High fuel prices this year have hurt many low-wage earners by forcing them to choose between heating their homes or buying food, says Maura Daly of America's Second Harvest.

Daly says the network is trying to expand programs, relying partly on a 3% rise this year in private food donations. She says financial donations this year are down 9% from 2005, not counting relief funds received after Hurricane Katrina.

"Every food bank will tell you," she says, "they need more food."

Brother, Can You Spare A Word? (NYT)

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

First the good news: the government's annual hunger report shows a slight decline last year in the number of citizens in need of food. Now the bad news: the annual hunger report has dropped the word "hunger."

Instead, there were 35 million Americans last year suffering from "low food security," meaning they chronically lacked the resources to be able to eat enough food. Of these, 10.8 million lived with "very low food security," meaning they were the hungriest among the hungry, so to speak.

Bureaucratic terminology about food security has always been a part of the hunger report, but so was the plain word "hunger." The Agriculture Department decided that variations of "hungry" are not scientifically accurate, following the advice of the Committee on National Statistics of the National Academies. The specialists advised that being hungry was too amorphous a way to refer to "a potential consequence of food insecurity that, because of prolonged, involuntary lack of food, results in discomfort, illness, weakness or pain that goes beyond the usual uneasy sensation."

The government insists that no Orwellian plot is in the works to mask a national blight. The goal has been to cut what we'll call the hungry households to no more than 6 percent of the population. But hungry people persist at nearly twice that rate, despite the slight drop last year. To the extent that more public empathy is needed to prod a stronger attack on low food security, we opt for "hunger" as a most stirring word.

Schools Slow In Closing Gaps Between Races (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

When President Bush signed his sweeping education law a year into his presidency, it set 2014 as the deadline by which schools were to close the test-score gaps between minority and white students that have persisted since standardized testing began.

Now, as Congress prepares to consider reauthorizing the law next year, researchers and a half-dozen recent studies, including three issued last week, are reporting little progress toward that goal. Slight gains have been seen for some grade levels.

Despite concerted efforts by educators, the test-score gaps are so large that, on average, African-American and Hispanic students in high school can read and do arithmetic at only the average level of whites in junior high school.

"The gaps between African-Americans and whites are showing very few signs of closing," Michael T. Nettles, a senior vice president at the Educational Testing Service, said in a paper he presented recently at Columbia University. One ethnic minority, Asians, generally fares as well as or better than whites.

The reports and their authors, in interviews, portrayed an educational landscape in which test-score gaps between black or Hispanic students and whites appear in kindergarten and worsen through 12 years of public education.

Some researchers based their conclusions on federal test results, while others have cited state exams, the SATs and other widely administered standardized assessments. Still, the studies have all concurred: The achievement gaps remain, perplexing and persistent.

DOJ_NMG_0096276

The findings pose a challenge not only for Mr. Bush but also for the Democratic lawmakers who joined him in negotiating the original law, known as No Child Left Behind, and who will control education policy in Congress next year.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Representative George Miller of California, who are expected to be the chairmen of the Senate and House education committees, will promote giving more resources to schools and researching strategies to improve minority performance, according to aides.

"Closing the achievement gap is at the heart of No Child Left Behind and must continue to be our focus in renewing the act next year," Mr. Kennedy said in a statement.

Experts have suggested many possible changes, including improving the law's mechanisms for ensuring that teachers in poor schools are experienced and knowledgeable, and extending early-childhood education to more students.

Henry L. Johnson, an assistant secretary of education, said: "I don't dispute that looking at some comparisons we see that these gaps are not closing — or not as fast as they ought to. But it's also accurate to say that when taken as a whole, student performance is improving. The presumption that we won't get to 100 percent proficiency from here presumes that everything is static. To reach the 100 percent by 2014, we'll all have to work faster and smarter."

The law requires states, districts and schools to report annual test results for all racial and ethnic groups, and to show annual improvements for each. It imposes sanctions on schools that do not meet the rising targets.

Many experts and officials, including the president's brother, Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, have supported the goal of raising all students to academic proficiency, but they have also called it unrealistic to accomplish in a decade.

But President Bush, who put education at the center of his 2000 campaign, has been insisting that it is not only feasible but that the gaps are already closing.

"There are good results of No Child Left Behind across the nation," Mr. Bush said last month at a school in North Carolina. "We have an achievement gap in America that is — that I don't like and you shouldn't like."

"The gap is closing," he said.

The researchers behind the reports issued last week in Washington, D.C., New York and California were far more pessimistic, though.

"The achievement gap is alive and well," said G. Gage Kingsbury, an author of the report issued in Washington by the Northwest Evaluation Association, a nonprofit group based in Oregon that administers tests.

Examining results from reading and math tests administered to 500,000 students in 24 states in the fall of 2004 and the spring of 2005, the study found: "For each score level at each grade in each subject, minority students grew less than European-Americans, and students from poor schools grew less than those from wealthier ones."

Minority and poor students also lost more academic ground each summer, the study said.

Ross Wiener, a principal partner at the Education Trust, a group that works to close achievement gaps and has consistently supported the federal law, called those findings "profoundly disturbing" and said it showed that schools continued to be a "significant source of disadvantage for minority students."

"The Bush administration wants to hang a 'Mission Accomplished' banner over N.C.L.B., but a fair assessment is that progress thus far in closing achievement gaps is disappointing," Mr. Weiner said. He pointed to financing and teacher assignment systems that lead to schools with mostly poor and minority students getting less money, offering fewer advanced courses and having weaker teachers.

The 2005 National Assessment of Educational Progress, a battery of reading and math tests administered to thousands of students in every state, showed some rising scores for all ethnic groups, and the black-white score gap narrowed in a statistically significant way for fourth-grade math. But on fourth-grade reading, and on eighth-grade reading and math, the black-white and Hispanic-white gaps were statistically unchanged from the early 1990s.

Over the past three decades, the gaps narrowed steadily from the 1970s through the late 1980s but then leveled out through 1999. Since then, some have narrowed again, but at a rate that would allow them to persist for decades. That picture showed up in a separate National Assessment test devised to measure long-term trends, administered in late 2003 and early 2004.

That test showed that regardless of race, scores increased a bit over three decades for 9- and 13-year-old students, with the best gains coming between 1999 and 2004.

Test administrators warned against attributing those gains to the federal law, because it had been in effect for about only a year when the 2004 test was given. Prekindergarten programs, higher standards and increased testing carried out by many states during the 1990s also contributed, they said.

But Bush administration officials have routinely credited the law for the improved scores on that test.

A group that has supported the federal law, the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, whose leaders include former officials from the Reagan and the current Bush administrations, conducted a review of state exams and other indicators and issued a report this month. It found that none of the 50 states had made widespread progress in narrowing the gaps, and that eight states, including New York and New Jersey, had made "moderate gains."

DOJ_NMG_0096277

Chester E. Finn Jr., the foundation president, said, "Poor and minority students are doing very poorly, and in most states are not making significant gains — and this in spite of N.C.L.B. and all the other reforms of the last 15 years."

Suggestions abound for ways to narrow the score gaps faster. Since scholars have documented that minority children enter kindergarten with weaker reading skills than white children, some experts advocate increased public financing for early education programs.

No Child Left Behind provides money for tutoring in schools where students are not succeeding, but critics say it does not provide sufficient financing to help states and districts turn the schools themselves around.

Several of the new reports urged better provisions to ensure that poor and mostly minority schools have quality teachers, to reward teachers who help struggling students improve, and to keep good teachers from leaving city schools for higher-paying suburban ones.

"If I'm in a bad school and make serious progress, I need a reward," Dr. Nettles said. "If you perform on Wall Street, you get a bonus."

But the news is not all bad. Individual schools in some states have made progress in narrowing the gaps between black and white, Hispanic and white, and the poor and more affluent, according to a Standard & Poor's unit that analyzes school performance.

The unit credited Morgan County Elementary School in Madison, Ga., with significantly raising the scores of black fourth and fifth graders. The principal, Jean Triplett, attributed that success in part to after-school tutoring by volunteers in black churches.

Edwin E. Weeks Elementary School in Syracuse was singled out for narrowing the gap between black and white students. Dare Dutter, the principal, credited a prekindergarten program and a school health clinic that helped keep poor students from missing class.

Standard & Poor's has sifted test data from 16,000 schools in 18 states, identifying 718 schools making significant progress toward the national goal.

"They are the classic diamonds in the rough," said Paul Gazzerro, director of analytics at Standard & Poor's School Evaluation Services. "But in general, schools are not closing achievement gaps."

One of the exceptions, the unit said, is Hoover Middle School in Lakewood, Calif., a community in Los Angeles County where the aircraft manufacturing industry has been hit by job losses. The school has raised Hispanic scores so much that in the spring of 2005 Hispanic students outperformed whites, said the principal, Michael L. Troyer. He said the progress resulted from focused instruction, frequent diagnostic testing and several tutoring programs.

"Some of it's after school, teachers do it at lunch, and we have people who tutor in the morning before school, too," Mr. Troyer said.

Across California, however, achievement gaps have not narrowed, and in some cases they have widened since 2001, according to a study of California test results released last week by Policy Analysis for California Education, a research center run jointly by the University of California and Stanford.

"Not only have all boats stopped rising, but the boats that are under water are sinking further down," said Bruce Fuller, an education professor at the University of California, Berkeley, who contributed to the study.

States Struggle To Pay For Roads (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, November 20, 2006

ATLANTA — Traffic delays in the 18-county sprawl that makes up Atlanta are the fourth-worst in the nation. The state gasoline tax, the primary funding source for road and transit projects, is being eroded by inflation. Fifty-three percent of 512 transportation projects scheduled have been delayed, according to the Atlanta Regional Commission, the area's chief planning agency.

Now, an influential lobbying group is proposing that Georgia eliminate the state's share of the gas tax and replace it with a 1% statewide sales tax to fund transportation. Georgians now pay 7.5 cents per gallon in state gas taxes.

"The problem with a gasoline tax, when it's not associated with the Consumer Price Index, is it continues to lose value," says Mike Kenn, president of Georgians for Better Transportation. "Unless we find a new source of revenue, we in the state of Georgia … are not going to be able to meet our transportation needs."

His group's proposal, which he says would raise more money than the state gas tax, is one of many local efforts around the country to bridge the gap between the federal, state and local funds available for transportation and what's needed.

DOJ_NMG_0096278

Nationwide, the gap tops $100 billion a year, says Gary Maring of the transportation consulting firm Cambridge Systematics, which studied the issue last year for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The potentially most far-reaching financing initiative is a pilot program in Oregon that is testing the feasibility of a "virtual tollway" system that would replace the state gas tax with a road-user fee.

Volunteers driving vehicles equipped with state-installed Global Positioning System (GPS) devices pull into gas stations where a transmitter in their car "tells" the pump how many miles they have driven. They then pay for their gas and 1.2 cents for every mile they've driven since their last fill-up; they don't have to pay the 24-cent-per-gallon state gas tax.

The program is raising concerns that it's a way for the government to track motorists and that it penalizes drivers of fuel-efficient vehicles.

James Whitty, who's running the experiment for the Oregon Department of Transportation, says the GPS devices don't transmit or store location data. "This is a stripped-down receiving component that only collects and categorizes miles (driven) as in-state or out-of-state," he says.

If the state decides to adopt the system statewide, the Legislature could implement a lower rate-per-mile for fuel-efficient vehicles, Whitty says.

The year-long experiment began with 280 volunteer motorists who were divided into three groups. One group pays 1.2 cents for every in-state mile traveled. A second group pays 10 cents a mile during rush hour and 0.4 cents per mile during other times. A third group is paying the state's 24-cent-a-gallon gas tax.

Alan Pisarski, author of an exhaustive study on commuting in the USA, expects other states eventually to duplicate the Oregon experiment.

"I think it's almost inevitable in 20 to 30, maybe 40 years," he says. "There will be an awful lot of public concern about vehicles being tracked. But in the long term, we're going to see more and more cars coming off the line with these tracking devices built in."

Public support for taxes targeted for road and transit projects generally did well in the Nov. 7 elections. Voters approved eight local initiatives to extend or renew an existing sales tax for transportation and approved eight of 12 new taxes for transportation, according to the American Road & Transportation Builders Association, a Washington, D.C.-based lobbying group for the transportation construction industry.

Gary Barnes, a transportation economist at the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Minnesota, says voters often will approve a new tax when it's targeted for transportation.

"It doesn't have to do with the money," Barnes says. "It's that people don't feel the (state) Department of Transportation is going to do the right thing with the money if you just raise the gas tax. But in some cases, the referendum passes because it raises taxes to do some specific thing."

Sam Williams, president of the Metro Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, says he thinks voters won't approve the Georgia tax proposal.

"I don't think a 1% state sales tax exclusively for transportation is going to fly," he says. "Places where the congestion is an issue are where people will vote for it. If you're stuck in traffic all day, you would vote for it. But if you're in a sparsely populated area, you have no inclination to vote for it."

Williams says local-option sales taxes for transportation, paid only in congested areas where the money would be used, are more likely to be approved if they meet three criteria: "You've got to tell the voters exactly what you're going to do with the money; you've got to set a sunset so people know the tax is not forever; and you've got to appoint a group of responsible civic watchdogs to look over their shoulder."

Let The Awards Begin: The Worst Self-Inflicted Wound Of 2006 (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

After every election, I offer a list of the best and worst, the most and the least. I started doing that the other day, but I ended up filling an entire column with a single category: The Worst Self-Inflicted Wound of 2006.

I will get back to a more exhaustive list of the best and worst campaigns and candidates before the end of the year, but since there were so many self-inflicted wounds this election cycle, I figure I might as well devote an entire column to the nominees, as well as to my logic in picking a winner.

So, without further DeLay, uh, I mean delay, here are the nominees this year:

Don Sherwood (R-Pa.)

Bob Ney (R-Ohio)

George Allen (R-Va.)

DOJ_NMG_0096279

John Kerry (D-Mass.)
John Sweeney (R-N.Y.)
Mark Foley (R-Fla.)

I know, I know. This is an impossible choice. How can anyone choose from among these all-time, self-inflicted screw-ups? All of the nominees would be worthwhile winners, and in any other year any of them could have taken home the award. But, alas, life isn't fair, and I have to choose a single winner for '06.

I'm eliminating Foley right away, since his self-inflicted wound actually occurred well before his abortive re-election bid and over an extensive period of time, though it came to light only during his campaign. His problem was a series of wounds, not a single one, and frankly, I don't even want to spend time thinking of the things that Foley wanted to do.

Ney's problems also occurred over an extended period, though they obviously impacted his race for re-election. I guess we could call that golf trip to Scotland a decisive event, but it occurred in 2002. So, like Foley, he gets a pass.

That leaves four. The problem with Sherwood is that I'm not sure whether he had a self-inflicted wound or he inflicted a wound on his girlfriend. I am not sure whether we are talking about a single act or two, whether having a girlfriend (along with a wife) and allegedly (note my legal disclaimer) trying to choke her are two self-inflicted wounds or two parts of a single wound. Since Sherwood admits to one but not the other, he seems to come down on the side of the two separate incidents. Who am I to argue? He's off the hook.

Sweeney is in a bit of the same situation as Sherwood. Obviously, the suggestion that the New York Republican got into a physical scuffle with his wife damaged Sweeney's re-election prospects. But was that photograph of him drinking with college students necessary for the second alleged personal scandal to lead to his defeat? If so, then it was the two scandals together that cost Sweeney his seat, not a single self-inflicted wound. I'm afraid I have to drop him from contention.

That leaves us with Allen and Kerry, two Senators who did their best to destroy their reputations with stupid, ill-timed comments that meet the single "wound" criterion.

Somehow, it seems only right that two Senators are battling it out for the award.

On one level, the Kerry comment about getting good grades or you'll end up in Iraq was worse than Allen's "macaca" comment, since Kerry wasn't even on the ballot and, as my wife pointed out, he compounded his goof by insisting that he was trying to tell a joke when he almost certainly wasn't.

Moreover, Kerry's comment could have not only hurt his party's prospects in 2006, he could also have seriously derailed his own presidential hopes for '08. Impacting two election cycles, not just one, with a single comment is a stunning achievement, even for Kerry.

Having said that, even the Massachusetts Democrat couldn't keep his party from winning the House and the Senate. While some conservative talk radio windbags apparently got angry when I expressed doubt that Kerry's comment would have much of an effect on the midterm elections, most voters apparently shrugged off the Massachusetts Democrat's inept remark.

And if Kerry's comment undermined his potential presidential bid for 2008, I doubt it hurt him very much, since his chances weren't very good to begin with.

Allen's "macaca" comment, on the other hand, had a profound impact. It turned a laugher of a race into a close contest. And since Democrat Jim Webb eventually won the race — thereby giving Democrats control of the Senate and unified control of Congress — the Virginia Republican not only brought about his own defeat and destroyed his once considerable chances of winning the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 but he also realigned the nation's entire governing balance for the next two years.

Because of that jaw-dropping achievement, the award for worst self-inflicted wound must go to Allen. But it was a very close contest.

For MSNBC, Time To Get Political (WP)

By Howard Kurtz
The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

Preferably with lots of cameo appearances by big-name news stars from the mothership.

The perennial third-place cable news channel enjoyed a nice bump in the ratings during the midterm campaign, in part because the likes of Brian Williams, Tim Russert, David Gregory and Campbell Brown broke away from their NBC duties to help out.

"We've found a voice as of late, and a large part of that voice is politics," says MSNBC General Manager Dan Abrams. And although he doesn't plan to put on "all politics all the time until 2008," Abrams says he wants to continue "branding" MSNBC as a haven for political junkies.

DOJ_NMG_0096280

Of course, MSNBC has done well in other campaigns, only to have the gains vanish after Election Day. All of cable news tends to get big spikes during major stories -- war, scandal, missing white women -- that fade when the news cycle moves on.

"The chronic problem -- and it will likely happen again in the days ahead -- is a big drop-off back to unpleasant, distant-third reality," says Erik Sorenson, a former MSNBC president.

There's no plan to transform the channel into an extended version of Chris Matthews's "Hardball," but MSNBC covered the House leadership shootout between Jack Murtha and Steny Hoyer with presidential-campaign intensity.

During the midterm campaign's stretch run, Abrams devoted two full days to politics and persuaded some of NBC's heavyweights to anchor hour-long programs. In October, MSNBC's ratings were up 14 percent over a year earlier, while Fox News was down 17 percent and CNN was down 8 percent. Of course, the NBC channel started from a much lower base. Fox averaged 792,000 viewers for the month, CNN 491,000 and MSNBC 287,000. (CNN scored a rare ratings win between 7 p.m. and 2 a.m. on election night, drawing 2.54 million viewers to Fox's 2.39 million and MSNBC's 1.58 million.)

NBC hotshots once looked down their noses at their cable sibling. But Andrea Mitchell, the network's chief foreign affairs correspondent, who made frequent MSNBC appearances during the campaign, is now anchoring an hour most mornings at 11. Although the cable audience is far smaller, "you would not believe the kind of reaction I've had from people I really respect," Mitchell says. As for potential guests, "many people want to do live interviews as opposed to edited interviews where they'll be a 15-second sound bite."

Mitchell also sees a certain synergy, such as when she was interviewing an Iraq expert last week on MSNBC and gleaned information for a piece she was preparing on the subject for NBC's "Today" show.

The network feasted on last week's Democratic infighting, from Matthews's midday appearances to a steady stream of analysts, including Newsweek's Jonathan Alter and Howard Fineman and The Washington Post's Dana Milbank. (The two Post-owned publications share a news alliance with MSNBC.) By contrast with its rivals, MSNBC essentially ignored the controversy over O.J. Simpson's maybe-I-did-it television special and the search for a missing 2-year-old in Florida, and provided modest coverage of a deadly tornado in North Carolina.

The effort by Abrams, the former legal-affairs commentator who took over in June, to tap more NBC talent will be getting an unexpected boost from a painful round of budget cuts at the network. Over the next year, MSNBC will abandon its Secaucus, N.J., campus and move in with its corporate parent at Manhattan's 30 Rock. A number of producers, bookers and others will be let go as job functions are combined. Abrams insists that the impact will be modest because his network is already thinly staffed.

Some of the election coverage was anchored by Joe Scarborough, a former Republican congressman, and Keith Olbermann, whose show "Countdown" has become a nightly feast of Bush-bashing.

"His program could become a model for the newscast of the future," Abrams says. "It's a mix of straight news reporting with lighter fare and occasionally with some opinion."

Some opinion? Not only does Olbermann steer clear of conservative guests, he has added an occasional "special comment" segment in which he recently urged President Bush to apologize to American troops for starting and mishandling the war, going on to suggest that "you are not honest" and "you are far more stupid than the worst of your critics has suggested."

Olbermann said last spring that he is not ideological but that his growing conviction about the administration's failings puts him "in the same part of the ballpark as a lot of liberals."

Scarborough, for his part, says: "I see my job now as someone who holds both parties accountable, and I think I've proven that over the last year. Probably I've held my own party to a higher standard than Democrats. The burden is on me to prove I'm fair and down the middle." Both Olbermann and Scarborough did put aside their views while anchoring campaign news shows.

Abrams, who was no shrinking violet back when he hosted his own show, says CBS is edging in a similar direction in trying to make Katie Couric "accessible and personable. . . . In cable news, the most honest thing we can provide for our viewers is the sense that you know where the host is coming from."Holding Back

For 10 weeks, Denver television reporter Paula Woodward tried to break the story about the Rev. Ted Haggard carrying on a gay relationship. She had the firsthand account of a male prostitute, Mike Jones, and copies of voice mails that Haggard, the head of the National Association of Evangelicals, had left for Jones. But Woodward was so cautious that she lost the scoop when Jones, frustrated by the delays, made his allegations -- under a pseudonym -- on a local radio show.

"We're very comfortable with the way we handled it," Woodward, a KUSA reporter, says. "We knew that the story, if true, would have a very dramatic impact on his life, his family's life and the church."

The station contacted voice experts, who said they could not verify the phone messages without a "first generation" recording of Haggard's voice. So, as Columbia Journalism Review reported, Woodward and her news director decided to use hidden cameras to tape Haggard entering and leaving Jones's apartment. That plan failed because Haggard, who always initiated the visits, stopped contacting Jones.

DOJ_NMG_0096281

After Jones went on the radio show this month, KUSA got an interview with Haggard -- who denied any misconduct -- and was able to use that tape to confirm the authenticity of the voice-mail messages. When the station reported that information the following day, Haggard resigned from the evangelical group and later admitted to sexual "immorality."

Woodward and her news director, Patti Dennis, insist they're not disappointed. "In my mind, we broke the story," Dennis says.Parting Words

It was a routine memo from USA Today's management, telling the staff that reporter Elliot Blair Smith would be leaving the paper for Bloomberg News and thanking him "for his excellent work."

But accidentally attached to the mass e-mail last week was a note from Smith, griping about how his last story was being handled. Smith, whose last day will be Friday, called the piece "the most powerful, the most explosive report on the most important financial story of the year. It required intense dedication. . . . It would take one hour of everybody's time to sit down and iron out any wrinkles that remain. One hour, I have that, don't you?" Smith said they should "close out the relationship with really substantial and meaningful actions, instead of these nice words below."

Well, at least everybody got both sides.

Howard Kurtz hosts CNN's weekly media program, "Reliable Sources."

AHIP Hop (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

Rising costs, an aging population, and a Democratic Congress mean the coming years are sure to see pressure for a larger government role in health care. So it's encouraging that America's private health insurers are thinking about ways to preserve a competitive market for health services. We only wish the proposals they released this month under the banner of their lobby group -- America's Health Insurance Plans -- did more to promote a genuine free market in health care.

AHIP's one really good idea is the creation of something called a Universal Health Account, which would end the tax bias that lets employers deduct health care expenditures but doesn't let individuals do the same. The employer-based private health care system has contributed significantly to cost inflation, because individuals generally aren't sensitive to the price of their treatment decisions. It also contributes to the perceived problem of the "uninsured," because a very large number of the 40-some million Americans classed as such every year are merely between jobs.

Congress took an important step toward equalizing tax treatment and encouraging portable, individually owned polices by creating Health Savings Accounts in the 2003 Medicare bill. HSAs combine a tax-free, high-deductible insurance policy with a tax-free savings account to pay smaller expenses. But while their take-up rate has been impressive, HSAs still represent only a small portion of the market. A Democratic Congress also isn't likely to be friendly to further HSA expansion on the grounds that high-deductible plans are only for the "healthy and wealthy."

Studies of HSA purchasers provide little support for the "health and wealthy" charge. But AHIP's Universal Accounts proposal transcends that debate by suggesting that any type of insurance plan -- even first-dollar coverage, if an individual so chooses -- ought to qualify for HSA-type tax treatment. This is a genuinely innovative proposal.

It wouldn't merely go a long way toward making insurance more affordable for those who don't get it from their employers. It would provide incentives to move beyond the employer-based insurance system. Instead, companies would be free to fund portable insurance policies for their employees much like they fund portable 401(k) retirement accounts. Such a Universal Health Account system would provide more security than the current one, which often keeps sick people tied to jobs for fear of losing coverage. We hope the idea gets a fair hearing.

Now for the bad news. AHIP suggests that the federal government make substantial matching contributions to help lower- and middle-income people buy into the Universal Health Accounts. This isn't necessary to make them affordable, and it might contribute to general health care inflation, just as federal subsidies have done for higher education.

For those at the very low end of the income scale, AHIP proposes bringing more people into Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program (S-CHIP). This strategy was already tried in the 1990s, without making any dent in the number of uninsured. Much of the money simply displaced private spending, and millions of people eligible for Medicaid simply don't bother to sign up.

The biggest disappointment is that the insurers aren't calling for a national market in health insurance -- which is essential if their Universal Health Accounts are to work as well as they should. In addition to the tax code, one of the biggest obstacles to portability and individual policy ownership is that insurance is governed by 50 different sets of state regulations. These rules can make insurance needlessly expensive (as in New York and Massachusetts), and the balkanized market curbs innovation and prevents the development of larger risk pools and economies of scale.

Congressman John Shadegg (R., Ariz.) has a bill that would let individuals in any state purchase insurance that's passed muster with regulators in any other state -- the same way they do with banking products such as credit cards right now. And if that's considered a non-starter for the next Congress, another alternative would be to create an optional federal insurance charter in addition to the 50 sets of state regulations. The current system is a special-interest anachronism in this age of the Internet and global commerce, and some of those special interests are members of AHIP. The Blue Cross/Blue Shield Association, for one, likes fragmentation because it has been able to dominate a number of local markets.

DOJ_NMG_0096282

We understand the internal political limitations of a diverse organization like AHIP, and at least it has proposed an innovative idea in Universal Health Accounts. But if AHIP wants to be taken seriously as a proponent of market-oriented health care solutions, it's going to have to get consistent about letting markets work -- even if that would expose some of its own companies to more competition.

The Taxpayers' Chauffeurs (NYT)

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

The answer to one question raised by the scandal involving State Comptroller Alan Hevesi should be easy: public officials could take public transportation as a matter of public policy.

Instead, a lot of them manage to move from place to place, even from home to work, as comfortably as the very rich. They come and go courtesy of cars and chauffeurs (they like to call them drivers) paid for by taxpayers. And even though it is very hard to figure out how much these fleets actually cost, you can be sure it would be cheaper if these officials took a bus, subway or taxi or even drove and parked their own cars like the rest of us.

Nobody wants to deny a strong car and a beefy driver to an official who needs security, but now that Mr. Hevesi is facing investigations for using a state car and driver for his wife, there should be questions for everybody else in government enjoying those perks. Why, for example, should state agency heads have such unrestricted access to cars and drivers that at least one top official has been accused of using her car and driver to go shopping? Or, if security is the measure, why does a local prosecutor or judge who puts a violent gang member in jail have to drive home alone?

In some cases, chauffeur-driven officials quickly pay the state and the Internal Revenue Service for any personal use. Since he was caught, Mr. Hevesi has so far paid out more than $170,000 to cover the state-financed transport. Other public officials have hastened to repay even modest amounts. State politicians have repeatedly assured reporters in recent weeks that state cars or drivers are not allowed for personal use, but the questions clearly make them nervous. For example, Joseph Bruno, the Senate majority leader, was so irritated and flustered at the very question that he denied having a driver and then reassured everyone that the driver he did have had never done anything inappropriate.

Gov. George Pataki's use of airplanes and limousines has always been hard to track, since his schedule, like much of his administration, is top secret. But that picture is even murkier these days as administration staff members refuse to talk about the policy for car and driver use. They say we might draw a "moral equivalent" between Mr. Hevesi's car use and Governor Pataki's transportation use.

None of this would be a problem if the state would follow Mayor Michael Bloomberg's lead. Mr. Bloomberg, who is rich enough to commute by helicopter, prefers the subway. Early in his first term, he also took away the lights and sirens from New York City administrators accustomed to turning every routine trip across town into a mock emergency.

There are no subways in Albany, and the bus and taxi services are meager. But there is something to be said for anything that reminds public officials that they are no different from other citizens who struggle with traffic jams and subway doors and the ordinary hazards of moving about.

Apec Closes Ranks On N Korea Threat (FT)

By Caroline Daniel, Alan Beattie And Amy Kazmin In Hanoi

Financial Times, November 20, 2006

The 21 members of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (Apec) forum on Sunday presented a united front to North Korea, urging it to start dismantling its nuclear weapons programme.

US officials had wanted a formal published statement to show the combined resolve of countries in the region surrounding North Korea.

But they could manage only an oral statement, which was read out at a private session of the Apec leaders by Nguyen Minh Triet, Vietnam's president. South Korea later issued a transcript.

"The statement was very firm in the need for full implementation of the Security Council Resolutions, 1695 and 1718. What was important was the leaders of Apec coming together in a common statement," said David McCormick, an official at the US National Security Council.

The pressing matter of North Korea overshadowed the supposed substance of the gathering: talks to encourage economic integration in the Asia-Pacific region.

DOJ_NMG_0096283

However, the meeting agreed to commission a study on turning Apec, which stretches from Russia across Asia to the US, into a giant tariff-cutting "regional trade agreement", and gave rhetorical support for the resumption of the stalled Doha round of global trade talks.

But the Apec members made no new offers to reduce their own trade protection to get the Doha talks going again, and admitted that turning Apec into a so-called Free Trade Area of the Asia-Pacific was immensely complex and at best a long-term project.

The FTAAP plan evoked some opposition from business leaders, who said it was unworkable and had distracted attention from the Doha talks.

Apec, which contains a broad range of economies from poverty-stricken dictatorships through oil exporters to rich nations like the US and Singapore, has always taken a voluntary approach to liberalising trade.

Charles Morrison, international chair of the Pacific Economic Cooperation Council, a business grouping, said: "The trade-oriented Apec economies have no real alternative. Since Apec itself has no negotiating mechanism, it must depend on the WTO to achieve liberalisation."

Mr Morrison said that more concessions were needed from Apec members including Japan, Korea and the US in order to induce movement from the "laggards" outside the grouping, including India and the EU.

In bilateral meetings on Sunday, US President George W. Bush met Hu Jintao, China's president, and Vladimir Putin, president of Russia.

Mr McCormick said Mr Bush and Mr Hu had "a very lengthy and very positive discussion on North Korea" and had found "general agreement on the next steps".

Chinese officials ruled out any changes to the UN resolutions, which provide for sanctions against the reclusive communist state.

Liu Jianchao, foreign ministry spokesman, said the resolutions should not be "randomly interpreted" or expanded.

However, he added that the two leaders agreed that "North Korea should get the message that possessing a nuclear bomb will not have the support of the international community".

US officials have sought during the Apec talks to evoke the lessons of Vietnam, as an example to both North Korea and Burma, and to suggest a possible path to international approval.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said the Vietnamese experience was instructive.

"If the leaders of Burma and North Korea were to follow the example of Vietnam, if they made the strategic choice and took the necessary steps to join the international community, then it would open a new path to peace and prosperity," she said.

At Close Of Economic Summit, Participants Offer Support For U.S. Policy On North Korea (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam — — The United States and its partners in the campaign to force North Korea to end its nuclear weapons program won the support Sunday of a broad summit of Pacific Rim nations, the latest effort to step up pressure in slow-moving talks with the isolated Pyongyang government.

The declaration was issued as an informal statement delivered by the conference host, the president of Vietnam, rather than a as a formal paper — a distinction suggesting a less-authoritative step.

It was issued at the conclusion of the annual meeting of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation group, shortly before President Bush, who spent the weekend in Hanoi, flew to Ho Chi Minh City.

Bush came to Asia to attend the Pacific Rim economic summit. But issues of nuclear proliferation and security have formed the backdrop each day of his visit, from a speech in Singapore on Thursday in which he called for broad cooperation throughout the region to corral North Korea's nuclear weapons program, to the likely focus on Islamic-based terrorism this afternoon in Indonesia. Security concerns in Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, were limiting his visit to barely six hours.

At the conclusion of the Hanoi meeting, President Nguyen Minh Triet of Vietnam read a statement saying that North Korea's test of a nuclear device on Oct. 9, and its missile launches three months earlier, posed "a nuclear threat" to peace and security and to the summit nations' goal of a nuclear-free Korean peninsula. He called for full implementation of U.N. Security Council resolutions, which include the threat of sanctions to pressure North Korea to renounce its nuclear weapons program.

The statement came a day after South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun told Bush that his government could not commit to boarding North Korean ships suspected of carrying nuclear-related cargo.

White House officials Sunday cited the statement as a sign that the United States and its allies remained on the same track regarding North Korea. And David McCormick, a deputy White House national security advisor, said the failure to present the declaration as a formal, written document was not a setback.

DOJ_NMG_0096284

In a separate discussion, McCormick said, Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao had agreed "on the path ahead" in dealing with North Korea. McCormick and White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush and Hu had not set specific conditions to present to Pyongyang.

The Korean situation also formed a backdrop to a meeting between Bush and President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia.

China, Russia, Japan, the United States and South Korea, all members of the economic group, have been conducting on-again, off-again talks with North Korea over nuclear weapons. The North has only recently agreed to resume the six-party discussions intended to persuade it to end its weapons efforts, including such steps as the shutting down a five-megawatt nuclear reactor.

"The North Koreans have to demonstrate seriousness," Snow said to reporters aboard Air Force One as Bush flew south to Ho Chi Minh City. Bush has said that among the measures the United States would offer to entice North Korea to cooperate would be a formal declaration that the Korean War, fought more than 50 years ago between the North and South, was at an end. Such a statement has never been made in the past. The summit also produced what U.S. officials presented as a strong commitment to renewed global trade talks, which have broken down despite pledges to liberalize international trade practices through reduced tariffs and subsidies and greater market access.

Reflecting the political pressure that makes trade pacts increasingly difficult to achieve, the summit called for consideration of an already expressed goal of a free-trade zone encompassing the nations of the Pacific Rim in the Americas and Asia.

As expected, U.S. and Russian representatives signed an arduously negotiated trade agreement that is a key step in Russia's joining the World Trade Organization.

The president plans to use his morning schedule today in this vibrant city, still remembered as Saigon — its name until the communists emerged victorious from the Vietnam War in 1975 — to draw attention to the Vietnamese government's program to modernize the economy through market reforms. The national economy grew 8.4% last year.

His planned stops included a visit to a capitalist institution with a decidedly communist name: The Ho Chi Minh City Securities Trading Center — the stock exchange, albeit a state-controlled agency, named after the revolutionary leader.

But while Bush's focus was on economic shifts, Vietnam's record on political and religious rights came into question.

Philosophy professor and political activist Nguyen Chinh Ket said in a conference call with reporters that police agencies prohibited him and several other dissidents from conducting a news conference at the Sheraton Hotel in the glitzy, but small, heart of Ho Chi Minh City. Ket said he was not allowed to leave his home, and another activist was detained by police. Police also interfered with plans of a Buddhist group to conduct a protest Sunday calling for greater freedom of religion in Vietnam, according to the activist.

Bush was to fly out of Ho Chi Minh City from Tan Son Nhat Airport, which was the main air operations center for the U.S. military during the Vietnam War.

Early Sunday morning in Hanoi, the president and Laura Bush attended an interdenominational worship service at the Cua Bac Cathedral that combined elements of the Roman Catholic liturgy and an evangelical service. It was conducted in Vietnamese and largely in song.

"A whole society is a society which welcomes basic freedoms, and there's no more basic freedom ... than the freedom to worship as you see fit," the president said, using his visit to the cathedral to signal continuing pressure on the communist government to allow unrestricted practice of religious beliefs.

His attendance, he said, was "our way of ... urging societies to feel comfortable with, and confident in saying to their people, if you feel like praising God you're allowed to do so in any way you see fit."

The church seats approximately 500 people in wooden pews; it was not full on Sunday.

Leaders Achieve Little On NKorea At Asia Pacific Summit: Analysts (AFP)

By Peter Harmsen

AFP, November 20, 2006

Closed-doors diplomacy at a regional summit in Vietnam came nowhere nearer to resolving the crisis over North Korea's nuclear dream, analysts say -- and may even have made matters worse.

The Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum meeting in Hanoi voiced its "strong concern" over Pyongyang's shock October 9 nuclear test -- unlikely to please the North's easily offended leader Kim Jong-Il, they argued.

Leaders endorsed UN sanctions and called for an early restart to six-party talks on dismantling the North's weapons drive.

"This is most likely to stiffen Kim Jong-Il's resolve," said Ken Quinones, a professor of Korean Studies at Japan's Akita International University.

"He wishes to avoid any appearance of bowing to international pressure."

DOJ_NMG_0096285

A succession of nations attending in Hanoi condemned the North's test, with even old ally China agreeing Pyongyang "should get the message" that the world community would not let it possess nuclear weapons.

But amid the tough talk, the meetings in the Vietnamese capital made little headway beyond a call for "concrete and effective steps" to implement a 2005 deal that would have North Korea renounce nuclear weapons in return for aid.

"Nothing that was achieved at APEC with regards to North Korea could not have been achieved by officials working on the phone," said Paul Harris, an expert on US foreign policy at Hong Kong's Lingnan University.

Expectations had been inflated by the fact APEC brought together leaders from five of the parties in on-off six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program -- the United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia.

They managed to meet in a criss-cross pattern of bilateral and trilateral forums, but never sat down together.

It partly reflected fears that North Korea -- the sixth party -- might feel the rest were ganging up on it and extend a boycott that has left the process in limbo for more than a year.

It also reflected frustration at US international diplomacy, according to observers.

"The assumption was that the Americans would enter the room and try to get everyone to come around to their position. That's not a negotiation," Harris said.

With five nations present but communicating imperfectly, and one absent and communicating hardly at all, there was no easy answer to when a next round of six-nation talks would take place.

Instead, officials came out of meetings with slightly altered versions of the same basic message: Talks should resume as soon as possible, meaning early December, if everyone agreed.

That would seem to rule out November, which had otherwise been raised as a possibility a fortnight before when North Korea agreed to return to the table, possibly forced to do so by UN sanctions triggered by its test.

US officials said Christopher Hill, the chief US delegate to the six-party talks, was to go to Beijing to meet his Chinese counterpart Wu Dawei early this week.

Another much-repeated appeal was for the next round to produce "substantive results".

No one actually described in more specific terms what was meant by this -- probably for good reason, according to observers.

"All of the parties would rather wait and see, so they can define success as whatever happens in the future," said Harris.

Some analysts saw the general absence here of results on North Korea as a failure of US leadership, following the Republican Party's defeat in mid-term elections earlier this month.

"Bush came to Hanoi a lame, walking, quacking duck. The Asian leaders have begun the process of distancing themselves from him," Jeff Kingston, director of Asian studies at Temple University's Tokyo campus, told AFP.

"The brief unity that we saw right in the wake of the nuclear test has unravelled a bit," he said.

As unity seemed ever more elusive, the fate of the six-nation talks may be hanging in the balance, caught in a complex game of bluster and make-believe that was only getting more complicated as time passed, observers said.

"Just like Bush does not wish to reveal that the US election outcome has softened him, Pyongyang likewise wishes to avoid any appearance that UN sanctions has softened it," said Quinones.

"The impasse appears to endure."

APEC Leaders Speak Out On N. Korea Nukes (AP)

By Paul Alexander

AP, November 20, 2006

They would not put it in writing, but the Pacific Rim's often-divergent leaders joined together Sunday to say they worry about North Korea's nuclear weapons program and to urge the reclusive country to resume disarmament negotiations.

The verbal statement capped five days of diplomatic discussions in the aftermath of the North's first nuclear test on Oct. 9, which raised concerns about proliferation in the region. But the method of delivery provided a curious culmination to the issue that overshadowed the economic topics that are the core of the 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum's mission.

Even some of the participants were unsure why the statement was not issued in written form, just orally at the end of the two-day leaders' summit and by Vietnam's president at a news conference after reporters asked him about it.

"We are seeking an explanation for that," Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said. "We don't understand why it wasn't included since it was a joint statement and it was unanimous."

David McCormick, an official with the U.S. National Security Council, denied that getting only an oral statement from the summit represented a setback, and said the White House was pleased with the toughness of the wording.

"The statement was very firm in the need for full implementation" of U.N. resolutions on North Korea, McCormick said. "What was important was that the members of APEC came together on a common statement."

DOJ_NMG_0096286

The statement urged North Korea to take concrete steps to live up to earlier commitments to stop developing atomic bombs.

"We express our strong concern over the July 4-5 missile launches and Oct. 9 nuclear test conducted by (North Korea), which poses a clear threat to our shared interest of peace and security and our shared goal of achieving a nuclear weapons-free Korean peninsula," it said.

Meanwhile, North Korea's Minju Joson newspaper on Sunday accused South Korea of building up arms in order to attack the country.

"The South Korean military is openly clamoring that the development and introduction of new weapons are to target the North," the paper said, according to the country's official Korean Central News Agency. "Confrontation with fellow countrymen is a suicidal act of digging their own graves. War knows no mercy."

Pyongyang accused South Korea of conspiring with the United States to attack the isolated and impoverished state, an accusation made frequently by the North and routinely denied by the U.S.

It appeared that some APEC members, worried about how security and political issues have increasingly impinged on the group's economic focus, felt that the U.N. and other forums are more appropriate for a written statement.

And while North Korea is not an APEC member, some countries are sensitive to the issue of interfering in other nations' affairs.

APEC provided a chance for the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and South Korea to try to work out a unified strategy as they prepare to resume nuclear negotiations with the North a year after it walked out. The talks could resume as early as next month.

President Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao met Sunday and agreed that "North Korea should get the message that possessing a nuclear bomb will not have the support of the international community, but rather will meet opposition," said Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao.

While virtually everyone agrees that North Korea's nuclear weapon and missile tests could lead down a dangerous path to further proliferation, differences remain on the best strategy for dealing with the North, which has used brinksmanship to gain aid and security guarantees.

"I don't think North Korea would want to give up something they regard as something precious to them, something that gives them a certain pride and position," Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi said.

"These are realities that we cannot deny, but if we can give them hope of something else they can get ... maybe it could pave a way to come up with a solution, but it's going to be very difficult."

It appeared that the U.S. did manage to get one North Korea-related addition in the summit's final written declaration which appeared to endorse the financial sanctions that Washington imposed on the North over alleged currency counterfeiting and money laundering. The sanctions sparked North Korea's boycott of the six-party talks.

U.S. Stance On North Korea Hits Hurdles At Summit (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam -- The Bush administration's efforts to raise international pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear program hit a series of roadblocks at a weekend Asian summit.

President Bush came to Vietnam for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi hoping to bolster the coalition of neighboring nations arrayed against North Korea, which sparked global fears after successfully testing a nuclear warhead. The U.S., Russia, China, Japan and South Korea are set to resume negotiations with North Korea in coming weeks, and the White House wants to maintain a united front there.

During his private meetings, Mr. Bush repeated that the U.S. is committed to finding a diplomatic solution to the stand-off and was prepared to give Pyongyang significant political and economic concessions if it dismantled its nuclear program. The other nations, however, made clear that they were unwilling to fully embrace the U.S. strategy, and several suggested they preferred to take a more conciliatory approach.

The U.S. was unable to persuade the other 20 APEC member states to issue a written statement about North Korea's nuclear program. The Bush administration settled for Vietnamese President Nguyen Minh Triet taking the unusual step of delivering a statement to reporters in Hanoi expressing concern about North Korea.

On Saturday, South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun told Mr. Bush that his country wouldn't be "taking part in the full scope" of a U.S.-led plan to interdict North Korean nuclear shipments, the latest sign of the ongoing dispute between Washington and Seoul over how hard a line to take with North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0096287

U.S. officials said they were satisfied with their diplomatic achievements on Mr. Bush's Asian swing, which continues today with a half-day visit to Indonesia. Administration officials noted Mr. Triet's statement was toughly worded and represented the unanimous view of the APEC countries.

White House officials said Mr. Bush used at least one of his private meetings with other leaders to detail the incentives the U.S. was prepared to give North Korea if it gave up its nuclear program. Administration spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Bush told Mr. Hu that the U.S. would be willing to declare an official end to the 56-year-old Korean War, which is technically in a ceasefire, and provide economic aid to communist North Korea. Mr. Snow and other officials have said that the U.S. would be amenable to holding an armistice signing ceremony.

Declaring the conflict at an end could allow Pyongyang to trim its massive military spending and use the money for economic development, officials said. Pyongyang has long sought a peace treaty that formally ends the conflict. Analysts say the North's leader, Kim Jong Il, may be attracted to sharing a stage with leaders from the U.S. and other countries that treat him as an outcast.

The diplomatic efforts follow North Korea's Oct. 9 test of a nuclear device, which provoked widespread condemnation and led the United Nations Security Council to impose new sanctions on the country. Three weeks ago, North Korea said it would return to six-party talks with the U.S. and other countries, which are expected to resume next month in Beijing.

Pacific Rim Statement On N. Korea Falls Short Of What Bush Sought (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam, Nov. 19 -- President Bush arrived in this bustling financial center Sunday after achieving mixed results in his effort to persuade Pacific Rim countries to press North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons.

The two-day Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Hanoi concluded with its members agreeing to an oral statement urging North Korea to follow through on pledges to dismantle its nuclear weapons program.

Bush pressed the leaders at the summit, including Chinese President Hu Jintao in meetings Sunday, to implement a coordinated effort on North Korea. Bush has restated his willingness to offer North Korea incentives, including security guarantees and economic help, if it agrees to disarm, but has promised further isolation if the country refuses.

Bush had hoped for a formal, written declaration from APEC members on the issue but was forced to settle for the statement read aloud by Vietnamese President Nguyen Minh Triet at the summit's closing session.

The statement expressed "strong concern" about North Korea's first nuclear test, which took place in October, and missile launches in July, and called on the country to take "concrete and effective" steps toward abandoning its nuclear weapons as called for in a U.N. resolution.

David McCormick, a deputy national security adviser, called the statement a step forward and said it reflected a "common view on the importance of successful implementation of the resolution."

Weeks after the nuclear test, North Korea agreed to resume negotiations with the United States, Russia, China, Japan and South Korea on ending its program. No date has been set to restart the so-called six-party talks, but Bush administration officials say they want to be certain that North Korea will not use a continuation of the talks to ward off international pressure while it continues to develop weapons.

Bush also met with Russian President Vladimir Putin after the signing of an agreement between the two countries supporting Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization.

"This is a good agreement for the United States," Bush said. "And it's an equally important agreement for Russia."

Bush and Putin discussed the North Korean nuclear question and a proposal for U.N. sanctions against Iran for its nuclear program.

Though the North Korea issue dominated Bush's agenda at the summit, APEC leaders agreed to explore several trade issues, including the possibility of establishing a free-trade zone that would span the Pacific Rim. The leaders also endorsed a plan aimed at preventing the spread of avian flu and AIDS.

APEC, which brings together the leaders of its 21 member nations, also serves as a meeting place for hundreds of leading business executives from around the globe who travel to its annual conferences in search of new opportunities and markets.

The event has served as an opportunity for Vietnam, a one-party Communist state, to showcase its dramatic economic growth and vast economic potential since embracing private enterprise over the past two decades.

During his brief visit to Ho Chi Minh City, Bush was scheduled to attend a meeting of business leaders and visit the stock market.

DOJ_NMG_0096288

Three decades after this city, formerly known as Saigon, fell to Communist forces, ending the Vietnam War, its business center is bursting with activity. Gleaming hotels, chic coffee bars and neon-lit karaoke joints increasingly attract an international clientele to the high-paced hub of commerce.

Bush was set to travel next to Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation. He is scheduled to meet with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono and attend a dinner, but not spend the night. Word of Bush's visit has sparked large protests in Indonesia, as well as threats against Bush from Islamic radicals.

After leaving Indonesia, Bush will fly to Honolulu, where he plans to have breakfast with U.S. troops and meet with military commanders before returning to Washington.

Trade Trumps Politics As U.S. Explores Vietnamese Markets (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam — America's consumer culture is well on its way to doing what the U.S. military could not: win in Vietnam.

From the alleys of Hanoi to the boulevards of Ho Chi Minh City, the ancient arts of silk- and ceramic-making are joined by multinational products from Levi's jeans to KFC chicken to Nike sneakers.

ConocoPhillips has more than $1 billion in oil projects and Ford has a $100 million assembly plant in Vietnam, according to the U.S. Embassy here. Silicon-chip-maker Intel plans to build a $1 billion test-and-manufacturing plant here. Vietnam has a 1,000-plus-member American Chamber of Commerce.

Vietnamese consumers care most about making a living and providing for their families, says Vo Thi Bich Lan, a youth development coordinator in Ho Chi Minh City. “We don't care about the politics.”

Global trade issues dominated the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum President Bush attended this weekend in Hanoi. He sought to expand the U.S. business presence in Vietnam and other parts of Asia.

Bush met with leaders from Vietnam, China, Russia, Japan, Australia and South Korea, urging an expansion of free trade.

However, Bush headed to Vietnam without congressional approval to widen Vietnam trade more quickly.

Today, Bush plans to underscore U.S. commercial ties by visiting Vietnam's stock market before he heads to Indonesia, where crowds Sunday protested Bush's visit.

Normalizing trade relations would ramp up growing investment in Vietnam, three decades after helicopters plucked Americans from Saigon roofs as the communist army closed in.

It's still the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, but “the Vietnamese people are just inherently entrepreneurial,” says Chuck Searcy, an American who lives in Hanoi. Searcy, a Georgia native who raises money to find and disarm unexploded ordnance dropped during the Vietnam War, says locals have a saying about trade: “Three women and a duck make a market.”

Economic expansion helps political freedom, Bush said last week, adding that “by opening up to trade, countries build wealth and empower their citizens.”

Democratic change depends on more than increased economic opportunities, says Diem Do, chairman of the opposition Vietnam Reform Party. The Vietnamese people and international community must also push for change, he says.

Vietnam is still no capitalist paradise, according to a U.S. Embassy report. U.S. companies that want to invest there complain of corruption, the lack of intellectual property rights and too much government bureaucracy, the report said.

U.S. companies are among the top three investors in Vietnam, despite the problems, said Virginia Foote, president of the U.S.-Vietnam Trade Council.

American attempts to reach potential customers can be seen on the narrow streets of Hanoi's Old Quarter, where the streets are named after silk, paper and silversmith guilds that have practiced for six centuries. Battalions of honking motorbikes roar past tube-shaped buildings apt to sell Pampers, Batman dolls or Levi's.

Business seems to be thriving in Ho Chi Minh City. Aggressive young peddlers follow visitors for blocks, selling bike tours, shoe shines or postcards with the same pitch: “Why don't you buy from me? Real cheap. One dollar!”

Though Vietnam has no McDonald's, not far from the former U.S. Embassy compound in Ho Chi Minh City sits Ga Ran Kentucky, a fried-chicken restaurant complete with the smiling, white-goateed visage of Col. Harland Sanders.

In Ben Thanh Market, Kouo Kiev My sells souvenirs, ceramic Buddhas and wooden elephants, and makes $100 a month.

She says the experience should help her move up in the world as she tries to learn English and how to run a business.

“I can meet the customers,” she says. “And I like the money.”

Bush Visits Now Bustling Symbol Of U.S. Defeat (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Helene Cooper

DOJ_NMG_0096289

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam, Monday, Nov. 20 — President Bush ventured into this booming, wildly capitalist commercial center of an ostensibly Communist Vietnam on Monday morning, speeding off to the stock exchange to talk with local business leaders before preparing for a quick visit to Indonesia.

His visit here, where he was also to tour the government-run Pasteur Institute to highlight work on avian flu and AIDS prevention and treatment, concludes three days in the country that have been dominated by his efforts to hold together reluctant partners — notably China, South Korea and Russia — to step up pressure to dismantle the nuclear programs of Iran and North Korea.

In both cases, he found progress agonizingly slow, though there was more evidence of unity in dealing with North Korea.

On Sunday, Mr. Bush formally signed an agreement that paves the way for Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, a step that China took years ago and that Russia has long struggled to match.

As he has throughout his trip, Mr. Bush has avoided dwelling on America's past with Vietnam, though it is difficult in a city like this one, filled with so much potent symbolism of American defeat.

For many Americans, the imagery of this teeming, chaotic place is fixed in 1975, when the last Americans were evacuated by helicopter. Mr. Bush sped past the evacuation spot on his arrival here, but made no stops that would invite comparisons to the current debate over whether the United States should stay or retreat from Iraq.

He steered clear of the other sites that so dominated American politics in his youth, and spent the night at one of the gleaming new hotels that dot the skyline, rather than one of the old haunts, like the Continental, the Rex and the Caravelle, where official Washington once struggled to manage a losing effort.

Instead, he made an unannounced stop for dinner with Prime Minister John Howard of Australia at a trendy restaurant in a neighborhood that symbolizes the new Saigon — the name local people insist on using for a city that was renamed immediately after the Communist victory.

After dinner, Mr. Bush mounted the running board of his waiting limousine and waved to a crowd of curious, mostly younger Vietnamese who jammed the streets as news of his arrival spread. There were muted cheers.

In a trip that has focused relentlessly on the future, Mr. Bush urged China's leader, Hu Jintao, to create "a nation of consumers and not savers, which will inure to the benefit of our manufacturers, both large and small, and our farmers, as well." It was an echo of what Mr. Bush's father used to urge in his visits to Japan, in hopes of closing the trade gap.

At the meetings of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Hanoi over the weekend, Mr. Bush talked about exploring new free trade arrangements for Asia — a long-sought but still distant goal — and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice used the case of Vietnam as an instructive example of economic reform.

In a speech in Hanoi, she said that "20 years ago the leaders of Vietnam took a hard look at their isolated economy, and they made a strategic choice to begin reforms." In fact, they have turned to serious reforms only in recent years.

Mr. Bush's spokesmen said that he and the leaders of Japan and China saw "eye to eye" on steps needed to press North Korea.

But the spokesmen did not use those words to describe talks with the South Koreans, who have been particularly reluctant to fully join efforts to intercept suspected illicit shipments of arms, or to cut off economic links after the North's nuclear test.

Christopher R. Hill, the chief American negotiator with North Korea, is to fly to Beijing this week to try to work out a mix of incentives for the North and to persuade the Chinese to push for a symbolically important dismantling of part of North Korea's weapons complex. That last step is one the North Koreans have not yet indicated they are ready to take before negotiations resume.

Russia has continued to balk about imposing major sanctions against Iran, which has continued to defy a United Nations Security Council call for full suspension of its enrichment of uranium.

Rather than dwell on those differences in public, Russian and American officials celebrated an agreement to allow Russia to enter the W.T.O. after 10 years of stop-and-go negotiations, and talks that began shortly after the collapse of the Soviet Union.

"We support Russia's accession into the W.T.O.," President Bush announced in Hanoi after a meeting with President Vladimir V. Putin on the outskirts of the Asia-Pacific meeting.

American officials said the agreement with Russia was reached in principle more than a week ago, after the two countries gradually worked out nagging disputes on issues like agriculture inspections, chicken exports to Russia and intellectual property protection.

Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative, said the pact should bring a significant increase to global trade.

Her Russian counterpart, Economy Minister German Gref, was equally effusive at the signing ceremony on Sunday. "Undoubtedly, this agreement is a very substantial milestone in the full integration of Russia into the global economy," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0096290

Mr. Putin has repeatedly said that joining the W.T.O. is a major foreign policy goal, although Russia's oil-driven economy will get few direct gains from membership in the organization, which sets the ground rules for globalization. But joining would give Russia a voice in world trade talks, with the potential to help set future trade policy.

The agreement with the United States means that Russia has passed the last major barrier to its entry into the 149-member world trade entity.

But Russia still must win approval from Moldova and Georgia, countries with grievances over a Russian ban on importing wine. Those countries could further delay a final deal on W.T.O. membership, although trade officials have said they expect that Russia will manage to find a way to resolve the issue.

Forum Vows To Revive Trade Talks (WSJ)

By James Hookway

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

HANOI, Vietnam -- The U.S. and other Pacific Rim countries said they were prepared to cut farm subsidies and tariffs to revive stalled world trade talks, putting pressure on other economic powers such as the European Union, Brazil and India to follow suit.

Leaders at the summit of the 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum also said they would consider a free-trade area of their own if the global talks fail.

The initiative may not break the deadlock over politically sensitive farm subsidies that stalled the so-called Doha Round of talks, which began in 2001 under the auspices of the World Trade Organization. Some trade officials attending the summit say global trade talks could remain on hold despite the offer.

Without detailing specific measures, the Pacific Rim countries said they would be ready to cut subsidies, but added that "other [countries] must also signal their readiness and resolve" to do the same.

The EU's trade chief said APEC's offer could lead to a fresh round of Doha discussions next year. "If all negotiating partners live up to the terms of that statement, then we have a greater hope of a resumption of negotiations," EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson told reporters in New Delhi.

In a closing statement of the APEC summit, the leaders warned that failing to secure a WTO trade deal could have "grave" economic consequences. In case global talks don't resume, APEC leaders agreed to study a possible backup plan: a free-trade area covering the Pacific Rim's largest economies and including countries that now account for about half the world's trade. APEC members include the U.S., Japan, South Korea, China, Russia, Australia, the 10 members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and several Latin American states.

Several leaders at the summit said the resumption of the WTO talks was the ideal way to push the free trade agenda, but they added they were willing to consider alternative options, such as a Pacific Rim free trade agreement, if necessary. "The key game has to be the WTO," said New Zealand Prime Minister Helen Clark. "But if Doha stumbles so badly that it went into suspension for years, then of course a [free trade] agreement which covers...60% of the world economy is very attractive for us."

The idea of an APEC free-trade area was introduced in 2004. It was quickly dropped, largely because hopes were still high the WTO negotiations could provide a more direct route to freer trade.

The U.S. revived the idea this year, in part, trade analysts say, to create momentum to nudge talks at the WTO back on track. President Bush pushed the plan during his meetings with several regional leaders, said the U.S. deputy national security adviser for foreign affairs, David McCormick.

The U.S. is also wary that China is pushing for its own free-trade pact with the dynamic economies of Southeast Asia, including Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

At the same time, Washington's own bilateral free-trade discussions with Malaysia, South Korea and Thailand have become bogged down.

The authority for American trade negotiators to seal deals without line-by-line scrutiny in Congress is also set to expire in the middle of next year. After the Democratic Party won control of Congress in the midterm elections this month, it is uncertain whether that authority -- which has already produced free-trade deals with Australia and Singapore -- will be extended.

Russia Signs Key Trade Deal With U.S. (AP-Y)

By Alex Nicholson

AP, November 20, 2006

Russia and the United States signed a key trade agreement Sunday, removing the last major obstacle in Moscow's 13-year journey to join the World Trade Organization.

DOJ_NMG_0096291

The deal, inked on the sidelines of a gathering of Pacific Rim economies, is a powerful vote of confidence in Russia — the largest economy still outside the 149-member WTO — and signals its integration into the global trading system.

It also marks a bright spot in the two countries' relations that have been marred by disagreements over Iran's controversial nuclear program and Washington's fears of a roll back of democratic freedoms under Russian President Vladimir Putin.

"I am very pleased to be here today to have the opportunity to celebrate this very important milestone as Russia moves one important step closer to becoming a member of the WTO," said U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab.

"Russia belongs as a full-fledged member of the WTO," she said. "We look forward to continuing these efforts to improve the economic and commercial ties between our two nations."

Russia's Trade and Economic Development Minister German Gref called the deal a "historic step — the last step — that signifies the return of Russia to the market principles of the world economy."

As part of the deal, Gref said that Russia had pledged to cut import tariffs on a range of goods — including aircraft, computer technology, agriculture and machinery.

Speaking after the signing ceremony Gref defended those concessions. "I think we found the necessary balance. On all positions that were sensitive for us we found a compromise."

The two countries also managed to overcome the high-profile question of Russia's shaky record on protecting intellectual property rights. Pirated films, music and software in Russia cost U.S. companies nearly $1.8 billion in 2005.

Schwab said that while talks with Russia on the piracy question would continue at the stage of multilateral negotiations, she expressed satisfaction with Russia's progress: "We believe that the bilateral agreement is very good."

Before it can join the WTO, Russia must consolidate the bilateral agreements it has forged with 57 countries. Gref said he expected that process to be completed by the middle of next year.

After that, the WTO needs to vote to approve its membership. But some questions remain.

Georgia and Moldova have threatened to block Russia's bid because Moscow has blocked key exports from those nations.

"Without Georgia's consent, Russia will not join this organization. And Georgia has not given its consent so far," Deputy Economic Development Minister Vakhtang Lezhava said on Georgian television.

Gref warned Georgia against "influencing trade issues through political means."

"Hopefully in the near future we will come to an agreement with Georgia," he was quoted as saying by the ITAR-Tass news agency.

Membership in the WTO would mean Russia, a big oil and gas exporter, would receive the same favorable tariff rates for its products as other members. Also, Russia and other member countries would have to follow WTO rules in trade disputes.

Freer trade would give Russian companies more opportunities to sell their goods on world markets. Joining the WTO also might make its sizable market of potential customers even more attractive to companies in the U.S. and elsewhere.

"This creates a favorable background for all our activities, including solving complicated international problems," Putin said after holding a bilateral meeting with President Bush after the conclusion of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit.

The deal was widely anticipated. On Nov. 10, both sides announced that all the main questions had been settled and all that remained was for a few technical questions to be nailed down.

Before the U.S. can trade with Russia under a WTO agreement, Washington must establish normal trade relations with Moscow.

For that, Congress would still have to pass legislation removing Russia from the 1974 Jackson-Vanik amendment, which ties Russia's trade status to whether the country is allowing Jews to freely leave the country.

Though the amendment is widely considered an anachronism, the newly elected Congress, which convenes in January, will be controlled by Democrats, who are less receptive to free-trade agreements than Republicans.

About four months ago, U.S. and Russia had appeared on the verge of an agreement. But in a major embarrassment for Moscow, it failed to materialize — right before the summit of leaders of the world's wealthiest countries that Putin was hosting in St. Petersburg.

Observers have suggested that the deal with the U.S. may have been used as a political incentive to encourage Moscow to back a U.S. proposed sanctions package, punishing Iran for its controversial nuclear program.

Beijing, Seoul To Talk Trade (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

BEIJING -- China and South Korea will start talks next year on the feasibility of a free-trade agreement, China's official Xinhua news agency reported.

Xinhua said an agreement on the talks was reached at a meeting late Friday between Chinese Commerce Minister Bo Xilai and South Korean Trade Minister Kim Hyun Chong.

DOJ_NMG_0096292

The negotiations will be held at government and industry levels.

The exploratory talks "will look into the effect of the FTA on the macroeconomies of both countries, the effect of trade liberalization on industries, [and] the arrangements for sensitive products and industries," Xinhua said.

China replaced the U.S. as South Korea's largest trading partner in 2004, while South Korea is China's sixth-largest trading partner and its fourth-largest source of overseas investment, Xinhua said.

South Korea is also working on a free-trade agreement with the U.S. The two nations held a fourth round of talks last month but won't wrap up negotiations on an agreement this year as originally planned.

Weakened Bush Must Wage Fight For Free Trade (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, November 20, 2006

Having failed to convince fellow Republicans of the merits of comprehensive immigration reform, President Bush now faces the even more difficult task of defending free trade against protectionist Democrats.

A tide of populism, protectionism, nationalism and xenophobia is washing over the country, fueled by right-wing radio talk show hosts, CNN firebrand Lou Dobbs — and legitimate concerns that U.S. workers are falling behind in the global struggle for jobs and good wages.

Anti-globalization is a worldwide phenomenon, in fact, that's being exploited by populist demagogues such as Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, whose influence is spreading in Latin America.

Even though his influence is at its all-time lowest ebb, Bush somehow needs to mount a campaign to convince Americans that their continued prosperity depends on an open world trading system.

Election exit polls confirmed that the country generally supports Bush on immigration — 57 percent of voters said illegal workers should have a chance to stay in the country — but other polls indicate Americans are fearful about trade.

A Gallup Poll in April showed that by a margin of 65 percent to 30 percent, Americans believe workers are "mostly hurt by increased trade between the United States and other countries."

Last July, the House passed the Central American Free Trade Agreement by a mere two votes, with only 15 Democrats in support. That history bodes ill for Bush's upcoming trade agenda, including renewal of "fast-track" negotiating authority and the already-negotiated agreements with Peru and Colombia.

The House last week even declined to pass an agreement with Vietnam that totally benefited the U.S. by opening Vietnam's markets to U.S. goods, in the process embarrassing Bush as he was headed to the Asian economic summit in Hanoi.

The rejection stemmed partly from other reasons, such as antipathy toward the high-handedness of outgoing House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), and the bill is slated to pass eventually. But it was still a symbolic post-election bash to the idea of free trade.

By one estimate, 27 victorious Democratic House candidates campaigned at least partly against free trade. Ohio's winning Senate candidate, Rep. Sherrod Brown (D), is one of Congress' most vociferous opponents of trade agreements, including those promoted by the administration of former President Bill Clinton.

What's more, with the ascendancy of China critic Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to Speaker, U.S. relations with that trading giant likely will come under pressure. Congress may well pass an across-the-board 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports as punishment for China's manipulation of its currency.

Bush almost certainly would veto the measure, which is sponsored by Sens. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), but the exercise will put the administration on defense.

Moreover, a Democratic Congress is likely to increase farm subsidies, making it all the more difficult to win the market-opening concessions from Europe that are needed to revive the stagnant Doha round of world trade negotiations.

The administration needs to mount a four-part strategy: a vigorous public education process to change attitudes on the merits of trade, an aggressive effort to fight trade cheating by China and other rivals, a serious upgrade of programs to help workers cope with the effects of trade, and a change of policy on including labor and environmental standards in future trade agreements.

Bush, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and others have delivered their share of speeches on trade, but Bush needs to devote a substantial portion of his State of the Union address to the subject and motivate pro-trade forces in the country to educate the public.

The fact is, exports of goods and services accounted for 10.4 percent of U.S. gross domestic product in 2005 and 20 percent of GDP growth for the year.

Manufacturing exports have increased 82 percent over the past decade, and they provide more than 5.2 million jobs, one-sixth of all the manufacturing jobs in the country. One-third of all agricultural acreage in the U.S. is planted for export.

DOJ_NMG_0096293

Moreover, imports help control prices in the U.S. — a benefit that makes Wal-Mart a boon to the middle class, not a blight — and U.S. investments in the U.S. ("insourcing") are responsible for 6.4 million jobs.

If U.S. markets are closed to foreign products, other countries will close their markets to U.S. exports, costing jobs and economic growth both here and all over the world. Developing countries, especially, will be doomed to poverty — and discord — if they cannot sell their products in the developed world.

Bush administration officials insist they are doing all they can to combat unfair trade practices by China and other countries, but they will have to be more public — and, if needed, confrontational — as part of an effort to win public support for free trade.

As even Paulson acknowledged in his first public speech in August, "Many Americans aren't feeling the benefits" of the expanding U.S. economy. Productivity gains are benefiting upper-income and well-educated Americans, but not average workers.

Wage growth was stagnant for the first five years of the Bush administration. Real wage growth for the past year was 2.8 percent, but it has come late in the recovery, amid signs that the economy already is softening.

Administration officials say the productivity-wage lag for less-educated workers is a 25-year phenomenon and that the answer is improving worker skills. If that is the administration's only answer, it needs to be more aggressive in promoting it.

At the same time, it ought to work with Democrats to find other solutions, such as Brookings Institution scholar William Galston's idea for a wage-insurance program, akin to the unemployment insurance system, which would protect workers against income losses.

In the new Congress, incoming House Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.) says he foresees cooperating with the administration on trade, but Democrats will demand more attention to trading partners' labor and environmental standards.

Administration officials say other nations aren't willing to have the U.S. dictate their wage rates or emissions levels — as the AFL-CIO seems to demand — but the U.S. will have to win some new concessions or risk having trade pacts rejected by Congress.

Expansions in free trade have caused the U.S. and the world to advance economically and politically since the end of World War II, but those gains are in danger of coming to a crashing halt unless there's a counter to ascendant protectionism.

Breaking The Trade Deadlock (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

The trick in the new era of divided government is to find deadlock-breakers: issues that advance the agendas of both sides as well as the interests of the country.

In domestic economic policy, the best deadlock-breaker is tax reform. The existing tax deductions for health care, home mortgages and savings are outrageously skewed in favor of the rich, so Democrats should want to restrict them. Restrictions would save the Treasury billions, advancing the Republican goal of keeping marginal tax rates as low as possible.

In international economic policy, the right deadlock-breaker is less obvious. The two parties have opposing attitudes on the subject of trade: Republicans see it as a source of growth, Democrats as a source of inequality. This split is undermining the U.S. ability to play its traditional postwar role in driving global trade liberalization. And if anti-trade Democrats can win elections when unemployment stands at 4.4 percent, they may do even better next time.

To an extent that neither party acknowledges, the popular formula for bridging this divide is bankrupt. Ever since the passage of the North American Free Trade Agreement in 1993, this formula has consisted of jamming labor and environmental protection into trade pacts. But the real reason Democrats oppose trade has little to do with foreigners' stance on union rights or endangered species and a lot to do with the fact that trade harms some U.S. workers. Mexico could abide by every convention of the International Labor Organization and still undercut U.S. wages -- and Democrats who represent displaced American workers would still detest NAFTA.

So labor and environmental clauses will never reconcile Democrats to trade. To forge a bipartisan consensus, we need a different approach. Here is a three-part formula.

First, Democrats need to be honest about development in the poor world. It's wrong to pretend that labor regulations, whether inserted in trade agreements or adopted by governments, are a powerful engine of rising living standards in developing countries: Weak governments have no means of enforcing them. Some of the greatest anti-poverty success stories -- South Korea in the 1970s, Indonesia in the 1980s, China over the past 15 years -- took place in authoritarian countries where labor regulations were puny.

The real key to raising living standards is economic growth. And growth, in turn, is highly correlated with trade openness. One World Bank study showed that poor countries whose trade grew as a share of the economy recorded gains in income of 5 percent per year in the 1990s; by contrast, poor countries whose trade did not expand had no income gains whatever. So Democrats need to accept that holding up trade agreements to insert labor protections is going to harm workers, not help them.

DOJ_NMG_0096294

Instead, Democrats should be frank about their real reason for ambivalence on trade, which is that some Americans suffer from it. This gets to the second part of the formula: Republicans need to get serious about the fact that, since 1980 or so, real incomes for the majority of Americans have stagnated. Republicans cannot expect support for trade unless they do more to compensate workers who get hit by globalization. They should be working with Democrats to improve the social safety net, linking progress on that front to continued trade liberalization.

Finally, both parties should cooperate on overhauling the nation's farm program, which comes up for renewal next year. The existing subsidy regime lavishes more than $20 billion a year on farmers, almost twice what gets spent on subsidizing college for poor children. About 70 percent of the money goes to the richest 10 percent of farmers, so the rhetoric about supporting struggling family farms is hogwash. This is corporate welfare for agribusiness, and neither party should defend it.

But a burst of farm reform would not just be good in itself. It would unlock trade liberalization. The Doha round of global trade talks, which promises benefits far greater than the bilateral and regional deals now pending in Congress, has bogged down over agriculture: The Bush administration proposed some cuts in subsidies, but not enough to shame the Europeans into offering serious tariff reductions, and so the whole deal faltered. If the new era of divided government produced a bipartisan push for farm reform, Doha could be resuscitated.

Of course, it's a long shot. But the Bush administration now has a pragmatic deal maker at Treasury who is passionate about trade, and the Democratic leadership in Congress has no particular love for farm subsidies. Meanwhile, anti-poverty groups are planning a lobbying drive on farm reform. Bread for the World, a faith-based alliance that claims to generate half a million constituency contacts with Congress annually, aims to focus half of these on the farm bill next year.

Bush Spreads Gospel Of Religious Freedom (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 20, 2006

Though no sermon was delivered Sunday in the church where President Bush took a "moment to converse with God," he offered his own precept outside.

"A whole society is a society which welcomes basic freedoms," Bush said, adding that there's none more basic than "the freedom to worship as you see fit."

Bush and his wife, Laura, visited Cua Bac Church, a Catholic basilica on a tree-lined street in the diplomatic district, to show support for Vietnam's faithful, who live under a government that tightly controls religious institutions.

"It's our way of expressing our personal faith and at the same time urging societies to feel comfortable with and confident in saying to their people, `If you feel like praising God, you're allowed to do so in any way you see fit,'" said Bush, on his first visit to communist Vietnam to attend the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum.

Music dominated the Vietnamese-language ecumenical service. English-speaking parishioners understood a few words, including "Amen" and "alleluia."

Just this month, the United States removed Vietnam from a list of the world's worst violators of religious freedom.

But human rights groups say restrictions remain.

Nguyen Quoc Khanh, the priest at Cua Bac Church, reported that Bush said nothing during the service.

"We all had a silent dialogue with God," Khanh said.

___

Bush beamed in baby blue. So did Chinese President Hu Jintao. Russian President Vladimir Putin, too.

Diplomacy over, world leaders faced one final, inescapable task at the end of their annual summit — donning the host country's costume.

Leaders at the APEC summit were invited to slip traditional Vietnamese "ao dai" silk tunics over their Western-style suits for the annual group photo — by far the most colorful ritual on their agenda.

The normally dour Hu was positively beaming. Putin joked cordially with Bush. The wide pink turbans worn by the three women leaders gave diminutive Philippine President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo a few extra inches of height.

The custom-tailored, ankle-length ao dai, pronounced "ow zai," usually has a snug fit that is said to "reveal everything but show nothing."

But those the leaders wore appeared designed not to reveal too much. Fashioned by famous Vietnamese designer Minh Hanh, they afforded the leaders — most of whom have ample girths — a fairly comfortable fit.

Sky blue was the most popular color among men, with a smattering of reds, greens and yellows for a diplomatic rainbow effect.

DOJ_NMG_0096295

The traditional ao dai includes a long tunic with slits up the sides.

The custom of posing in clothing symbolic of the host country began when the leaders wore leather bomber jackets at the first APEC summit in Seattle in 1993.

___

Buried in a White House list of accomplishments from the summit was cheery news for foreign travelers: A faster way to get through U.S. airports.

It's the APEC Business Travel Card. Don't leave home without it.

The U.S. plans to start recognizing the card, which has existed since 1997.

Business travelers carrying one can look forward to speedier processing in fast-track lanes at major U.S. airports.

Cardholders must have a passport from a participating country, travel regularly to conduct trade in the APEC region and have no criminal record.

They also don't have to apply individually for visas or entry permits every time they travel to a country in the program. The card becomes their visa.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking to world business leaders at the summit on Saturday, touted the card as a way to foster trade and travel.

"Everywhere I go, I hear about the visa issues," Rice said. "Let me assure you that the United States of America wants to be open — open and secure — but open to a free flow of people."

Indonesians Protest Ahead Of Bush Visit (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, November 20, 2006

Warmly greeted by world leaders in Vietnam, President Bush drew a different reaction Sunday at his upcoming stop in Indonesia, where thousands angrily protested America's policy in the Middle East and wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The White House said it was confident about security precautions for Bush's visit Monday despite police warnings of an increased threat of attack by al-Qaida-linked groups.

The president was to spend just six hours in Indonesia, most of it at Bogor Palace, a presidential retreat outside the capital of Jakarta and far from the scene of protests Sunday where Bush was denounced as a "war criminal' and "terrorist."

While President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono is a close U.S. ally in the war on terror, Bush is highly unpopular in Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation.

Wrapping up three days in Vietnam, Bush was taking a quick look around this city once known as Saigon. He planned to drop by the stock exchange, meet with business leaders and visit the Pasteur Institute for a briefing on its research on HIV/AIDs and other public health problems.

It was Bush's first appearance on the world stage since his Republican Party lost control of Congress and was rebuked for the unpopular war in Iraq.

The White House said Bush was pleased by the results of a 21-nation Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi although the administration was left struggling to explain how it ended.

To Bush's dismay, he was unable to deliver a promised agreement on normal trade relations with Vietnam. It was snarled in Congress but the administration expressed confidence it eventually would be approved.

Vietnam's economy is booming, the fastest growing in Asia, and the country is the world's second-largest exporter of rice. But the benefits have not reached most people. The per capita income is less than $700 a year.

In a city usually teeming with motorcycle traffic, streets were cleared for Bush's motorcade. As he rode by, people waved, laughed and cheered. It was a contrast to the subdued reaction of residents in Hanoi, where Bush participated in the summit and conferred with the leaders of China, Russia, South Korea and Japan.

The White House pronounced itself satisfied with the summit statement prodding North Korea to return to nuclear disarmament talks and urging nations to keep the pressure on by enforcing U.N. Security Council sanctions.

But the administration was at a loss to explain why the statement was simply read as part of the chairman's wrap-up statement, and not issued as a written document. Another oddity was that the section about North Vietnam was not translated into English when the statement was read.

"He read it in Vietnamese, but for whatever reason the translation was not given in the consecutive English translation at the time," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. "We have double checked. The Vietnamese said `Yes, he did read it.'"

Bush met separately with Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao to discuss strategy for yet-to-be-scheduled talks with North Korea. The administration sent U.S. envoy Christopher Hill to Beijing for further consultations.

DOJ_NMG_0096296

In their public remarks, Bush and Putin celebrated a U.S.-Russia agreement for Moscow's entry into the World Trade Organization. Bush said Russia's admission to the group was "good for the United States and good for Russia."

With Putin and Hu, Bush also pressed for a U.N. Security Council resolution to pressure Iran to abandon nuclear weapons. It was unclear whether Bush made any headway in persuading China and Russia to drop their reluctance to go along.

Describing Bush's discussions with Putin, Snow said the leaders did not discuss specifics "but they understand that you need a strong resolution that will send the Iranians the clear message that we're not only united, but serious, and at the same time are going to offer them the opportunity to have civil nuclear power, which is of some importance to the Iranian people."

Bush Protesters Gather In Jakarta (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam -- Thousands of protesters took to the streets of Jakarta and hundreds of police erected a barbed-wire barricade around the presidential palace a day before President Bush visits Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim country.

While Mr. Bush spent the day in Vietnam, more than 10,000 angry Muslims marched in Indonesia's capital, where one protester held a sign with a photo of the American president and the slogan, "Wanted: Dead or Alive." Another placard said in English, "Bush: Muslim's Enemy No. 1."

Dozens of trucks and buses full of police and military troops were dispatched to put up a makeshift barricade on the street at the front of the Bogor Palace, which is guarded by hundreds more police. Mr. Bush arrives in Indonesia today for a six-hour visit before flying on to Hawaii, the last stop on his Asian tour.

Despite the protests in Jakarta, the United States is viewed positively by many Indonesians for its swift response to the tsunami that struck the islands nearly two years ago, killing 100,000. Almost 60 percent of Indonesians surveyed nationwide said that American assistance made them favorable to the United States, according to Terror Free Tomorrow, a nonpartisan group that includes Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, as an adviser.

Meanwhile yesterday, the president urged Chinese President Hu Jintao to join forces with his neighbors to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear program.

Keeping up pressure on member countries of six-party talks that have fallen apart, the president urged Mr. Hu to use China's clout to persuade reclusive leader Kim Jong-il to stop North Korea's atomic expansion.

"China is a very important nation, and the United States believes strongly that by working together, we can help solve problems such as North Korea and Iran," Mr. Bush told Mr. Hu in a meeting on the margins of the 21-nation Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit.

While Mr. Hu made no mention of North Korea in his remarks, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said that the Chinese president had called for "wisdom and patience" in dealing with Pyongyang, whose Oct. 9 nuclear test and July missile launches shocked the world.

China is the second nation to pull back slightly from the goals of the six-party talks, in which China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and United States seek to force North Korea's hand. South Korea said on Saturday that it could not endorse a call to search ships coming and going from North Korea, the world's largest nuclear exporter.

After his bilateral talk with Mr. Hu, Mr. Bush stressed the need for U.N. member states to comply with a U.N. Security Council resolution that bans trade of goods and transfer of funds to the North that could aid its nuclear arms programs.

But again, China expressed reservations. "We don't really think that sanctions are the purpose, rather it is the means. The U.N. Security [Council] resolution should not be randomly interpreted and should not be expanded," Mr. Liu said.

In Hanoi, before departing the APEC meetings for Ho Chi Minh City, David McCormick, an official of the White House National Security Council, said that the two leaders had agreed "on direction and next steps" on North Korea, but he declined to be more specific. Another White House source said that loose agreements had been made, but that North Korea's neighbors do not want to roil the water by making demands on Mr. Kim.

Later yesterday, Mr. Bush met Russian President Vladimir Putin and again discussed both North Korea and Iran. At the conclusion of the APEC forum, the members issued only a verbal statement that said in part: "We express our strong concern over the July 4-5 missile launches and October 9 nuclear test conducted by [North Korea], that poses a nuclear threat to our shared interest of peace and security and our shared goal of achieving a nuclear weapons-free Korean Peninsula."

Mr. Bush, who will visit the stock exchange in Ho Chi Minh City before flying today to Indonesia, also gave Mr. Hu a gentle nudge on trade. The U.S. trade deficit with China so far this year is expected to exceed last year's record of $202 billion. Mr. Bush said that disputes between the two nations are inevitable but that they could be addressed in a "spirit of mutual respect and a desire to work through our problems."

DOJ_NMG_0096297

A few hundred miles south, across the Java Sea, Indonesians clashed with police and planned to disrupt the president's visit. Indonesia is a key regional ally for the United States, but many Muslims there oppose the president's Middle East policies and the war in Iraq.

Aside from Jakarta, demonstrations were also reported in South Sulawesi province, Yogyakarta and Bogor, the site of Mr. Bush's visit. The short stop will be his last in Asia before returning home from a trip that also took him to Singapore and Vietnam.

The president has tried to mute criticism before going to Indonesia, securing $55 million in U.S. aid for anti-corruption and childhood immunization programs.

Indonesia has seen several deadly bomb attacks in recent years against Western targets and blamed on Islamic militants, including the 2002 Bali bombings that killed 202 persons, mostly foreign tourists.

Indonesia's Promise (WSJ)

By Sadanand Dhume

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

When President Bush arrives in Indonesia today, he'll find perhaps the most dramatic reversal of fortunes in recent times. Barely a decade ago, the country was a poster child of the East Asian miracle, lauded by the World Bank for having pulled tens of millions out of poverty and increasingly mentioned in the same breath as Korea and Taiwan. Today, to the extent that Indonesia occupies any space in the popular imagination, it is viewed as a sort of Southeast Asian Bangladesh: a cesspool of corruption, buffeted alternately by terrorist violence and natural disasters.

Yet, for all its exceptional problems, the world's most populous Muslim country also presents an exceptional opportunity. Apart from Turkey, it is the only major Muslim country where modernity stands a fighting chance, or to put it starkly, where the options are not between bad and worse, but between good and bad.

To be sure, as in other parts of the Muslim world, both orthodox practice and Islamist politics have metastasized over the past three decades. But Indonesia boasts advantages that others lack: an innate tolerance bequeathed to its people by nearly a millennium and a half of Hindu-Buddhism that predated Islam's arrival in the 1400s, and a non-sectarian national ideology, Pancasila, that departs from the Islamic norm of treating non-Muslims as second-class citizens. In practical terms this means that the cornerstones of modernity -- women's rights, respect for minorities, room for a skeptical view of faith -- have not been entirely eroded. Building upon these to create a beacon of moderation on Islam's eastern flank, a twin for Kemalist Turkey in the West, remains an achievable goal.

It won't be easy. Homegrown Islamists and their wealthy Arab patrons have invested decades of effort in triple-distilling the gentle folk Islam of Java into an approximation of its desert variant. The simple certitudes of Islamism, encapsulated in the slogan "Islam is the solution," deeply appeal to many who have found themselves propelled from the rice paddy to the office tower in the space of a generation. Add to this the peculiar subculture of Western academia and NGOs, whose efforts to inoculate themselves against that mysterious new ailment, Islamophobia, often lead to an embrace of the absurd, the irrelevant and the downright dangerous: headscarved feminists, Kant-spouting mullahs confined to the diplomatic cocktail circuit, and assorted "moderates" who mouth the occasional homily against terrorism while remaining wedded to an Islamist worldview.

It's little wonder then that Abu Bakar Bashir, the leader of al Qaeda's local franchise, Jemaah Islamiyah, and the alleged mastermind of the 2002 Bali bombings, is back on the streets preaching jihad after a slap-on-the-wrist 26-month jail term. Or that some regional and local governments have begun experimenting with shariah, complete with public floggings and Taliban-inspired vice squads. Or that physical intimidation and assaults on their churches and mosques have become facts of life for Christians and "heretical" Ahmadiyya Muslims.

But all is not lost. Miniskirts in the malls and booze on restaurant menus show that the Islamist dream is only partially fulfilled. They have yet to banish Jakarta's secular elites behind high bungalow walls so an alternative message, however muted, still lives. Amplifying it requires the help of the U.S., like-minded allies such as Australia and Singapore, the still largely non-sectarian Indonesian army and genuine Muslim moderates such as former president Abdurrahman Wahid. Their success or failure will determine whether Indonesians fulfill their East Asian promise or go down the path of political mayhem and economic stagnation of their co-religionists in Nigeria, Pakistan and the Palestinian territories.

Mr. Dhume, a Bernard Schwartz fellow at the Asia Society in Washington, has recently finished a book on radical Islam in Indonesia.

Nations Meet On Denying Iran Nuclear Aid (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, November 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096298

A Western push to deny Iran technical help in building a plutonium-producing reactor has gathered enough support to be approved by the 35-nation board of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, diplomats said Sunday.

Still, differences both within the Western camp and more broadly among different factions on the International Atomic Energy Agency on how harshly to punish Iran for its nuclear defiance persisted on the eve of the opening meeting Monday, said the diplomats.

Normally, the United States takes the lead in demanding tough action against Tehran for defying U.N. Security Council demands that it freeze uranium enrichment, a possible pathway to nuclear arms.

But with council agreement on sanctions mired down because of Russian and Chinese efforts to block tough punishment, diplomats said the Americans have taken a back seat to the France at the upcoming Vienna meeting in calling for harsher penalties.

Like their European allies, the Americans were calling for Iran's request for help in building the Arak research reactor to be denied when the IAEA board meets in committee starting Monday — and later in the week in full conference to formally approve committee decisions.

But France was demanding even more, said the diplomats — all accredited to the IAEA, who demanded anonymity in exchange for discussing strategies ahead of the meeting. They told The Associated Press that Paris was asking the IAEA to probe the seven other projects Iran had submitted individually — and possibly reject any or all of them, if they were found to be risks to nuclear proliferation.

Even countries traditionally supportive of Iran were likely to want to deny some help to Iran — probably through a compromise that defers a decision on the issue. Both the Security Council and the IAEA board have issued resolutions urging Tehran to stop construction of the facility.

Arak produces plutonium waste, which, like enriched uranium, can be used for warheads, but the other seven projects that Iran has asked help with are less problematic.

One asks for help in developing nuclear capabilities for medical use. Another seeks legal help for the Russian-built Bushehr reactor which even the Americans have agreed does not pose a threat to nuclear proliferation. The five others ask for assistance in administrative or safety aspects of nuclear power, according to a list made available to the AP.

With most nations backing approval of all other projects except Arak, France would likely be forced to modify its position once the meeting opened, the diplomats said.

A diplomat familiar with the U.S. stance said the Americans were not backing the French because of recognition that the board would agree to nothing more than denying Iran help with Arak.

Others pointed to recent changes in the top echelons of the French government agencies dealing with Iran and proliferation threats, saying new, more hardline leadership could explain why Paris was out front in seeking tougher action.

Denying Iran help with Arak — where it is seeking agency assistance to make sure the reactor is environmentally safe — would do little to slow construction of that facility, which is expected to be completed within the next decade. And it would not affect Tehran's other potential avenue to weapons production — uranium enrichment.

Still, it would send a signal at a time that the Security Council is mired down in how harshly to penalize Tehran and allow the West to continue exerting some pressure during the council deadlock.

Once in full session Wednesday, the board also will hear a report from IAEA chief Mohamed Elbaradei that faults Tehran for continuing to deny full cooperation with agency inspectors probing suspect aspects of its nuclear program and outlines new finds of potentially worrying traces of plutonium at a waste facility.

As Iran Seeks Aid, Atom Agency Faces Quandary (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

At a place called Arak in the desert southwest of Tehran, behind barbed wire and antiaircraft guns, Iran is building a heavy-water nuclear reactor. The government says it will produce radioactive isotopes for medical treatments. As an unavoidable byproduct, it will also make plutonium, one of the primary fuels for atom bombs.

At the International Atomic Energy Agency, inspectors are trying to make sure that Tehran never uses its nuclear infrastructure to make weapons. Indeed, for just that reason, the agency's board has repeatedly called on the Iranians to abandon the Arak reactor. Yet when the board meets this week in Vienna, it will consider an Iranian request for technical help in safely completing the reactor, which is to go online as soon as 2009.

Traditionally, technical aid has been routinely granted, part of the agency's efforts to nurture the peaceful uses of atomic energy. Now, though, amid growing international suspicion about Iran's real nuclear intentions — and especially about a far more publicized part of its nuclear program, the enrichment of uranium — the Arak proposal is provoking bitter and unusual debate.

DOJ_NMG_0096299

Calling the reactor an arms threat, the United States and its allies say the agency should deny Iran's request. Helping make Arak's operations safe, they say, would only speed the reactor's completion — and Iran's emergence as a nuclear power.

But some developing nations say that a rebuff to the Iranians would set a bad precedent that could threaten their own peaceful atomic pursuits. Echoing an argument that Iran has often used in its recent nuclear diplomacy, they frame Arak as a new front in a war between the world's nuclear haves and have-nots.

In recent days, the dispute has produced a rush of speeches, lobbying and behind-the-scenes arm twisting among members of the agency's 35-nation board.

"It's a big deal," said Daryl G. Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, a private group in Washington. "This is the first test of the I.A.E.A.'s resolve to pressure Iran to halt this project. If it moves forward, it could give Iran a second track to making nuclear material for bombs."

Agency officials say a rejection of technical assistance would be unprecedented, and some of them want to press ahead. Last week, the agency's secretariat said it had found no legal basis to deny the request, diplomats said.

Arak, in short, shows the increasingly delicate nature of the atomic energy agency's long-running balancing act — part nuclear policeman, part promoter of atomic science and safety. By its nature, the same nuclear technology that lights cities can, with a little extra effort, fuel bombs. A question Arak poses for the agency is whether it must adjust its dual role in a time of heightened concern about nuclear proliferation, not just in the Middle East, but worldwide.

Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's ambassador to the agency, based in Vienna, denied that the Arak reactor had any use for weapons, saying it would aid hospitals, agriculture and industry.

"The world should know the other side of the coin, not just what the White House says," he said in an interview. "The international community has the right to see the reality of the exclusively peaceful nature of our activities and our full cooperation with the agency."

Mr. Soltanieh said Iran had won support for agency assistance to Arak from such international bodies as the group of developing states known as the G-77. "Technical cooperation should not be politicized," he said. "Iran should be encouraged to use the agency's technical expertise for nuclear safety."

But Robert J. Einhorn, who directed nonproliferation at the State Department from 1999 to 2001 and now works at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said the agency's board should reject aid to "a project conceived long ago as providing Iran another route to a nuclear weapons capability." Arak, he added, "will be capable of producing enough plutonium for about two bombs a year."

Mr. Einhorn conceded that the reactor could have peaceful uses, though implausibly so. "A 12-inch hunting knife," he said, "also could be used to spread jam on your toast in the morning."

To opponents of the Arak project, it would be surprising were the board to approve the Arak proposal just days after the atomic energy agency reported that inspectors had found unexplained traces of plutonium in Iran, and that Tehran continued to withhold answers to important questions about its nuclear activities.

And it was the agency's board that, in February, after Iran defied agency demands to halt its uranium enrichment program, decided to report the case to the United Nations Security Council. That set in motion a search for sanctions that still divides the world's nuclear powers.

The agency's aid to Iran is part of a wide program of "technical cooperation" that is poorly known outside specialist circles. Still, it accounts for about one-third of the annual agency budget; the agency is spending roughly $100 million on such programs this year. In a way, the projects are a carrot the agency offers to offset its intrusive policing of civilian technologies to bar nations from the secret pursuit of atom bombs. But critics say the deal is intrinsically bad. "Atoms for peace," they insist, is an illusion that no amount of policing can make real, with dishonest states always able to turn civilian nuclear technologies to destructive ends.

Today, the technical aid program involves more than 100 nations. The agency assisted Iran's hunt for uranium in the 1980s and currently has 14 cooperative projects with Tehran, including helping it prepare to operate its Bushehr reactor, which is designed to make electricity.

"We provide expert services, so they can learn to do things for themselves," said M. Peter Salema, an agency official who helps run the Iranian projects. The paramount aim, he added, is reactor safety. "If there is a bad incident, it affects the whole nuclear industry everywhere, like Chernobyl."

Iran's new request seeks agency aid not in designing or building the 40-megawatt Arak reactor, but in ensuring its safe operation. Western diplomats say that includes everything from helping Iran learn how to avoid catastrophic plant failure to minimizing radiation dangers in the handling of spent fuel rods, which would bear the plutonium.

That plutonium is the reason Arak has been a subject of concern since construction first came to light in 2002. Atom bombs use two main fuels — plutonium and uranium. In recent years, world attention has focused mainly on Tehran's efforts to enrich uranium. But weapons designers often prefer plutonium, because it takes less to produce a significant blast, making it ideal for compact missile warheads.

DOJ_NMG_0096300

What's more, experts say heavy-water reactors like Arak are inherently dangerous for nuclear proliferation because they are better at producing weapons-grade plutonium than light-water reactors like Bushehr. Heavy water, so called because it contains a heavy form of hydrogen, slows down speeding neutrons so uranium fuel can absorb them. In some cases, this merging splits uranium atoms in two. In other cases, the uranium is transformed into plutonium. Engineers remove the plutonium from spent fuel in a step known as reprocessing.

The Arak reactor, experts say, is similar in design to heavy-water reactors that Israel, India and Pakistan use to make plutonium for nuclear arms.

The Arak complex holds both the half-built reactor and a sprawling plant for the production of heavy water that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad formally inaugurated in August, saying, "The Iranian people are determined to take big steps."

The wrangling over aid to Arak began last week at preparatory meetings in Vienna. Egypt and some other developing nations argued for preserving the status quo and trusting the secretariat's judgment that there was no basis for denying the aid.

The American ambassador to the atomic agency, Gregory L. Schulte, said in an interview that objections had arisen because Arak made little sense from a civil perspective but great sense for making weapons. Moreover, he said, Iran had failed to explain inconsistencies that the agency uncovered in a clandestine Iranian program to separate plutonium from spent reactor fuel.

"The United States and other board members," he said, "cannot agree to have the I.A.E.A. assist the project."

Some Western diplomats suspect that Iran expected to have the reactor aid denied, and that its real goal was to show that the United States and its allies want to keep the developing world in a state of atomic backwardness.

In a speech last Thursday at the University of Vienna, Mr. Schulte predicted that the agency's board "will not fall for Iran's attempt to politicize and misuse the I.A.E.A.'s technical cooperation program." He stressed his country's longstanding financial support for technical aid, saying the United States had contributed more than $200 million since 2003. But he added, "Technical cooperation is meant for peaceful purposes, not to help countries build nuclear bombs."

At the meetings last week, Iran also warned against the politicization of technical aid. An Iranian representative said conservatives in Iran would use a decision to deny the aid as evidence of the West's malice. "Don't give fuel to the hard-liners, who are ready to put everything in jeopardy," he said, according to a diplomat present.

In the interview, Mr. Soltanieh said Washington was wrong to see Arak as a step to acquiring nuclear weapons, insisting that Iran had no plans to build a reprocessing plant that could extract plutonium from Arak's spent nuclear fuel. "Their calculations and physics are very weak," he said of American officials. "They make so many mistakes."

From Monday through Wednesday, a committee of the agency's board is to study hundreds of proposed aid projects, and the full board is to vote on them when it meets Thursday and Friday. The board, currently led by Slovenia, does not include Iran.

While the United States has lobbied hard on the Arak issue and says it expects to prevail, there are countries on the board that may back Iran, including Bolivia, Cuba and Syria, diplomats said. It takes a simple majority of the board to back or kill a measure.

A possible compromise, some said, would have the issue of Arak aid deferred rather than rejected outright.

Diplomats said that only twice before had technical aid projects drawn political fire. The United States questioned aid to Cuba around 1990 and to North Korea in 1991, but both projects moved ahead, the diplomats said.

Nuclear experts doubt that an aid denial would do much to slow the eventual completion of Arak, given the growing skill of Iranian engineers and Iran's aggressive nuclear stance.

"No matter what, we are going to continue the construction," Mr. Soltanieh said. "There's no way to stop it."

U.S. Sets Up A Perch In Dubai To Keep An Eye On Iran (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 19 — High atop a 1970s-style high-rise building in the heart of this desert city, a group of State Department officials has been setting up offices as part of an ambitious effort by the United States to better monitor Iran and encourage political change there.

The State Department announced early this year that it would open the office in Dubai and set up an Iran desk in Washington to make contact with Iranians and improve its institutional knowledge of the country at a time when tensions over Iran's nuclear ambitions are high.

DOJ_NMG_0096301

American officials decided to locate an Iran office here because of the city's large community of Iranian businesspeople, many of whom maintain relationships in Iran and return there often. Dubai, which is about 100 miles from Iran, has also long been popular among Iranians seeking to shop, vacation or catch flights elsewhere.

The State Department's program is only the highest-profile effort here. The United Arab Emirates, the confederation that includes Dubai, has become a nexus of political activity concerning Iran, as numerous governments and groups have seized on the country's location and its longstanding ties with Tehran to get a better understanding of Iran and its people.

Dubai has become a main stop-off point for researchers and analysts seeking to meet Iranians, analysts here say, and regional research and advocacy groups have held numerous high-level conferences here in recent months focused on Persian Gulf security and Iran. At least one nongovernmental group run by Iranian-American opposition figures has also used this city to hold workshops to train Iranians in techniques of civil disobedience aimed at eventually forcing political change inside Iran.

"The problem with Iran is you cannot operate inside the country, so you have to operate in the neighboring countries," said Mustafa Alani, senior researcher at the Gulf Research Center, a Dubai research organization. "But a place as open as Dubai naturally attracts people and intelligence agencies from all over the world. Of course, they're not really visible so you cannot pinpoint them in any one location."

On Friday, R. Nicholas Burns, under secretary of state for political affairs, said the Dubai office was created in the spirit of the Riga station in Latvia, which became a critical source of knowledge about the Soviet Union at a time when the United States did not have diplomatic relations with Moscow.

"We sent a young kid from Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in 1926 out to Riga station: George Kennan," he said, referring to the man who would become one of the world's foremost Soviet experts. "We said: 'Go and learn Russian. Sit in Riga. You be our window into the Soviet Union.'

"That is what we are saying to these young kids today. 'You go to Dubai. We can't be in Iran. You interview every Iranian you can find, get to know them — all the Iranians who come out and do their banking there and do their weekends there — and you tell us how we should understand Iran.' "

The United States broke off diplomatic relations with Tehran after the takeover of the American Embassy there in 1979. When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice joined the department last year, Mr. Burns said, it had only two people working on Iran issues.

Today eight are assigned to the Iran desk in Washington and six in the Dubai office, which is within the American consulate. In May, Mr. Burns said being in Dubai was "the next best thing" to being in Iran. About 200,000 Iranians live in Dubai, and contacts with them are considered especially useful because they are not political refugees, as in some other cities outside Iran with Iranian populations.

Iranians in Dubai have been attracted here in large part because of the city's openness and freewheeling business climate. The emirate is an important transshipment point for goods and products headed to Iran. And Iranians can use its banks and financial institutions to do business with other countries more easily than from home because of trade sanctions and United States pressure on banks to restrict business with Iran.

Among the nongovernmental groups seizing on those links is the Iranian Center for Applied Nonviolence, which invites Iranians to workshops here to teach them how peaceful revolts in Georgia, the Philippines and elsewhere were set off. The center, led by Ramin Ahmadi, an Iranian-American opposition figure, holds the training sessions on civil disobedience every three months or so, hoping to foment a nonviolent revolt in Iran. The International Center on Nonviolent Conflict, a separate organization based in Washington, helped organize one of the training sessions.

"We wanted to find a place where we were safe, where they can't send paramilitaries to gun you down, and where large numbers of Iranians go," said Dr. Ahmadi, who is a physician in the United States. "The last thing the Iranian regime will want to do is cause themselves trouble in Dubai. So it provides us with a degree of protection."

Critics of Dr. Ahmadi's work say it threatens to taint opposition figures inside Iran with appearing to cooperate with outside agitators. At least two people were imprisoned after attending one of his sessions last year.

So far, the State Department's work here remains low-level as officials try to build relationships. Much of it has been focused on easing the way for Iranians applying for visas to the United States and helping them arrange scholarships for study there, Iranians here say.

Abbas Bolurfrushan, president of the Iranian Business Council in Dubai, a nonpolitical group, said he had been in contact with some of the officials to help find ways of reducing the number of trips Iranians have to make to Dubai in order to obtain a visa to travel to the United States.

Beyond working to better monitor Iran and increase interactions with Iranians in Dubai, the Bush administration is also working to increase other forms of outreach. It requested tens of millions of dollars from Congress for outreach programs, and now has about $76 million for those programs, according to Mr. Burns.

DOJ_NMG_0096302

The money is being used to increase the hours of Persian-language radio and television beamed into Iran; to support exchange programs of athletes, artists and professionals to the United States; and for other democratization programs.

Extremist Vying To Become Top Ayatollah (WT)

By Colin Freeman

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

TEHRAN -- A hard-line cleric who opposes all dialogue with the West is a leading contender to become Iran's next supreme spiritual leader.

In a move that would push the country even further into the diplomatic wilderness, Ayatollah Mohammad Taghi Mesbah-Yazdi, 71, who publicly backs the use of suicide bombers against Israel, is campaigning to succeed Grand Ayatollah Ali Khameini, 67, as the head of the Islamic state.

Considered an extremist even by fellow mullahs, he was a fringe figure in Iran's theocracy until last year's election of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a fellow fundamentalist who views him as his ideological mentor.

He is known to many Iranians as "Professor Crocodile" because of a notorious cartoon that depicted him weeping false tears over the imprisoning of a reformist journalist.

Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi and his supporters will attempt to tighten the fundamentalists' political stranglehold next month, by standing in elections for the Assembly of Experts, an 86-strong group of theologians that would be responsible for nominating a replacement for Ayatollah Khamenei, whose health is rumored to be failing.

Opposing them will be a coalition of moderate conservatives led by Hashemi Rafsanjani, a former president, and members of the increasingly marginalized reformist movement, who have formed an alliance to prevent what both groups fear is a drift toward political extremism.

Appointing Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi as supreme leader would be a massive blow to Western efforts to get Iran to cease its nuclear program and backing of militants in Lebanon and Iraq and among the Palestinians. Although he has never spoken publicly on the issue, Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi is thought to support the idea of an Iranian nuclear bomb.

Ali Ansari, an Iran specialist at the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London, said: "Mesbah-Yazdi is on the hard right and very authoritarian. He doesn't even believe in democracy. Having him in power would lead to a much more hard-line, puritanical rule in Iran. It would not be good news for the West."

The Assembly of Experts is elected every eight years and has the power to appoint, supervise and impeach the supreme leader, who, in practice, wields ultimate power. Although Ayatollah Khameini, who has been in office since 1989, is expected to remain for the time being, the assembly elected next month is almost certain eventually to decide his successor.

The run-up to the vote has been marred by complaints of rigging in favor of hard-liners. The Guardian Council, a hard-line body that vets candidates, is accused of vetoing reform-minded clerics from taking part. Around half of nearly 500 applicants have been barred from standing.

In a letter to the council last week, Mehdi Karroubi, a reformist cleric, accused the council of "injustice" and misjudgment, saying that it would lead to "people's distrust in the authorities and the clergy."

The reformists' despair has been deepened by fears that few of their disillusioned supporters will vote, despite the possible consequences of a hard-liner victory. Constant political interference in the electoral process has persuaded many Iranians that it is not worth voting, an attitude that many reformists concede helped Mr. Ahmadinejad to win the presidency last year.

"Many reformists have lost faith, although the hard-liners will hope to organize a mass turnout among their own supporters," Mr. Ansari said.

Ayatollah Mesbah-Yazdi, who will be standing for election to the Assembly of Experts, regularly meets with Mr. Ahmadinejad, whose presidential bid he endorsed in a fatwa, or holy order.

The cartoonist whose drawing earned "Professor Crocodile" his nickname suffered the same fate as the journalists whose frequent imprisonment was depicted. He, too, was sent to prison.

Israel Holds Fire As Gazans Rally At House (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 19 — Israel called off an airstrike against the house of a suspected Palestinian militant in Gaza late Saturday, after the inhabitants ignored a telephoned warning and neighbors flocked to the house to prevent the bombing, the military said.

DOJ_NMG_0096303

On Sunday, hundreds of Palestinians, including the prime minister from the militant faction Hamas, stayed around the house and on its balconies and roof throughout the day. They declared a victory for "popular resistance," but Israel, under criticism for killing civilians in such strikes, called it another example of Palestinians using civilians to shield military activity.

"We see it as a cynical exploitation of our attempt to avoid harm to civilians," said a spokesman for the Israeli military, who, according to usual practice, spoke on condition of anonymity. "They are using them as human shields."

But Palestinians celebrated it as a possibly potent new defense against air raids that Israel might find difficult to counter.

"We are so proud of this national stand," Prime Minister Ismail Haniya said Sunday while visiting the house, in the town of Jabalya, in northern Gaza. "It's the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children."

Israel said the house had been used by leaders of a militant group, the Popular Resistance Committees, which was active in firing Qassam rockets from Gaza into Israel. Last week, a 57-year-old Israeli woman from the nearby Israeli town of Sderot was killed by one of the rockets, and over the weekend, Israel carried out several small-scale operations against militants suspected of being involved in firing them.

The Israeli military spokesman said the attack on the house had been called off after a routine telephone warning from the military urging inhabitants to evacuate the house was ignored. "We didn't want to harm civilians," he said.

Israel has had an increasingly difficult time ending the rocket fire, the most contentious issue between Israel and Palestinian militants. Nearly two weeks ago, Israeli artillery fire killed 19 civilians in Beit Hanun, prompting a United Nations resolution to open a fact-finding mission into the episode.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, during his weekly cabinet meeting on Sunday, attacked the resolution, saying it did not sufficiently condemn the Palestinians' rocket fire against Israeli civilians. He said Israel would not cooperate with any international inquiry.

On Sunday, reprisals continued. An 80-year-old Palestinian man was killed in Gaza City and a dozen others were wounded by an Israeli strike on a car carrying two Hamas militants. The Israeli spokesman said the militants had been involved in making rockets.

The office of the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, said Sunday that he had called the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to ask him to help end the rocket fire.

Mr. Peretz lives in Sderot, the town hit hardest by the rockets. A member of his security detail was hit and had both legs severed by the same rocket that killed the Israeli woman last week.

Palestinian Shields Foil Israeli Strikes (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, November 20, 2006

Hundreds of Palestinians serving as human shields guarded the homes of two top militants Sunday, a new tactic that forced Israel to call off missile strikes on the buildings and re-evaluate a mainstay of its aerial campaign in Gaza.

In recent months, the Israeli air force has repeatedly struck the homes of militants after warning residents by phone to clear out. Israeli security officials said they did not know how to respond to the human shield tactic, but pressed ahead with other airstrikes Sunday.

In Gaza City, an aircraft fired a missile at a car, killing one man and wounding nine, including two Hamas militants. Four of the wounded were children, ages 5 to 16, who suffered shrapnel injuries, hospital officials said.

The military said the target of the strike was a vehicle carrying senior members of the Hamas rocket launching operation.

The standoff over the homes of the militants began late Saturday when Mohammed Baroud, local leader of the Popular Resistance Committees, was informed by the army that his house would be hit. The three-story building is home to 17 people from Baroud's family. Another militant from Hamas also received a warning.

Instead of fleeing, though, the two decided to stay in their homes and called in reinforcements. They were quickly joined by crowds of supporters, including dozens of armed men, who gathered on balconies, rooftops and in the streets outside.

"Death to Israel. Death to America," the crowds chanted. Local mosques and Palestinian TV and radio stations also mobilized supporters.

Baroud, involved in rocket attacks on Israel, said he and his fellow militants had planned the response a few days earlier when another house was destroyed in a missile strike.

The army said it called off the nighttime airstrikes because of the crowds. It condemned what it said was a cynical exploitation "by the terrorists of uninvolved people as human shields."

Israeli military officials acknowledged they had no solution for the standoff. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the media.

DOJ_NMG_0096304

By Sunday afternoon, about two dozen women were milling around on Baroud's roof, shielded from the sun by green tarp. One story below them, about a dozen men were resting on mattresses.

Baroud's mother, Umm Wael, said shifts had been organized in preparation for a long standoff. "Where should we go?" she said. "We will stay here or die in the house. Let them bring it down on our heads."

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas stopped by to show support. "We are so proud of this national stand. It's the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children," he said.

Also Sunday, Hamas militants in Gaza fired eight rockets at the Israeli town of Sderot, seriously wounding one person. Last week, a Sderot woman was killed in a rocket attack.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz called Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and demanded he invoke his authority to put an end to the rocket fire, the Defense Ministry said. Peretz told Abbas that Israel would not tolerate continued barrages.

Abbas responded by telling Peretz to stop Israel's military escalation in the Palestinian territories, according to the Palestinian news agency, WAFA.

In Jerusalem, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert criticized a U.N. resolution that calls on Israel to pull its troops from Gaza and requests a fact-finding mission into the death of 19 members of an extended family killed in an Israeli artillery attack earlier this month.

The resolution — which passed the General Assembly on Friday — received support from all members of the European Union after last-minute changes were made to soften the tone. Israel, Australia and the United States voted against it.

Olmert said Israel will not halt its five-month offensive in Gaza, which he said is a response to rocket fire from Palestinian militants, even though civilians are frequently caught in the crossfire.

He lashed out at members of the international community "who on their moral high-horse and eye-rolling ways view it as correct to initiate a U.N. resolution condemning us."

Hamas and Abbas' more moderate Fatah have been at loggerheads since the Islamic group came to power after winning January parliamentary elections. In recent weeks, the sides have been trying to put aside their differences and form a unity government in the hopes of ending international sanctions imposed on the government.

Israel and Western donor nations have demanded that Hamas renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept past peace deals. Hamas rejects the conditions, and the emerging coalition government is expected to take a vague position toward Israel.

Haniyeh acknowledged that despite progress in the talks, there were no guarantees the new government would persuade the international community to lift sanctions.

"We want to feel more secure, to be more comfortable that they are going to be committed to these guarantees and lift the siege," Haniyeh told reporters after visiting the Baroud home.

___

Associated Press Writer Ibrahim Barzak contributed to this report.

Israel Calls Off Strike On Militant's Home After Palestinians Form Human Shield (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux And Rushdi Abu Alouf

The Los Angeles Times, November 20, 2006

JABALYA, Gaza Strip — Israel said today that it had called off a planned aerial bombardment of a Palestinian militant's home after about 200 of his supporters, in a new defensive tactic, rushed to form a human shield around the residence.

The mass mobilization in the Gaza Strip is believed to be the first employed by Palestinians to prevent an Israeli air strike. It is part of a growing use of civilians, including women and children, against an Israeli offensive aimed at halting rocket fire into Israel from Gaza.

Israeli officials said the tactic spells a new difficulty for their 5-month-old offensive, which has been largely ineffective so far.

Saved by the action late Saturday night was the home of Mohammed Wael Baroud, identified by both sides as an operative of the Popular Resistance Committees who has overseen some of the ongoing rocket attacks. Israel considers him a wanted terrorist.

Capt. Noa Meir, a spokeswoman for the Israeli military, said it targeted the home as part of a "terrorist infrastructure," but canceled the planned air strike because of the large crowd.

She said the military would continue fighting to root out weapons caches and logistical centers of Baroud's organization, as well as those of Islamic Jihad and the armed wing of the Hamas movement that leads the Palestinian Authority.

All three groups are involved in launching crude Kassam rockets, nearly 1,000 of which have fallen in or near Israeli cities and towns this year. Today, one rocket wounded a taxi driver in Sderot, near the Gaza border. Another killed a 70-year-old woman there Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0096305

At midday today, an Israeli aircraft attacked a car carrying two Hamas gunmen in Gaza City, killing an 80-year-old man and wounding six other passersby, hospital officials said. The Hamas members, identified by Israel as rocket makers, escaped unharmed, fleeing on foot into a nearby mosque after the first missile missed the car.

The Israeli army often attacks the vehicles of Palestinian militants without warning, aiming to kill, but says it routinely orders occupants out of targeted buildings before striking, in case civilians are among them.

Such a warning came by telephone to Baroud's two-story home in the Jabalya refugee camp in northern Gaza, giving the 15 members of his and his brothers' families half an hour to get out.

Instead, Baroud holed up inside with relatives and informed his superiors and the local mosque. The Barouds were quickly joined by neighbors and supporters, responding to appeals from the mosque and from Palestinian radio and television.

"Death to Israel! Death to America!" the demonstrators shouted from the roof of the house and the streets outside.

Nizar Rayan, a Hamas leader in northern Gaza, said the demonstration was part of a new method of "popular action to protect the fighters and their homes" and said it would be repeated whenever a Palestinian home is threatened by Israeli bombardment.

Supportive crowds remained at the Baroud home today and formed pre-emptively around the residences of several other Gaza militants who had been targeted by Israel in the past.

On Nov. 3, Hamas orchestrated a similar rescue when about 200 unarmed women swarmed past an Israeli military cordon around a mosque in the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun and shielded the escape of 73 Palestinian gunmen who had been trapped inside. Two women were killed by Israeli gunfire that, the Israeli army said, was aimed at armed men in their midst.

Meir, the army spokeswoman, said the mosque incident and the demonstration at Baroud's home "are part of the same cynical use of Palestinian civilians as human shields."

"They're forcing us to face a very difficult dilemma," she said. "While they have no regard for their own civilians, we're the ones who have to make the choice of how to defend our civilians on the one hand and keep theirs out of harm's way on the other."

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a senior Hamas leader, portrayed Saturday night's demonstration as an act of self preservation. "Those people intervened to protect their own houses as well," he told reporters outside the Baroud home.

Some of the demonstrators were members of armed Palestinian groups including Hamas, Fatah and other rivals of Baroud's organization.

Nassem abu Ajena, a 45-year-old local commander in Hamas' military wing, climbed to the roof of Baroud's home Saturday night with two of his sons, Khalil, 17, and Samer, 19.

"If I protect my neighbor's house today, he will protect my house tomorrow," Ajena explained.

Palestinian officials say Israeli warplanes have destroyed nine homes in Gaza in stepped-up strikes since Wednesday's fatal rocket attack on Sderot.

Israel has turned increasingly to its air force since a long-range artillery barrage killed 19 civilians in Beit Hanoun on Nov. 8. Israel said the shells went off course because of problems with the targeting system.

Israel unilaterally withdrew its army outposts and settlements from Gaza in September last year but has made frequent military incursions into the coastal territory since the capture of one of its soldiers along the border in late June. The soldier is still missing.

As the incursions have become longer and more frequent, Israeli officials have debated whether to intervene even more aggressively in Gaza. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said last week that while Israel would continue targeted attacks, a large-scale assault would not necessarily stop the rockets.

Today, Olmert criticized a U.N. General Assembly resolution that calls on Israel to pull its troops from the Gaza Strip and requests a fact-finding mission into the Beit Hanoun deaths.

"The state of Israel is not the one that has to provide answers about hitting civilians," Olmert said. "We have expressed our deepest regret over this. But those who preach morality and roll their eyes have yet to condemn those [Palestinians] who are shooting with the goal of hitting civilians as a systematic policy."

Palestinian Shields Foil Israeli Strikes (AP-Y)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, November 20, 2006

Hundreds of Palestinians serving as human shields guarded the homes of two top militants Sunday, a new tactic that forced Israel to call off missile strikes on the buildings and re-evaluate a mainstay of its aerial campaign in Gaza.

DOJ_NMG_0096306

In recent months, the Israeli air force has repeatedly struck the homes of militants after warning residents by phone to clear out. Israeli security officials said they did not know how to respond to the human shield tactic, but pressed ahead with other airstrikes Sunday.

In Gaza City, an aircraft fired a missile at a car, killing one man and wounding nine, including two Hamas militants. Four of the wounded were children, ages 5 to 16, who suffered shrapnel injuries, hospital officials said.

The military said the target of the strike was a vehicle carrying senior members of the Hamas rocket launching operation.

The standoff over the homes of the militants began late Saturday when Mohammed Baroud, local leader of the Popular Resistance Committees, was informed by the army that his house would be hit. The three-story building is home to 17 people from Baroud's family. Another militant from Hamas also received a warning.

Instead of fleeing, though, the two decided to stay in their homes and called in reinforcements. They were quickly joined by crowds of supporters, including dozens of armed men, who gathered on balconies, rooftops and in the streets outside.

"Death to Israel. Death to America," the crowds chanted. Local mosques and Palestinian TV and radio stations also mobilized supporters.

Baroud, involved in rocket attacks on Israel, said he and his fellow militants had planned the response a few days earlier when another house was destroyed in a missile strike.

The army said it called off the nighttime airstrikes because of the crowds. It condemned what it said was a cynical exploitation "by the terrorists of uninvolved people as human shields."

Israeli military officials acknowledged they had no solution for the standoff. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the media.

By Sunday afternoon, about two dozen women were milling around on Baroud's roof, shielded from the sun by green tarp. One story below them, about a dozen men were resting on mattresses.

Baroud's mother, Umm Wael, said shifts had been organized in preparation for a long standoff. "Where should we go?" she said. "We will stay here or die in the house. Let them bring it down on our heads."

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas stopped by to show support. "We are so proud of this national stand. It's the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children," he said.

Also Sunday, Hamas militants in Gaza fired eight rockets at the Israeli town of Sderot, seriously wounding one person. Last week, a Sderot woman was killed in a rocket attack.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz called Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and demanded he invoke his authority to put an end to the rocket fire, the Defense Ministry said. Peretz told Abbas that Israel would not tolerate continued barrages.

Abbas responded by telling Peretz to stop Israel's military escalation in the Palestinian territories, according to the Palestinian news agency, WAFA.

In Jerusalem, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert criticized a U.N. resolution that calls on Israel to pull its troops from Gaza and requests a fact-finding mission into the death of 19 members of an extended family killed in an Israeli artillery attack earlier this month.

The resolution — which passed the General Assembly on Friday — received support from all members of the European Union after last-minute changes were made to soften the tone. Israel, Australia and the United States voted against it.

Olmert said Israel will not halt its five-month offensive in Gaza, which he said is a response to rocket fire from Palestinian militants, even though civilians are frequently caught in the crossfire.

He lashed out at members of the international community "who on their moral high-horse and eye-rolling ways view it as correct to initiate a U.N. resolution condemning us."

Hamas and Abbas' more moderate Fatah have been at loggerheads since the Islamic group came to power after winning January parliamentary elections. In recent weeks, the sides have been trying to put aside their differences and form a unity government in the hopes of ending international sanctions imposed on the government.

Israel and Western donor nations have demanded that Hamas renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept past peace deals. Hamas rejects the conditions, and the emerging coalition government is expected to take a vague position toward Israel.

Haniyeh acknowledged that despite progress in the talks, there were no guarantees the new government would persuade the international community to lift sanctions.

"We want to feel more secure, to be more comfortable that they are going to be committed to these guarantees and lift the siege," Haniyeh told reporters after visiting the Baroud home.

Human Shields Foil Air Strikes (WT/AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

DOJ_NMG_0096307

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

BEIT LAHIYA, Gaza Strip -- Hundreds of Palestinians serving as human shields guarded the homes of two top militants yesterday, a new tactic that forced Israel to call off missile strikes on the buildings and reevaluate a mainstay of its aerial campaign in Gaza.

The Israeli air force repeatedly has struck the homes of militants after warning residents by phone to clear out. Israeli security officials said they did not know how to respond to the human-shield tactic, but pressed ahead with other air strikes yesterday.

In Gaza City, an aircraft fired a missile at a car, killing one man and wounding nine persons, including two Hamas militants. Four of the wounded were children, ages 5 to 16, who suffered shrapnel injuries, hospital officials said.

The military said the target of the strike was a vehicle carrying senior members of the Hamas rocket-launching operation.

The standoff over the homes of the militants began late Saturday when Mohammed Baroud, local leader of the Popular Resistance Committees, was informed by the army that his house would be hit. The three-story building is home to 17 persons from Mr. Baroud's family. Another militant from Hamas also received a warning.

Instead of fleeing, though, the two decided to stay in their homes and called in reinforcements. They quickly were joined by crowds of supporters, including dozens of armed men, who gathered on balconies, rooftops and in the streets outside.

"Death to Israel. Death to America," the crowds chanted. Local mosques and Palestinian TV and radio stations also mobilized supporters.

Mr. Baroud, involved in rocket attacks on Israel, said he and his fellow militants had planned the response a few days earlier when another house was destroyed in a missile strike.

The army said it called off the nighttime air strikes because of the crowds. It condemned what it said was a cynical exploitation "by the terrorists of uninvolved people as human shields."

Israeli military officials acknowledged they had no solution to the standoff. The officials spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the press.

By yesterday afternoon, about two dozen women were milling around on Mr. Baroud's roof, shielded from the sun by green tarp. One story below them, about a dozen men were resting on mattresses.

Mr. Baroud's mother, Umm Wael, said shifts had been organized in preparation for a long standoff. "Where should we go?" she said. "We will stay here or die in the house. Let them bring it down on our heads."

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas stopped by to show support. "We are so proud of this national stand. It's the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children," he said.

Also yesterday, Hamas militants in Gaza fired eight rockets at the Israeli town of Sderot, seriously wounding one person. Last week, a Sderot woman was killed in a rocket attack.

Israel PM Lashes Out At UN Over Resolution (AFP)

AFP, November 20, 2006

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has criticised a UN General Assembly resolution calling for a fact-finding mission to probe an Israeli artillery strike that killed 19 Palestinians this month.

"I view it severely," Olmert told the weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem on Sunday, 11 days after shells slammed into private homes in Beit Hanun in northern Gaza, killing mostly women and children.

"We have no doubt that it is the State of Israel which must respond to attacks on civilians. We have expressed our deepest regret over this.

"But those who preach morality and roll their eyes have yet to see fit to initiate a resolution in condemnation of those who are shooting with the goal of hitting civilians as a long-range, systematic policy," Olmert added.

The UN General Assembly on Friday overwhelmingly passed a resolution urging an immediate end to all acts of Israeli and Palestinian violence, including an Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip and Palestinians firing rockets into Israel.

In Gaza, the director of the United Nations refugee agency defended the resolution and accused Israel of using excessive force, a day after he said two children in a UN-run school in northern Gaza were wounded by stray bullets.

"The results of (Israel's) acts speak for themselves and the results are indicative of the fact that they are not taking care as they are bound to do," John Ging told reporters after touring the school in Beit Lahiya.

"There is disproportionate use of force and due care is not being taken for the civilian population," he added.

"That there isn't even safety in an UNRWA school sends a very clear message that ties in to what the UN General Assembly thankfully voted on, which is that there is a need to protect the civilians in Gaza."

Friday's resolution also urged the UN secretary general to set up a fact-finding mission to probe Israel's shelling of private homes in the Gaza town of Beit Hanun on November 8 which killed 19 Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0096308

Israel has said a technical error was responsible for the artillery incident and expressed regret for the "tragedy".

Hezbollah's Leader Calls For Street Protests (NYT)

By Nada Bakri And Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 19 — Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, pressed his case for bringing down Lebanon's government in a message broadcast Sunday, once again calling for peaceful demonstrations to topple what he described as an "illegitimate and unconstitutional" government controlled by Washington.

Sheik Nasrallah used his televised appearance to try to win political support by playing to the deep resentment many Lebanese harbor against the United States for having refused to press for an early end to Israel's war with Hezbollah. Sheik Nasrallah sought to characterize his goals in purely domestic terms, insisting that Hezbollah was not doing the bidding of Iran or Syria — as his opponents have charged.

In a taped speech broadcast on Al Manar television station run by Hezbollah, Sheik Nasrallah called on his supporters to be "psychologically" ready to protest for days, weeks or however long it would take to force the government to step down. But he also offered a prescription to avoid the protests.

"There are two solutions to resolve the crisis: either the formation of a government of national unity in which all political movements take part, or early parliamentary elections," he said to an audience of followers on the taped message. "Come and let us form a national unity government. Nobody is raising arms. Nobody is making a coup or popular revolution."

He also insisted that Hezbollah was not advocating violence or a power grab, adding, "Civil war is a red line. Clashes are a red line."

While Sheik Nasrallah has won widespread credibility for doing what he promises to do, it appeared he was mindful of the risks involved in taking to the streets and was looking to build so much pressure on the government that such a move would not become necessary.

The struggle for power in Lebanon took a new turn after the war with Israel ended in August, and Hezbollah emerged emboldened by its ability to survive the Israeli attack and bloody Israeli forces. Hezbollah, a militant Islamic organization with a powerful political and aid operation, has pressed its case for changing the makeup of the government to include more of its allies, including the party of Gen. Michel Aoun, a Christian.

But the governing March 14th coalition, a group of Sunni, Druse and Christian leaders that is allied with the West, has vowed not to give Hezbollah as much as it is asking for because that would put veto power for all government actions in the Hezbollah coalition's hands. Members of the governing coalition have said that would paralyze the government and give Syria and Iran undue influence in Lebanese affairs.

Though the conflict is a domestic battle for power, it also has an international component that could influence the future far beyond Lebanon's own borders. The governing coalition is allied with the United States and France, while Hezbollah is a close ally of Syria and Iran. Throughout the conflict, each side has accused the other of being a puppet of foreign interests, while denying such accusations against itself. The White House recently issued a statement charging that Syria, Iran and Hezbollah were planning to bring down the government together.

Sheik Nasrallah addressed those charges directly, using his speech to insist that his goal was unity, not the empowerment of Hezbollah, Syria or Iran. The governing coalition has repeatedly accused Hezbollah of wanting to block the creation of an international tribunal to hear evidence in the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Sheik Nasrallah denied that was the case.

He also indicated that no matter what happened, even if security forces attacked the demonstrators, his militia would not be goaded into fighting a domestic battle.

"When we take to the streets we hope that they don't mobilize their forces in front of ours," he said. "If they insult us we will tell them, 'God forgive you.' If they beat us we will tell them, 'God forgive you.' "

His speech was punctuated by chants from the crowd: "Labbeik ya Nasrallah" or "We follow you, O Nasrallah."

A member of Parliament for the March 14th coalition, Akram Chehayeb, dismissed Sheik Nasrallah's statements as nothing more than propaganda, saying his was "a decision to fulfill Iran's wishes."

He showed no sign that the coalition would back down to the demands of Hezbollah and its alliance. He also said there would be counterdemonstrations, illustrating just how entrenched the sides are.

"The government will not prevent them from practicing their democratic right if their protests remain peaceful, but if they attack public or private property, the security forces will have to interfere to protect the country," Mr. Chehayeb said. "We will defend the government of independence and we will prevent any coup from toppling it."

DOJ_NMG_0096309

The Druse leader, Walid Jumblatt, took a position exactly opposite of Sheik Nasrallah's. "The opposition groups are on the verge of announcing a coup in the country," Mr. Jumblatt said Sunday at a televised news conference. "They will start with gradual street protests, then mass demonstrations, then riots and resignation from Parliament. We are until this moment still calling for a compromise."

Hezbollah Urges Mass Protests In Lebanon (AP-Y)

By Hussein Dakroub

AP, November 20, 2006

Hezbollah's leader urged his followers to prepare for mass demonstrations to topple the government if it ignores the militant group's demand to form a national unity coalition.

In a speech broadcast Sunday, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah railed against President Bush's administration, calling Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice a "bloodsucker" and claiming the current Lebanese government is a puppet of Washington.

He did not set a date for the anti-government protests, which he said should be nonviolent. But he told supporters and political allies to get ready to take to Beirut's streets for days or even weeks to force the resignation of the government.

"We, all of us, must be psychologically and morally ready to take to the streets. It is one means for the required movement," Nasrallah said in a speech Saturday which was aired Sunday on Hezbollah's TV station Al-Manar.

"We do not want riots ... We must respect private and public property. We will not allow any clashes even if (anti-Syrian groups) stage a counter street demonstration," he said. "We are capable of taking to the street and staying there for a day, two, or three, or a week, or two or three weeks, or for more or less until we eventually impose by our peaceful, civilized and democratic means the toppling of an illegitimate and unconstitutional government."

Political and sectarian tensions have been mounting in Lebanon as a result of a power struggle between rival factions intensified by Hezbollah's 34-day war with Israel this summer.

The Shiite guerrilla group, which is backed by Syria and Iran, has demanded the formation of a national unity government that would essentially give it and its allies veto power over major decisions. But negotiations among groups broke down last week, and six Cabinet ministers, including two from Hezbollah, resigned.

Shortly after Nasrallah's speech was broadcast, the sounds of gunfire and fireworks reverberated across Beirut's predominantly Shiite southern suburbs, a Hezbollah stronghold heavily bombarded by Israel during the fighting in July and August.

Nasrallah accused the government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, which is backed by the anti-Syrian parliamentary majority, of falling under the influence of the President Bush's administration. He said the government had become "illegitimate" and "unconstitutional" after the ministers resigned.

"This is the government of Feltman and not the government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora," Nasrallah said, referring to the U.S. Ambassador to Lebanon Jeffrey Feltman who has repeatedly reaffirmed his country's support for the Saniora government. The remark drew applause and chants of "Death to America" from Nasrallah's audience made up of Hezbollah members charged with organizing the protests.

"We want to liberate our country from the hegemony of Ambassador Feltman and the bloodsucker Rice," he said.

Hezbollah has accused Rice and the Bush administration of foiling Arab efforts in the U.N. Security Council to arrange an early cease-fire in Israel-Hezbollah war, claiming Washington wanted to give Israel time to try to destroy Hezbollah's military infrastructure. The fighting ended with a U.N.-brokered cease-fire resolution on Aug. 14 and more than 1,000 people died on both sides of the border.

Lebanon's political crisis has deepened since late October when Nasrallah began threatening mass protests unless Hezbollah's demand for a national unity government was met.

Saniora, backed by the anti-Syrian coalition, has vowed to stay in power and refused to give veto power to Hezbollah and its allies.

Nasrallah repeated his demand for the unity government to include Christian leader Gen. Michel Aoun's faction, a Hezbollah ally, as a way out of the current political deadlock. The move would also reduce the sectarian appearance of the exclusively Shiite group's bid for greater political power.

"We have two options to break the political deadlock: formation of a national unity government in which the country's major political forces participate in an effective way, or early parliamentary elections," he said.

But Nasrallah insisted he was not trying to cause radical change.

"Come let's form a national unity government. ... Nobody is raising arms, nobody is making a coup or popular revolution," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0096310

The demonstrations are not aimed at changing the ruling system or causing a "radical political coup" in Lebanon, he said. "All we want is to have a national government that will not make Lebanon an American or an Israeli tool."

Nasrallah ruled out civil war, undermining Lebanon's stability or Sunni-Shiite strife, all of which he said were "red lines" Hezbollah would not cross.

Washington has accused Hezbollah backers Iran and Syria of seeking to topple the Saniora government and attempting to block the formation of an international tribunal to prosecute the suspected killers of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Both Iran and Syria have denied the charges.

The Lebanese government last week approved the draft agreement for the tribunal's formation, and the U.N. Security Council was expected to discuss the draft on Monday. Lebanon's pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud opposed the Cabinet's decision, saying it lacked legitimacy after the ministers resigned.

Hariri was killed with 22 others in a suicide truck bombing in February 2005. The assassination sparked huge protests against Syria, which was widely seen as culpable. Syria denies it was behind the killing.

India, Too, Tests A Medium-Range Missile (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

BHUBANESHWAR, India, Nov. 19 (AP) — India on Sunday successfully test-fired a medium-range missile capable of carrying nuclear warheads days after its rival, Pakistan, had launched a similar missile.

The Indian missile, called the Prithvi, was fired into the Bay of Bengal from a test range in Chandipur in the eastern state of Orissa, a Defense Ministry official said, speaking on condition of anonymity under ministry rules. The test came three days after Pakistan carried out a similar test of its nuclear-capable Ghauri missile, also known as the Hatf-5.

The two countries recently concluded a crucial round of peace talks in New Delhi in an effort to resolve their differences, including the thorny issue of their territorial dispute over the Himalayan region of Kashmir. India and Pakistan have fought three wars, two over Kashmir, since 1947.

The missile test Sunday was “routine” and “part of the country’s air defense exercises,” an unidentified official said, according to the Press Trust of India news agency.

India routinely test-fires missiles it is developing for military use, as does Pakistan.

A Pakistan Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, said Sunday that India had informed Pakistan ahead of time, as is its standard procedure.

On Saturday, district authorities in Chandipur evacuated about 2,750 villagers living near the testing range to two large shelters about a mile away, the news agency said.

Britain And Pakistan To Work More Closely (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Nov. 19 — Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan agreed Sunday to strengthen their nations’ cooperation on counterterrorism and other fields, and they stressed the need for political and economic measures along with the use of military force to bring peace in Afghanistan.

The two leaders met in the eastern city of Lahore on the second day of Mr. Blair’s visit to Pakistan. At a news conference, Mr. Blair said relations between Pakistan and Britain were at “their highest point.”

“We also discussed the work that we are doing together in counterterrorism, which again is improving and strengthening,” Mr. Blair said.

Afghanistan figured prominently in the talks held by Mr. Blair and General Musharraf. Pakistan’s support and willingness to curb resurgent Taliban activity in Afghanistan is essential and often emblematic of what Mr. Blair called “the tremendous challenges” that confront other countries in stabilizing Afghanistan.

Mr. Blair also said that a lasting resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was essential to defeating extremism.

General Musharraf brushed off criticism from Afghanistan and the West that Pakistan was not doing enough to curb cross-border infiltration by fighters linked to the Taliban, Afghanistan’s ousted rulers.

Saying that his country was doing more than was expected and “suffered 600 dead,” General Musharraf said: “The Taliban problem is an Afghan problem. The solution lies in what you do in Afghanistan, not what you do in Pakistan. The battle has to be won on the Afghan side.”

General Musharraf said millions of dollars should be poured in for development in the southeastern part of Afghanistan, “which is under turmoil at the moment.”

DOJ_NMG_0096311

He also defended his government's policy of entering peace agreements with local militants sympathetic to the Taliban, in the rugged semiautonomous tribal regions that straddle Afghanistan. He suggested that this model should be replicated in Afghanistan with "those elements who want peace."

Mr. Blair said more work needed to be done.

"In fairness, we should say that the cooperation with Pakistan in dealing over these issues has been transformed over these past few years," he said. "There is no doubt about that, at all. Of course, everyone always wants more to be done."

Britain has about 5,000 troops in Afghanistan, part of the 31,000 NATO-led forces. NATO officials have repeatedly complained that the Taliban find safe haven in Pakistan after mounting attacks against British and NATO troops inside Afghanistan.

Mr. Blair's visit included an assistance package intended to revamp the country's religious schools, which are often criticized for fomenting militancy and intolerance.

Britain and Pakistan signed a long-term partnership arrangement to reduce poverty and help Pakistan achieve United Nations goals for development. Under the agreement, the British government will provide 480 million pounds, or about $900 million, in the next three years through Britain's Department for International Development.

The two countries agreed to increase cooperation between their intelligence services to combat terrorism, illegal immigration and transnational organized crime.

Britain has offered support in countering terrorism, including forensic training, investigating the financing of terrorism and sharing crisis management expertise, a joint statement released by the Pakistani Foreign Office said.

Britain plans to deliver two MI-17 helicopters in April to the Pakistani antinarcotics force for their antismuggling operation along the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

During his visit, Mr. Blair also met with Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz and with moderate Islamic religious leaders and went to the Faisal Mosque.

6 Ethiopians Are Killed In Somalia Ambush (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Nov. 19 (AP) — Islamic fighters ambushed an Ethiopian military convoy on Sunday, killing six Ethiopian soldiers and wounding 20 others, witnesses said, in the first known fight between the rival forces maneuvering for control in Somalia.

Two Ethiopian trucks were destroyed by land mines before Islamic fighters opened fire on the convoy, which witnesses said was made up of more than 80 vehicles and headed for Baidoa, the headquarters of the so-called transitional government. The attack occurred about 50 miles southwest of Baidoa.

Sheik Abdirahim Ali Mudey, a spokesman for the Islamic Courts Union, which controls the capital, Mogadishu, and much of southern Somalia, said four Ethiopian trucks were destroyed and some soldiers were killed, but he denied that his group was responsible. He described the fighting as "a popular uprising" by villagers opposed to Ethiopian troops in Somalia.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew Mohamed Siad Barre, then turned on one another. The interim government, formed two years ago, controls just one town.

Terror's Playground (TIME)

By Sam Dealey

Time, November 27, 2006

On a dusty side street in Somalia's former capital, there's little that distinguishes Mohammed's stall from the others. A grenade rests against a box of ammunition next to a row of AK-47s, and still more rifles hang from nails beneath a patch of tin roofing. His booth occupies prime real estate in the center of Mogadishu's Bakaraaha Arms Market, and he obsessively polishes his guns with an oil-stained rag in a battle against sand and grit. But few passersby show interest. Once one of the most bustling, bristling arms bazaars in the world, the Mogadishu weapons market is weathering a down cycle, with business a mere fraction of what it was in the days when warlords settled internecine grudges in the city's streets. Mohammed's average daily sales have dropped from 15 AKs to just three--and prices have fallen by almost half, to $300. "The only good job was selling guns," says Mohammed, 24. "Now I don't know what I'll do."

In most strife-torn parts of the world, a bear market for weapons would be cause for relief. But tranquillity rarely lasts long in Somalia. Since the overthrow of dictator Mohammed Siad Barre in 1991, the country has been a byword for dysfunction, less a nation-state than a destitute, unremittingly violent land ruled by the barrel of a gun. Last June the warlords' grip on power was finally broken by a dedicated confederacy of fundamentalist Muslim militias that fought their way into the former capital and sent the warlords fleeing.

DOJ_NMG_0096312

Since then, the Muslim militias, which call themselves the Islamic Courts Union (ICU), have consolidated their claim to Mogadishu and expanded their control to include most of Somalia, particularly the fertile lands and strategic ports in the country's south. Meanwhile, the U.N.-backed transitional government is unraveling. Confined to the squalid town of Baidoa near the Ethiopian border, the government is dependent on foreign money and security and crippled by internal dissent and mass resignations.

The fear is that Somalia, a country with nearly 9 million Muslims and one that the U.S. has long suspected is a haven for al-Qaeda, may fall further into the hands of Islamic fundamentalists sympathetic to terrorist organizations. A report by the U.N.-chartered watchdog group on Somalia, which was submitted to the U.N Security Council last week, says the ICU has developed extensive ties with groups and states steeped in terrorism.

The report states that the ICU sent "approximately a 720-person-strong military force to Lebanon to fight alongside Hizballah against the Israeli military" during this summer's monthlong war. In exchange, Hizballah's leadership "has made arrangements" for governments like Iran's and Syria's to contribute arms and supplies to the ICU. And senior leaders within the ICU, including co-leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, allegedly have direct ties to al-Itihaad al-Islamiya, a radical group suspected of links to al-Qaeda.

Leaders of the ICU deny such allegations, but it's telling that they don't seem particularly bothered by them. "We believe the war against terrorism is a war against Islam," says the hard-line ICU national security chairman, Sheik Yusuf Indahaadde. "Those who are making trouble are not based here." Then, in English, the sheik adds forcefully, "Bush is the mother and father of terrorism."

And yet, in spite of the Islamists' disreputable allies, many Somalis cannot remember a time when they felt safer. For Americans, the single, searing image of Somalia was formed in October 1993, after two U.S. Black Hawk helicopters--part of a U.S. mission to provide humanitarian relief and restore order--were felled by militias loyal to warlord Mohammed Farrah Aidid. Eighteen U.S. special forces were killed, and the world community's involvement in Somalia effectively ended. What followed was a decade and a half of intermittent war that reduced Mogadishu to rubble. Along the "green line," the architectural gem of the former Italian colony that bore the brunt of the warlords' reign, the once proud edifice of the National Bank is obliterated, and only a stone shard remains of the cathedral's twin bell towers.

But over the past few months, there have been glimpses of progress. In the clearings between bullet-pocked buildings and along the city's broad, leafy avenues, children play soccer and a decade's worth of trash is slowly being hauled away. Extortionate militia checkpoints and roving bands of technicals--pickups mounted with heavy artillery and carrying armed thugs--have been replaced by disciplined Islamic troops. The city's ports have reopened, buses travel the roads by day, and Somali families stroll the sidewalks by night. Barring the notable exceptions of a Swedish journalist and an Italian nun who were recently murdered, there's no denying Mogadishu's new semblance of order. "This is an area of the world that we would obviously like to see stable, and [the Islamists] are doing that to some extent," says a Western diplomat. "So if what you see is what you get, then maybe it isn't the worst thing in the world."

The Islamists who control the city occupy a whitewashed compound in Mogadishu. They are eager to present their domination as a fait accompli. "We are ready to be a nation," says Foreign Minister Ibrahim Hassan Addou. "We want Somalia to be peaceful, and we want to establish good relations with the rest of the world." With both hands, he beckons toward the open window in his office. "Feel free to look around," he says. "You can go where you want to go and see what you want to see."

Well, not quite. The Islamists have instituted Taliban-style rules banning drinking, cinemas, dancing and women swimming, as well as curbing the press. Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, the ICU's co-leader, insists these restraints are the product of spontaneous acts of piety by the public. "We don't have any rules issuing from the Islamic Courts to stop any of this," he insists. "The people are doing this by themselves without intervention by us." That seems open to dispute. Just last week, after protests erupted over the shortage of khat, the seemingly ubiquitous narcotic chewed in Somalia, the Islamists ordered a ban on the drug. It's unlikely to go over well. "It's good to stop hashish and harder things," says a man at a khat stall in Mogadishu, "but cigarettes and beer? There will be a day when people say, Wait, they have gone too far. I am sure of it."

The Islamists' takeover is a parable of the unintended consequences of the U.S.'s war on terrorism. After Sept. 11, the U.S. intelligence community, acting on concerns that Somalia's lawlessness could be exploited by al-Qaeda, initiated the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism, a covert program that funneled aid to warlords in return for their assistance in capturing suspected terrorists. One of those warlords approached by U.S. operatives was Osman Hassan Ali Atto. Once a top financier of warlord Aidid--Atto was captured just a week before the downing of the Black Hawks in 1993--he is the last independent warlord in Mogadishu, a testament to his ability to play both sides of the net. Blunt-spoken and avuncular, Atto disparaged the U.S. cash-for-warlords program. "It was a waste of money," he says at his junkyard in Mogadishu, where the rusting hulks of dozers and pavers are still scarred by flak from U.S. missiles some 15 years ago. "I always told them that America's interests [should be] a government that is put in place without the pressure of money. They had their own ambitions to capture certain individuals. But I told them to f___ off. We are not for sale."

DOJ_NMG_0096313

But other warlords were. Payments totaling several hundred thousand dollars were funneled to various militia groups, according to U.N. sources. The program was an open secret in Somalia and among the African diplomatic corps, but its only success was to bolster support for the Islamic Courts among a population weary of anarchy and opposed to foreign meddling. "It was a spectacular disaster," says John Prendergast of the International Crisis Group. "Not only were the militia leaders routed, but the U.S. and CIA support for these militias led to strengthened support for the Islamic Courts."

Poorly trained and addled by khat, Mogadishu's bands of thugs were no match for the highly regimented and dedicated Islamic soldiers. After just three months, the warlords were decisively routed this summer. "The warlords, they did not know how to fight," an ICU militia trainer says during a tour of his training camp just outside Mogadishu. "They had the guns and the money and the khat, but they did not have the heart. For many months we have not been paid to fight, whether in money or in khat. We fight with our hearts."

Those aren't their only weapons. The U.N. watchdog report circulated to the Security Council last week says Syria has equipped and trained the ICU military. On July 27, the report says, "200 fighters from the ICU were transported by aircraft to Syria to undergo military training in guerrilla warfare." The report also says a Syrian plane delivered a "large quantity" of arms, including surface-to-air missiles, to the ICU in early September. On at least two occasions, Iran supplied the ICU with arms, including a shipment on July 25 of 1,000 machine guns and grenade launchers, an unknown quantity of mines and ammunition, and 45 shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles.

In mid-August, a large dhow originating in Iran and carrying arms, medical supplies and food arrived at a Mogadishu seaport. Included in the shipment were 80 man-portable surface-to-air missiles and launchers. The U.N. also charges that "at the time of writing of this report, there were two Iranians in Dhusa Mareb engaged on matters linked to the exploration of uranium in exchange for arms to the ICU." In separate letters written to the U.N., Syria and Iran denied having any involvement.

Foreign diplomats warn that the arms buildup may be a prelude to a wider war. Despite being sidelined by the Islamists, the transitional government still enjoys the full-throated backing of the international community and is being armed to the teeth by neighboring Ethiopia--a necessary violation of the country's arms embargo if the transitional government is to survive, but hardly endearing to most Somalis, for whom Ethiopia is a blood enemy. Meanwhile, Ethiopia's main rival in the region, Eritrea, has funneled arms and forces to the ICU. Peace talks between the Islamists and the transitional government have largely collapsed, and skirmishes are increasing.

The African Union plans to deploy some 7,000 African peacekeepers to keep the two sides at bay. But the Islamists have made clear they will consider this an act of war. "If they come, we will view them as invading troops," said Ahmed. "And we are ready to defend ourselves because we are not ready to be colonized again by any sort of troops in the world." Without those peacekeepers, however, the two sides seem destined to clash. A face-off would surely drag Ethiopia and Eritrea into a proxy--if not outright--war. The Islamists' stated aim to unite all of Somalia is believed to include the secular breakaway territories of Puntland and Somaliland, as well as portions of Kenya and Ethiopia. Once fighting has begun, there's little to prevent Somalia from becoming a conflict that could engulf the Horn of Africa, cause horrific loss of life and create the continent's next major humanitarian crisis.

With those storm clouds gathering, the Islamists in Mogadishu are intent on solidifying their hold on power, dispensing their harsh brand of justice and leaving no doubt about who's in control. A reminder of that came on a clear blue morning in mid-October, when thousands of Somalis gathered at the parade ground of the old police barracks on the city's battered coast. Guards led a tall, undernourished man, condemned to death for killing another man, to a clearing in the center. After a reading from the Koran, the man conducted his ablutions, said a prayer and was led to a post facing eight soldiers in balaclavas and armed with AKs. His hands and feet were tied and his eyes blindfolded. With the bright blue sea behind him and puffy white clouds above, and to the jubilant shouts of Allahu akbar (God is great) from the crowd, the man's head and stomach were ripped by bullets.

The Passion Of The Pope (TIME)

By David Van Biema, Jeff Israely

Time, November 27, 2006

For the traveling Pontiff, it was not a laid-back Turkish holiday. The citizens of the proud, predominantly Muslim nation had no love of Popes. To the East, the Iranian government was galvanizing anti-Western feeling. The news reported that an escaped killer was on the loose, threatening to assassinate the Pontiff when he arrived. Yet the Holy Father was undaunted. "Love is stronger than danger," he said. "I am in the hands of God." He fared forward--to Ankara, to Istanbul--and preached the commonality of the world's great faiths. He enjoined both Christians and Muslims to "seek ties of friendship with other believers who invoke the name of a single God." He did not leave covered with garlands, but he set a groundwork for what would be years of rapprochement between the Holy See and Islam. He was a uniter, not a divider.

DOJ_NMG_0096314

That was 1979 and Pope John Paul II. But when Benedict XVI travels to Turkey next week on his first visit to a Muslim country since becoming Pope last year, he is unlikely to cloak himself in a downy banner of brotherhood, the way his predecessor did 27 years ago. Instead, Benedict, 79, will arrive carrying a different reputation: that of a hard-knuckle intellect with a taste for blunt talk and interreligious confrontation. Just 19 months into his tenure, the Pope has become as much a moral lightning rod as a theologian; suddenly, when he speaks, the whole world listens. And so what takes place over four days in three Turkish cities has the potential to define his papacy--and a good deal more.

Few people saw this coming. Nobody truly expected Benedict to be a mere caretaker Pope--his sometimes ferocious 24-year tenure as the Vatican's theological enforcer and John Paul's right hand suggested anything but passivity. But this same familiarity argued against surprises. The new Pontiff was expected to sustain John Paul's conservative line on morality and church discipline and focus most of his energies on trimming the Vatican bureaucracy and battling Western culture's "moral relativism." Although acknowledged as a brilliant conservative theologian, Benedict lacked the open-armed charisma of his predecessor. Moreover, what had initially propelled John Paul to the center of the world stage was his challenge to communism and its subsequent fall, a huge geopolitical event that the Pope helped precipitate with two exhilarating visits to his beloved Polish homeland. By contrast, what could Benedict do? Liberate Bavaria?

Well, not quite. But this year he has emerged as a far more compelling and complex figure than anyone had imagined. And much of that has to do with his willingness to confront what some people feel is today's equivalent of the communist scourge--the threat of Islamic violence. The topic is extraordinarily fraught. There are, after all, a billion or so nonviolent Muslims on the globe, the Roman Catholic Church's own record in the religious-mayhem department is hardly pristine, and even the most naive of observers understands that the Vicar of Christ might harbor an institutional prejudice against one of Christianity's main global competitors. But by speaking out last September in Regensburg, Germany, about the possible intrinsic connection between Islam and violence, the Pontiff suddenly became a lot more interesting. Even when Islamic extremists destroyed several churches and murdered a nun in Somalia, Benedict refused to retract the essence of his remarks. In one imperfect but powerful stroke, he departed from his predecessor's largely benign approach to Islam and discovered an issue that might attract even the most religiously jaded. In doing so, he managed (for better or worse) to reanimate the clash-of-civilizations discussion by focusing scrutiny on the core question of whether Islam, as a religion, sanctions violence. He was hailed by cultural conservatives worldwide. Says Helen Hull Hitchcock, a St. Louis, Mo., lay leader who heads the conservative Catholic organization Women for Faith and Family: "He has said what needed to be said."

But Benedict now finds himself in an unfamiliar position as he embarks on the most important mission of his papacy. Having thrust himself to the center of the global debate and earned the vilification of the Muslim street, he must weigh hard options. Does he seize his new platform, insisting that another great faith has potentially deadly flaws and daring it to discuss them, while exhorting Western audiences to be morally armed? Or does he back away from further confrontation in the hope of tamping down the rage his words have already provoked? Those who know him say he was clearly shocked and appalled by the violent reaction to the Germany speech. Yet it seems unlikely that he will completely drop the topic and the megaphone he has discovered he is holding. "The Pope has the intention to say what he thinks," says a high-ranking Vatican diplomat. "He may adjust his tone, but his direction won't change."

APPOINTMENT IN ANKARA

If the test of a new act is to see how well it plays in a tough room, Benedict has certainly booked himself into a doozy. In the racial memory of Western Europe, the Turks were the face of militant Islam, besieging Vienna in 1529 and 1683 and for centuries thereafter representing a kind of stock bogeyman. In 2002, after nearly a century of determinedly secularist rule, the country elected a moderate Islamist party. For many in the West, that makes Turkey simultaneously a symbol of hope (of moderation) and fear (of Islamism).

The Pope's original invitation came in 2005, from the Ecumenical Patriarch of the Eastern Orthodox Church, which represents a nervous 0.01% of the country's population. The Turkish government, miffed that as a Cardinal, Joseph Ratzinger had opposed Turkey's urgent bid to join the European Union, finally issued its own belated offer for 2006. But even now, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has discovered a previous engagement that will take him out of the country while Benedict is in it. Although modest, sales of a Turkish novel subtitled Who Will Kill the Pope in Istanbul? (the book fingers everyone but Islamists) have increased as his trip approaches. The country is expected to place about 22,000 policemen on the streets of Istanbul while he is there. "This is a very high-risk visit," says Cengiz Aktar, a Turkish political scientist. "There is a vocal nationalist movement here, and there is the Pope, a man who likes to play with fire."

DOJ_NMG_0096315

Actually, Benedict will probably try to stay away from matches during his successive stops in Ankara, Ephesus and Istanbul. Speculation about what the Pope will say and do on this visit has consumed Rome for weeks. Papal watchers say Benedict cannot out-Regensburg himself, but gauzy talk about the compatibility of Christianity and Islam isn't likely either. Over the course of his career, Benedict has been averse to reciting multifaith platitudes, an aversion that has sharpened as he has focused on Islam. And that's what could make his coming encounter with the Muslim world, says David Gibson, author of The Rule of Benedict, either "a step toward religious harmony or toward holy war."

A BRIGHT-LINES KIND OF GUY

In 1986, Pope John Paul convened a remarkable multifaith summit in the medieval Italian town of Assisi. Muslims and Sikhs, Zoroastrians and the Archbishop of Canterbury, among others, convened to celebrate their (distinct) spiritualities and pray for peace. It was a signature John Paul moment, but not everybody caught the vibe. "It was a disaster," sniffs an observer. "People were praying together, and nobody had any idea what they were praying to." The witness, whose view undoubtedly reflected that of his boss, was an aide to Cardinal Ratzinger.

Unlike John Paul, who had a big-tent approach, Ratzinger has always favored bright theological lines and correspondingly high walls between creeds he regards as unequally meritorious. His long-standing habit is to correct any aide who calls a religion other than Christianity or Judaism a "faith." Prior to his papacy, the culmination of this philosophy was his office's 1999 Vatican document Dominus Jesus, which described non-Catholics as being in a "gravely deficient situation" regarding salvation. The fact that this offended some of the deficient parties did not particularly bother him. Notes the same assistant: "To understand each other ... you have to talk about what divides."

That approach includes Islam. In Ratzinger's 1996 interview book Salt of the Earth (with Peter Seewald), he noted that "we must recognize that Islam is not a uniform thing. No one can speak for [it] as a whole. There is a noble Islam, embodied, for example, by the King of Morocco, and there is also the extremist, terrorist Islam, which, again, one must not identify with Islam as a whole, which would do it an injustice." This sophisticated understanding, however, did not keep Ratzinger from slapping down a bishop who wanted to invite peaceable Muslims to a papal ceremony in Fatima, Portugal, or, in 2004, from objecting to Turkish E.U. entry on grounds that it has always been "in permanent contrast to Europe," a contrast his other writings made clear had much to do with religion.

Islam played a particular role--as both a threat and a model--in the drama that probably lies closest to Benedict's heart: the secularization of Christian Europe. In the same 1996 book, he wrote that "the Islamic soul reawakened" in reaction to the erosion of the West's moral stature during the 1960s. Ratzinger paraphrased that soul's new song: "We know who we are; our religion is holding its ground; you don't have one any longer. We have a moral message that has existed without interruption since the prophets, and we will tell the world how to live it, where the Christians certainly can't."

After Sept. 11, Ratzinger's attitude toward Islam seems to have hardened. According to Gibson, the Cardinals in the conclave that elected Ratzinger made it clear that they expected a tougher dialogue with the other faith. After the London subway bombings in July 2005, the new Pope responded to the question of whether Islam was a "religion of peace"--as George W. Bush, among others, has always stressed-- by saying, "Certainly there are also elements that can favor peace." When he met with moderate German Muslims in the city of Cologne that August, Benedict delivered a fairly blunt warning that "those who instigate and plan these attacks evidently wish to poison our relations." In Rome, he removed Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald, a relatively dovish Islam expert, as head of the Vatican's office on interreligious dialogue and replaced an ongoing study of Christian violence during the Crusades with one on Islamic violence today. And he has stepped up the Vatican's insistence on reciprocity--demanding the same rights for Christians in Muslim-majority countries that Muslims enjoy in the West.

All of this led observers to expect him to eventually make a major statement about Islam, although most assumed that it wouldn't stray too far from John Paul's fraternal tone. Nobody anticipated what happened in southern Germany.

THE POINT OF NO RETURN

On Sept. 12, 2006, the day after the world had marked the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, Benedict threw himself into the maelstrom. The unlikely venue was his old teaching grounds, the University of Regensburg. His vehicle was a talk about reason as part of Christianity's very essence. His nominal target was his usual suspect, the secular West, which he said had committed the tragic error of discarding Christianity as reason-free. But this time he had an additional villain in his sights: Islam, which he said actually did undervalue rationality and which he strongly suggested was consequently more inclined to violence.

To show that Islam sees God as so transcendent that reason is extraneous, Benedict cited an 11th century Muslim sage named Ibn Hazm. To establish the connection between this position and violence, he quoted a 15th century Christian Byzantine Emperor (and head of the Byzantine, or Eastern, Church) named Manuel II Paleologus. Paleologus criticized Muslims for "spreading [their faith] by the sword," both because "God is not pleased by blood" and because true conversion depended on reason. "Show me just what the Muhammad brought that was new," Paleologus said, in a passage quoted by Benedict, "and there you will find things only evil and inhuman."

DOJ_NMG_0096316

It remains unclear whether Benedict was deliberately trying to raise the temperature. Many analysts, especially in Rome, think he knew exactly what he was saying and regard the Islamic section of the 35-min. speech as a brave and eloquent warning of Islam's inherent violence and of a faithless West's inability to offer moral response. Yet Benedict's argument was slapdash and flawed. His sage, Ibn Hazm, turned out to have belonged to a school with no current adherents, and although reason's primacy is debated in Islam, it is very much part of the culture that developed algebra. Paleologus' forced-conversion accusation misrepresents the sweep of Muslim history, since more often than not, Islam has left religious groups in conquered territory intact, if hobbled. And assuming that a punctilious scholar like Benedict really wanted to engage on Islam and violence, why do it through the idiosyncratic lens of an embattled king in the 1400s who made his name partly for his efforts at drumming up enthusiasm for a new Crusade?

The reaction to the speech was intense. Small bands of Muslim thugs burned Benedict in effigy, attacked the churches in the Middle East and, on Sept. 17, murdered the nun in Somalia. Over the course of a month, Benedict issued a series of partial apologies and corrections unprecedented in the papacy. He expressed regret to those offended, summoned a group of Muslim notables to make the point personally and disowned the "evil and inhuman" slur on Muhammad as Manuel's sentiment but not his own. He even issued a second version of the speech to reflect those sentiments.

But he never retracted his more basic association of Islam with unreason and violence. Indeed, if he had, it would have caused considerable confusion--if only because the behavior of the extremists seemed, at least to some, to prove his point. No editorialist could express frustration with him for initiating the row without condemning the subsequent carnage--and a good many decided his only fault was in speaking truth. Says a high-ranking Western diplomat in Rome: "It was time to let the rabbit out of the can, and he did. I admire his courage. Part of the Koran lends itself to being shanghaied by terrorists, and he can do what politicians can't." In late October, Benedict received a different kind of validation in an open "Your Holiness" letter from 38 of the best-known names in Islamic theology. The missive politely eviscerated his Regensburg speech but went on to "applaud" the Pope's "efforts to oppose the dominance of positivism and materialism in human life" and expressed a desire for "frank and sincere dialogue." At a time when the credibility of Western political leaders in the Muslim world has sunk to new depths, the letter treated Benedict as a spokesman for the West.

Says a Vatican insider with a shrug: "Everyone's asking, Did the Pope make a mistake? Was it intentional? It doesn't really matter at this point." Whether Benedict had actually intended Regensburg to be the catalyst, he had become a player.

THE PAPAL MEGAPHONE

After Regensburg, the mainstream Italian daily La Stampa ran the headline THE POPE AND BUSH ALLIED AGAINST TERROR. The association with the Iraq war and U.S. interrogation methods must have horrified the Pontiff, if only because it could undermine the church's honest-broker role in regional conflicts. "It's easy to say, 'Go Benedict! Hit the Muslims!'" says Gibson. "But that's not who he is. He is not a Crusader." Shortly before Regensburg, Benedict had endured Western criticism for repeatedly demanding a cease-fire after Israel's invasion of Lebanon. Angelo Cardinal Scola, a protÃ©gÃ© of the Pope's who edits Oasis, a Church quarterly on dialogue with Islam, says the fact "that radical Islam can turn to violence does not mean we must respond with a crusade."

The Pope's pursuit of his newfound calling as Islamic interlocutor will be tricky, theologically and politically. Unlike the holy books of Judaism and Christianity, the Koran and Hadiths contain verses precisely regulating the conduct of war and exhorting Muslims to wage battle against various enemies. The bellicosity of some Koranic passages owes much to the fact that they were written at a time when Muslims were engaged in almost constant warfare to defend their religion. But when suicide bombers today go to their fates with the Koran's verses on their lips, it invites questions about Islam's credentials as a religion that is willing to police its own claims of peace and tolerance. As conservative Catholic scholar Michael Novak points out, the Vatican's pacifism gives Benedict unmatched moral standing to press this point. "Being against war, he can say tougher things ... than any President or Prime Minister can. His role is to represent Western civilization."

Perhaps so, but then he might have to represent its past as well, including all the historical violence done in Jesus' name (despite the Gospels' pacifism). Discussion of Christianity's dark hours has not been his penchant. Moreover, the position Benedict took in Regensburg--that Islam and violence are indeed essentially connected--worked as an opening gambit but doesn't leave much room for either side to maneuver. People asked to flatly renounce their Holy Writ generally don't. And Benedict has little give--because first, he seldom says anything he is not prepared to defend to the bitter end and second, if he retreats now, he risks being accused of the same moral relativism that he rails against.

Still, many Catholics are rooting for him to come up with a way to engage without enraging. The widely read Catholic blogger Amy Welborn says, "I think there's a pretty widespread fed-up-ness with Islamic sensitivity. I agree that elements of Islam that either explicitly espouse violence or are less than aggressive in combatting it need to be challenged and nudged, [just as] I would like to see the Pope continue to challenge and nudge people of all different religions--Christian and non-Christian--to look at the suffering of people." She thinks that, given the heat he's taking in parts of the Islamic world, his willingness to go through with his Turkish trip is "so brave."

DOJ_NMG_0096317

But what should he do while he's there? John Esposito, a respected Islam scholar at Georgetown University, says the Pope can't confine himself to meetings with Christian leaders. "He must address the Muslim majority." Seyyed Hossein Nasr, a professor at George Washington University and one of the 38 signatories to the October letter to Benedict, says the Pope should deliver an "earnest expression of commonality"--even if it's only the widely accepted observation that Judaism, Christianity and Islam all claim descent from the biblical figure of Abraham. Father Richard McBrien, a theologian at Notre Dame, says that "if he doesn't bring up the issue of reciprocal respect for Christian minorities, he's not doing his job," but that he should avoid an absolutist, now-or-never stance.

High-ranking Vatican sources say Benedict will avoid repeating the Islam-and-violence trope in any form as blatant as Regensburg's. Instead, suggests Father Thomas Reese, a senior research fellow at the Woodstock Theological Center in Washington, an independent nonprofit institute at Georgetown, the Pope may take a less broad-brush approach to the issue by repeating his sentiment from Cologne: "He could say, 'You, like me, are concerned about terrorism' and he would like to see Islamic clerics be more up front condemning it." Once over the hump, happier topics should be easy to find. "Quite frankly," says Reese, "the Pope and the Muslims are on the same page on abortion. They [agree on] relativism and consumerism, hedonistic culture, sex and violence, Palestinian rights." Conceivably, like John Paul's first journey back to communist Poland, Benedict's simple presence in this Muslim land may speak louder than words.

Whether this is the way Benedict will choose to proceed remains to be seen. But whatever he does, bold or subtle, the explosiveness of the current relationship between Islam and the West will require him to become a diplomat as much as a scholar. As he strives to assume that role, holding out an olive branch to other religions while fiercely defending his own, the Pope may want to consider the story of a much earlier walker of the Catholic-Islamic tightrope. In the 13th century, during the middle of the Fifth Crusade, St. Francis of Assisi briefly departed Italy and journeyed to the Holy Land to evangelize to the Muslims. According to Christian traditions, he preached the gospel to the Sultan, only to be told that Muslims were as convinced of the truth of Islam as Francis was of Christianity. At that, Francis proposed that he and a Muslim walk through a fire to test whose faith was stronger. The Sultan said he didn't know whether he could locate a volunteer. Francis said he would walk through the fire by himself. Impressed with Francis' devotion, the Sultan, while maintaining his own faith, agreed to a truce between the two warring sides.

Francis' precise methods may be a bit outdated. But 800 years later, his mixture of flexibility and tenacity could be a useful paradigm for a frank and sincere dialogue in an ever turbulent religious world. With reporting by With reporting by Jeff Chu/ New York, Andrew Purvis/ Berlin, Pelin Turgut/ Ankara with other bureaus

What The Pope Gets Right ... (TIME)

By Richard John Neuhaus

Time, November 27, 2006

Benedict XVI's journey to Istanbul, formerly Constantinople, is laden with the wounds of history both ancient and painfully contemporary. The Pope's controversial Sept. 12 lecture in Regensburg, Germany, quoted a 14th century exchange between a Byzantine Christian Emperor and a Muslim intellectual in which the Emperor made some distinctly uncomplimentary observations about Islam. The Pope admitted that the Emperor's statement was brusque. But his point in reaching so far back into history was to demonstrate that problems between the Christian West and Islam long precede today's "war on terrorism."

Although the West, and most notably Europe, may be less Christian today, Muslims still view it as the Christian West. For a thousand years, from the days of Muhammad in the 7th century, Islam enjoyed a run of triumphant conquest, interrupted only momentarily by the Christian Crusades. The time of conquest lasted until the failed siege of Vienna in 1683. After Vienna, and most dramatically under 19th and 20th century Western colonialism, Islam was sidelined from history--one of the main sources of the rage and resentment of today's jihadists.

The jihadists believe their time of resumed conquest has come. Through terrorism and the mass immigration of Muslims in Europe, the jihadists are pressing for the reversal of the military outcome of 1683. This is the context in which Benedict attempted to make a larger point at Regensburg. He acknowledged that Christians have sometimes had a problem, and he suggested that Muslims still have a problem, in understanding the relationship between faith and coercion. Violence, said the Pope, is the enemy of reason. Violence has no place in the advancing of religion. To act against reason is to act against the nature of God.

The violent responses to the Pope's speech reflect the belief of jihadist groups, such as al-Qaeda, that their religion mandates the use of any means necessary, including suicide bombers and the mass killing of civilians, to bring about the world's submission to Islam. In an Oct. 12 "Open Letter to His Holiness Pope Benedict XVI," 38 distinguished Islamic religious authorities, including Grand Muftis in Turkey, Egypt, Russia, Syria, Kosovo, Bosnia and Uzbekistan, wrote that "jihad ... means struggle, and specifically struggle in the way of God. This struggle may take many forms, including the use of force." The signers delicately criticized some acts of Muslim terrorism, such as the killing of a nun in Somalia, but failed to address the relationship between religion and politics in Islam, or whether the "maintenance of sovereignty" includes, as radical jihadists claim, the violent reconquest of Western lands that were once Muslim. Whether out of conviction or fear of being targeted by terrorists, the 38 did not frontally reject the linkage between violence and the advance of Islam.

DOJ_NMG_0096318

Nonetheless, the open letter was framed in respectful terms and was welcomed at the Vatican. It is noteworthy, however, that the Pope has not retreated from his challenge to Islam. Moreover, under his leadership, the Vatican has taken a much stronger line in insisting on "reciprocity" in relations with Islam. Mosques proliferate throughout cities in the West, while any expression of non-Islamic religion is strictly forbidden in many Muslim countries. In the Vatican and elsewhere, the feeling has been growing that the way of tolerance, dialogue and multicultural sensitivity can no longer be a one-way street. In fact, that shift predates Benedict's papacy. In his 1994 book, Crossing the Threshold of Hope, John Paul II said complimentary things about the piety of Muslims. But John Paul concluded his discussion of Islam with this: "For [these reasons] not only the theology but also the anthropology of Islam is very distant from Christianity."

The theology has to do with the relationship between faith and reason, the anthropology with the dignity of the human person that requires a free and uncoerced response to truth, including religious truth. God ("Allah" in Arabic), Benedict contends, should be viewed not as an arbitrary ruler who issues capricious commands but as the Divine Reason that human beings, through reason and freedom, are invited to share. Speaking for the Catholic Church, which includes over half of the more than 2 billion Christians in the world, Benedict says that, in matters of religion, violence is the enemy of reason, and to act against reason is to act against God. Challenging the leaders of the more than 1 billion Muslims in the world, he asks them to join in that affirmation.

Father Richard John Neuhaus is editor in chief of First Things, a monthly magazine on religion, culture and public life

... And Where He's Still In The Dark (TIME)

By Tariq Ramadan

Time, November 27, 2006

Since delivering the speech in which he quoted a 14th century Emperor who said the Prophet of Islam had given nothing positive to humanity and had commanded followers to use violence to spread their faith, Pope Benedict XVI has been subjected to bitter Muslim reaction around the world. Benedict has responded by saying he regretted the consequences of his misunderstood words, but he did not retract his statement--perhaps rightly so. After all, he had simply cited an ancient Emperor. It is Benedict's right to exercise his critical opinion without being expected to apologize for it--whether he's an ordinary Roman Catholic or the Pope.

But that doesn't mean he was right. Muslim attention has focused mainly on the lecture's association between violence and Islam, but the most important and disputable aspect of it was Benedict's reflection on what it means to be European. In his speech at Regensburg, the Pope attempted to set out a European identity that is Christian by faith and Greek by philosophical reason. But Benedict's speech implicitly suggested that he believes that Islam has no such relationship with reason--and thus is excluded from being European. Several years ago, the Pope, then Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, set forth his opposition to the integration of Turkey into Europe in similar terms. Muslim Turkey has never been, and never will be, able to claim an authentically European culture, he contended. It is another thing; it is the Other.

As I have written before, this profoundly European Pope is inviting the people of his continent to become aware of the central, inescapable character of Christianity within their identity, or risk losing it. That may be a legitimate goal, but Benedict's narrow definition of European identity is deeply troubling and potentially dangerous. This is what Muslims must respond to: the tendency of Westerners to ignore the critical role that Muslims played in the development of Western thought. Those who "forget" the decisive contributions of rationalist Muslim thinkers like al-Farabi (10th century), Avicenna (11th century), Averroes (12th century), al-Ghazali (12th century), Ash-Shatibi (13th century) and Ibn Khaldun (14th century) are reconstructing a Europe that is not only an illusion but also self-deceptive about its past.

What the West needs most today is not so much a dialogue with other civilizations but an honest dialogue with itself--one that acknowledges those traditions within Western civilization that are almost never recognized. Europe, in particular, must learn to reconcile itself with the diversity of its past in order to master the coming pluralism of its future.

The Pope's visit to Turkey presents an opportunity to put forward the true terms of the debate over the relationship between Islam and the West. First, it is necessary to stop presenting this visit as if it were a trip to a country whose religion and culture are alien to Europe. Selective about its past, Europe is becoming blind to its present. The European continent has been home to a sizable population of Muslims for centuries. While visiting Turkey, the Pope must acknowledge that he is encountering not a potential threat but a mirror. Islam is already a European religion.

DOJ_NMG_0096319

Rather than focus on differences, the true dialogue between the Pope and Islam, and between secularized societies and Islamic ones, should emphasize our common, universal values: mutual respect of human rights, basic freedoms, rule of law and democracy. Though most of the media attention is directed at a marginal minority of radicals, millions of European Muslims are quietly proving every day that they can live perfectly well in secular societies and share a strong ethical pedestal with Jews, Christians and atheist humanists.

Let us hope that the Pope will be able to transform his former perception of the threat of "the Other," of Islam, into a more open approach--by strongly highlighting the ethical teachings the religions have in common and the ways they can contribute together to the future of a pluralistic Europe. Benedict XVI should be free to express his opinions without risk of impassioned denunciation. But the least one can expect from the Pope--especially in this difficult era of fear and suspicion--is that he help bridge the divide and create new spaces of confidence and trust.

Tariq Ramadan, a research fellow at Oxford, is the author of several books on Islam, including To Be a European Muslim

Observers: Sudan Gov't Strikes N. Darfur (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, November 20, 2006

A large force of Sudanese soldiers backed by allied janjaweed militiamen is sweeping through North Darfur, killing civilians and looting and burning villages in violation of a cease-fire agreement, international observers and rebels said Sunday.

At least four civilians were killed near the northern town of Birmaza on Sunday, said Youssouf Mussabal, a rebel leader in the area. Some 200 pro-government janjaweed fighters riding camels had moved into the zone, backed by mobile army units and the Sudanese air force, he added.

"The janjaweed are still in the town. We're worried for the population," Mussabal told The Associated Press by telephone from North Darfur.

Another rebel field commander from a separate faction said seven villages were looted and burned to the ground around Birmaza on Sunday. Jar al-Naby said the renewed government offensive began earlier this week, and that two civilians were killed in Friday raids.

Hundreds of heads of cattle have also been rounded and brought back to the Sudanese army headquarters in the North Darfur town of Mellit, he said by phone from Darfur.

A senior U.N. official in North Darfur said Sunday international observers were receiving daily reports of raids and casualties throughout this vast area of semi-desert pastureland north of the regional capital of El Fasher.

"The campaign is ongoing, and we are being given very limited access to investigate or treat casualties," the official said on the phone from North Darfur. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

The African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur said in a statement Saturday it had received reports that the Sudanese air force twice bombed Birmaza this week. The attacks, conducted jointly with armed militia groups, took a "heavy toll on the civilian population," the AU said.

The statement said the attacks were a "flagrant violation" of the Darfur Peace Agreement, signed in May by the government and one rebel group.

The Sudanese military was not immediately available for comment Sunday. Earlier this week, however, the army denied it was conducting an offensive in North Darfur, and categorically denied it was using the janjaweed to attack civilians.

"We as army cannot engage in any such attacks or make use of militias to attack our own citizens," the office of the army spokesman said Wednesday.

More than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced since fighting began in Darfur three years ago, when rebels stemming from ethnic African tribes rose up against the Arab-led central government.

Al-Naby, the rebel field commander, said his faction had waged a large battle against combined army and janjaweed forces on Saturday near Saiyah, about 15 miles north of Mellit. He said six rebels had been killed, including a field commander, and that eight were seriously injured.

Al-Naby said government forces suffered dozens of casualties, including a military commander, and that rebels destroyed nine pickups and captured another 21.

The rebels' battle claim could not be independently verified. In recent weeks, foreign journalists have been unable to obtain permits from the Sudanese government to enter Darfur.

On Saturday, U.N. chief of humanitarian affairs Jan Egeland said he had been barred by Sudanese authorities from visiting several of the areas where fighting is now reported.

DOJ_NMG_0096320

"The government is arming Arab militias more than ever before," Egeland said in an AP interview. He warned that the crisis "still has the potential of becoming infinitely worse."

The Sudanese Ministry of Humanitarian Affairs said Sunday that Egeland was spreading "lies and false accusations against the Sudan."

Hassabu Mohammed Abdallah, the humanitarian aid commissioner at the ministry, said Egeland's remarks were "a pure political act" seeking to boost the U.N. Security Council resolution that calls for the world body to send more than 20,000 peacekeepers to Darfur to replace the 7,000-strong AU force that has had little success in stopping the bloodshed.

Sudan's government has rejected the resolution, but this week appeared to accept a compromise in which a mixed U.N.-AU force would take over. The exact nature of this hybrid mission and the timing of the deployment were still being debated Sunday.

Nicaragua Eliminates Last Exception To Strict Anti-Abortion Law (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 19 — Hopes among women's groups in Nicaragua that President Enrique Bolaños would stop one of the most restrictive abortion laws in Latin America from taking effect have been dashed, as the president signed it into law late Friday.

Abortion has been illegal in Nicaragua for more than a century, and most women who decide to end unwanted pregnancies seek procedures at underground clinics. But the new law strikes out a clause that made it possible for a woman to obtain an abortion legally when three doctors certified that unless she did, her own life would be in danger.

For months, the proposed law has drawn fierce criticism from several local women's groups, the country's association of gynecologists, the United Nations, the World Health Organization and Human Rights Watch, among others.

"This is a throwback to the Middle Ages for women's rights," Juana Jiménez, the leader of the Women's Autonomous Movement in Nicaragua, said after the law was passed.

The law was the fruit of the recent presidential election, as conservatives saw a chance to gain its passage in Parliament during the election season.

The country is 85 percent Roman Catholic, with most other voters belonging to conservative evangelical churches. Four of the five presidential candidates supported it.

Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist who was president from 1985 to 1990 and the leader of the Sandinista Party, abandoned his ideological roots and supported passage of the law in an effort to gain support from the Roman Catholic Church in his campaign to regain the presidency. He narrowly won the election, on Nov. 5, with about 38 percent of the vote.

The support of the Sandinistas in the National Assembly was critical, because they had blocked similar measures in the past. The bill passed on Oct. 26.

Some opponents to the law had hoped Mr. Bolaños, a conservative, would not sign the bill because it did not include the stiffer sentences he had wanted for women who had had illegal abortions, or for those who had performed abortions. The six-year prison term remains unchanged under the law. The president had asked for a 30-year prison term.

Intrigue Swirls In Ex-K.G.B. Man's Illness (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 20, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 19 — The British police said Sunday that they were investigating the suspected poisoning of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a Russian former K.G.B. operative living in exile in Britain who had been inquiring into the killing of a journalist in Moscow last month.

The Russian authorities had no immediate comment on suggestions in news reports that the Russian secret service had poisoned Mr. Litvinenko, who is hospitalized and seriously ill, because he had criticized former colleagues and President Vladimir V. Putin.

Mr. Litvinenko is depicted by fellow exiles as a prominent opponent of the Kremlin, and he had told them he was looking into the killing on Oct. 7 of Anna Politkovskaya, who had made her name as a critic of the government's policies in Chechnya and who was gunned down at her apartment building.

Details from the police and news reports had some of the hallmarks of a spy thriller in the cold war vein of John le Carré.

The Sunday Times of London said the former agent had met Nov. 1 with an Italian contact identified only as Mario in a central London sushi bar.

Last week, Mr. Litvinenko told reporters he began to feel sick within hours of the meeting with Mario.

DOJ_NMG_0096321

"I ordered lunch, but he ate nothing," Mr. Litvinenko said, according to The Sunday Times, which apparently interviewed him after he began to feel ill but before his condition deteriorated. "He appeared to be very nervous. He handed me a four-page document which he said he wanted me to read right away."

"It contained a list of people, including an F.S.B. officer, who were purported to be connected with the journalist's murder," he said. The F.S.B., or Federal Security Service, is the successor to the K.G.B.

"I do feel very bad," Mr. Litvinenko told The Sunday Times. "I've never felt like this before — like my life is hanging on the ropes."

In a telephone interview, Boris Berezovsky, an exiled Russian tycoon who has had a long association with Mr. Litvinenko — dating from the late 1990s when, he and Mr. Litvinenko contended at the time, Mr. Litvinenko had balked at orders to assassinate Mr. Berezovsky — said he had visited Mr. Litvinenko in the hospital and found him "damaged terribly."

Mr. Berezovsky said Mr. Litvinenko had been granted British citizenship, so the poisoning was "a terror attack against a British citizen in Britain." The incident, he said, could create a problem for Prime Minister Tony Blair, who has sought to cultivate close ties with Mr. Putin.

A police spokeswoman, speaking on the condition of anonymity under police rules, said specialist police officers were "investigating a suspicious poisoning." She described Mr. Litvinenko's condition as "serious but stable."

John Henry, a clinical toxicologist who has been treating Mr. Litvinenko, told the BBC: "He's got a prospect of recovering. He's a got a prospect of dying."

Mr. Henry, who in 2004 treated President Viktor A. Yushchenko of Ukraine, who was poisoned with dioxin, identified the suspected poison in the Litvinenko case as thallium, a toxic metal used in rat poison and insecticides. "It is tasteless, colorless and odorless," he said. "It takes about a gram to kill you."

Andres Virchis, a physician at Barnet Hospital in north London where Mr. Litvinenko was first treated, said Sunday that Mr. Litvinenko's bone marrow had failed and that he was not producing any normal immune cells or white cells.

As Mr. Litvinenko's condition worsened, he began to lose his hair, Dr. Virchis said.

Mr. Litvinenko was granted asylum in Britain in 2001 after leaving Russia six years ago. In 2003 he published a book, "The F.S.B. Blows up Russia," accusing the Russian secret service of orchestrating a wave of explosions in apartment houses in 1999 that led to the second Chechen war.

He also claimed familiarity with the techniques of the Russian secret service. At the time of Mr. Yushchenko's poisoning, Mr. Litvinenko said that a secret K.G.B. laboratory in Moscow, still operated by the F.S.B., specialized in the study of poisons.

"The view inside our agency was that poison is just a weapon, like a pistol," said Mr. Litvinenko, who served in both agencies, from 1988 to 1999. "It's not seen that way in the West, but it was just viewed as an ordinary tool."

The accounts of intrigue could not be confirmed.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend who had visited Mr. Litvinenko in the hospital, told the BBC that doctors had told him that he had only a 50-50 chance of surviving. "He looks like a ghost," Mr. Goldfarb said.

Speaking later to reporters outside London's University College Hospital, to which Mr. Litvinenko had been transferred, Mr. Goldfarb said the British police interviewed Mr. Litvinenko on Sunday.

"He is in a fighting mood," Mr. Goldfarb said. Asked why Mr. Litvinenko might have been the target of an attack, Mr. Goldfarb said, "He is one of the top public enemies of the Russian F.S.B. and of Putin, particularly because of his book."

He added that Mr. Litvinenko belonged to "the so-called London émigré circle, which was branded by Russia as a terrorist cell on British soil."

Mr. Goldfarb called the poisoning "very scary — it means there's no limit."

British Police Investigate Poisoning Of Putin Critic (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 19 -- British police are investigating the poisoning of a former Russian spy and outspoken critic of President Vladimir Putin and have placed him under protective guard at a London hospital, a Scotland Yard spokesman said Sunday.

Alexander Litvinenko, 43, began vomiting shortly after he had lunch on Nov. 1 with a man who gave him documents related to the recent killing of Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian journalist, according to Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's.

Police said they began a criminal investigation Friday after medical tests confirmed the presence of poison in Litvinenko's system.

John Henry, a British toxicologist who has examined Litvinenko, said in an interview that the former spy had been poisoned by thallium, a highly toxic substance used as rat poison in some parts of the world.

DOJ_NMG_0096322

"It is absolutely clear" that he was poisoned, said Henry, who was involved in the investigation of the 2004 poisoning of Viktor Yushchenko, a Ukrainian presidential candidate who survived and won the race but was left disfigured.

Henry said Litvinenko had liver and neurological damage and a low white blood cell count. "He is very sick. . . . He may live, but he is at high risk of death."

Thallium is odorless, colorless and tasteless, Henry said. When ingested, he said, "as little as one-fifteenth of a level teaspoon is enough to kill."

Goldfarb, reached by telephone at Litvinenko's bedside, said Litvinenko's condition was "deteriorating dramatically."

"What happened here is an assassination attempt perpetuated by Russian agents," Goldfarb said. "I thought he would be safe here on British soil."

Goldfarb said that precious time was wasted because even though Litvinenko thought he had been poisoned immediately after the lunch meeting, doctors did not become alarmed until nearly two weeks later, when his hair started falling out as his condition worsened.

Litvinenko was a colonel in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, the successor to the KGB, but fell out with his superiors and spent months in jail awaiting trial on charges of abusing his position. He was acquitted and fled in 2000 to London, where he was granted asylum. Goldfarb said Litvinenko was granted British citizenship last month.

Litvinenko is well known in Russia for accusing FSB agents of involvement in apartment building bombings in 1999 that killed more than 300 people. Russian officials blamed the attacks on separatists from Chechnya and launched a new military offensive in the republic.

Litvinenko also accused his FSB superiors of ordering him to kill Boris Berezovsky, a Russian tycoon who now lives in London.

Berezovsky said in a telephone interview that he visited Litvinenko in the hospital Friday and that he looked as if he had aged 10 years. "For 17 days he hasn't been able to eat. It's very painful to eat," he said.

Berezovsky said Litvinenko told him he had "no doubt" that he had been poisoned on the "order from President Putin to kill him." He called the poisoning "a classic way" that Russian agents work.

Attempts to reach a spokesman at the Russian Embassy in London were unsuccessful Sunday. A person who answered the phone said to call back Monday.

Goldfarb said Litvinenko had eaten lunch at a sushi restaurant with an Italian contact who he said gave him "a few pages of material" related to the killing of Politkovskaya, the journalist and critic of Putin and Russia's policy in Chechnya. Politkovskaya was shot last month in Moscow.

The case, which remains unsolved, caused an international outcry.

Politkovskaya was hospitalized in 2004 and believed she had been poisoned.

Goldfarb said that Scotland Yard officers have taken the papers given to Litvinenko on Nov. 1.

According to British media reports, police have visited the sushi restaurant in central London to look for clues and to see whether any closed-circuit camera surveillance of the incident exists.

This incident is reminiscent of the 1978 poisoning of Bulgarian dissident Georgi Markov, who was jabbed in the leg by a man with an umbrella while walking across Waterloo Bridge in London. The umbrella fired a pellet of ricin poison into Markov, who died an agonizing death days later.

G-20 Meeting Puts Energy Topics As Primary Focus (WSJ)

By Owen Brown

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

MELBOURNE, Australia -- Some of the world's most influential policy makers agreed yesterday on the immediate problems threatening the global economy but failed to reach a consensus on the best strategies to address them.

A two-day annual meeting of the Group of 20 finance ministers and central bankers accepted that rising global demand for energy and minerals will threaten to spark higher inflation. Underscoring the challenges faced by policy makers, an International Energy Agency paper presented to the meeting projected energy demand will grow 50% in the next 25 years. Areas of agreement outlined included the need to revise energy subsidies to "better target poverty, and ensure price signals work to expand supply and induce efficiency."

The issues of carbon taxes and greenhouse-gas emissions bedeviled attempts to reach a strategy for reining in demand and stabilizing prices. A push by some countries such as Russia, France and India to embrace nuclear power as a way to diversify energy consumption and reduce climate-changing emissions was another topic that split the G-20 membership.

The G-20 brings together the world's most developed countries such as the U.S., Japan and the European Union with emerging economic powerhouses including China and India. But the diversity of the group's membership also created a major stumbling block to reaching consensus on energy security, climate change and overhaul of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

DOJ_NMG_0096323

U.S. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt said that in the wake of higher prices, oil-producing countries needed to avoid supply disruptions and adopt investment codes that reflect best practices around the world.

Germany's Finance Minister Peer Steinbrück said G-2O members agreed on the need to promote energy efficiency and expand use of renewable technology.

Australian Treasurer Peter Costello, who chaired the meeting, deflected criticism that the G-20's embrace of open energy markets is an empty gesture without the cooperation of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries. The G-20 statement said the outlook for global growth remains positive even as growth is expected to slow slightly from the rapid pace of the past few years. But it warned that maintaining growth and containing inflation will require adjustments to monetary and fiscal policies.

Energy Output Short Of Demand (WT)

By Andrea R. Mihailescu

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

Mexico, the No. 2 U.S. supplier of oil, is unable to produce enough to meet the demands of its customers, especially its neighbor to the north, because of outdated national economic policies that have hamstrung its oil and gas exploration and production, analysts say.

Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon met with Canadian officials this month to discuss trade and explore further cooperation as Mexico's production capacity dives.

Although Mexico has the potential to be an energy powerhouse, the country's national oil company, Pemex, lacks the investment funds to improve production in mature fields.

As oil prices rose and production increased in the past year, the government became addicted to Pemex's revenues, taking more than 60 percent of the company's earnings, which provide a third of the national budget, the Canadian newsmagazine Maclean's reported.

Mexico "should be an energy megastar and is performing way off Broadway in terms of production vitality, because Pemex is required to turn over the bulk of its revenues to the government. This prevents exploration, infrastructure investment, and creates debt," said Vincent DeVito, an international energy attorney with Pepper Hamilton LLP in New York and a former acting assistant secretary of energy.

Canada and Mexico are the top two suppliers of oil to the United States, with exports of 2.1 million and 1.8 million barrels per day respectively, but the two countries are worlds apart in the development of their energy resources.

"Oil and gas will continue to be a significant part of [the U.S.] energy supply and Pemex must devise a way to allow private investment into the Mexico market in order to remain a secure supplier," Mr. DeVito said. "If not, there will be a crisis in Mexico; and, a crisis in Mexico is a crisis in the United States and, conceivably, a crisis in Canada."

Pemex has accrued debt and recently posted a net loss of $7 billion for 2005, despite record-high oil prices. Production is expected to face a steep decline and, as things stand, Mexico has only 10 years of reserves left.

All hydrocarbon resources are nationalized under the country's constitution. In 1938, the industry was nationalized with the establishment of Pemex as the state oil company.

Although Canada plans to boost production, it cannot make up for the shortfall caused by Mexico's export decline. The shortfall will force the United States to seek alternative suppliers, which will likely increase prices, according to analysts.

U.N. Job Seekers Get Chance To Impress (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- The jockeying for top jobs in a new U.N. administration has begun in earnest with the arrival in New York of incoming Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, who will take over the organization in six weeks.

Senior management in some departments will be replaced for the first time in a decade or more, forcing longtime staffers out of their sinecures and giving Mr. Ban an opportunity to remake the organization to his liking.

Mr. Ban, who stepped down last week as South Korean foreign minister, arrived at the United Nations on Thursday to take part in a transition that has been gathering steam since his unanimous selection in mid-October.

He is expected to announce his senior staff appointments -- including a chief of staff and deputy secretary-general -- shortly after he is sworn in as the eighth U.N. secretary-general on Dec. 14. He takes full charge of the organization on Jan. 1.

Mr. Ban has begun a round of meetings with at least three dozen undersecretaries-general and assistant secretaries-general, as well as with key ambassadors, representatives of nongovernmental organizations and trusted advisers.

DOJ_NMG_0096324

The Ban team is using the meetings mainly to gather information, but for many U.N. officials, the appointments serve as half-hour opportunities to impress the new boss and keep their jobs or trade up.

"He has a battery of appointments," said one person involved with the transition. "He wants to find out what is happening in [each] area and have a bit of look-see at these people: Can they walk and talk and shoot straight? The real emphasis is on sucking in as much info as possible."

Of course, the source added, "There are important personnel decisions looming."

Departing Secretary-General Kofi Annan has refused to approve long-term contracts for most senior management, leaving Mr. Ban a free hand to select his own heads of major departments. Most contracts will expire at the end of December or the end of February, according to current officials.

In the meantime, the 39-story glass-walled U.N. headquarters has been reverberating with gossip, whispering campaigns, rumors and outright disinformation.

Will Mr. Ban favor Asians or bend against them in order to seem impartial? Will he keep some top managers or replace as many as three dozen officials over the next few months? Is it true that he will consider only women for the most prominent posts? Have major nations already locked down the departments they want to run? How much influence will Washington have?

"Those who talk don't know," said one knowledgeable adviser, pleading ignorance. "I don't think any decisions have been made yet."

Mr. Ban's advisers, most of them plucked from South Korea's Foreign Ministry, have been absorbing information from various sources inside and outside the United Nations. People who observed him last week said he was proceeding methodically, taking in information and "truth-testing" what he hears.

The Korean diplomat inherits an organization that has been allowed to grow haphazardly as its membership and responsibilities have expanded. Staff morale has sunk over recent years in the face of the Iraq oil-for-food investigation, sex scandals in peacekeeping, widespread perceptions of bad management, lax oversight and selective accountability.

The United Nations now costs some $2 billion to run each year, and the separate peacekeeping budget is expected to nearly double to $10 billion a year by 2008.

Many are hoping that Mr. Ban, 62, will work with almost surgical cleanliness and precision to slice away the nonperformers and the underqualified. Others are fearing drastic change.

Preparations for Mr. Ban's arrival have been under way throughout the U.N. system.

His transition team is temporarily based in a glass-walled office tower across the street from the Secretariat, a modern office space with work cubicles and constantly ringing phones.

Mr. Ban is expected to spend most of the next six weeks in New York, except for brief trips back to Seoul and at least one visit to Washington.

Independence For Kosovo (WSJ)

By Agim Ceku

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

PRISTINA -- Just as it seemed that the Balkans were finally turning the corner, we are instead entering another period of stagnation, delay and uncertainty. A United Nations decision on Kosovo's status, originally expected before the end of this year, has been postponed. The expectations in Kosovo are high. Kosovo is hungry for independence, Kosovo is ready for independence, and now is not the time to stop the clock.

We need to keep the process of statehood on track. Kosovo needs clarity to complete reforms and to attract vital international investments, but also so that our people -- and especially our Serb minority -- can escape the debilitating worries and uncertainty and start to build a future. Their home and future are in Kosovo.

There are two things we must do in Kosovo to succeed as a progressive and a modern independent state. First, we should further improve our institutions to achieve more transparency and a functioning legal system. Second, we need a broad political commitment to development and modernization.

Independence is only the first step and, in itself, is insufficient to provide for Kosovo's future. Kosovo needs a clear perspective for European Union membership. We can only succeed within this framework. This above all means prioritizing economic revitalization in the post-independence period. Nothing short of an economic boom will get us up to speed; the EU train will not wait for Kosovo, or the rest of the region for that matter. The biggest problem in the Western Balkans is economic malaise.

It is the Kosovars, not Belgrade, who have a real interest and stake in seeing Kosovo succeed. Moderate Serbs have long lost interest in Kosovo. Only those desperate for cheap, nationalist rhetorical points claim to care about it. Belgrade offers no vision, no economic or European agenda to the people of Kosovo. Increasing numbers of Serbs, especially those living in Kosovo, are beginning to see beyond this bankrupt world view.

DOJ_NMG_0096325

I have no doubt that seeing Kosovo become independent will be a difficult new reality for Serbia. But it is the only way. Belgrade is not interested in investing in the development of Kosovo, and Kosovo is not interested in a political union with Serbia. But we are interested in developing a productive bilateral partnership with Serbia, just as we're doing with our other neighbors.

Social and economic progress in the region will be the big losers if we don't make the bold step forward to independence. The entire Western Balkan region needs a kick start in order to catch the EU train and catch up with the awesome economic growth of our EU-bound neighbors Romania and Bulgaria. This is the only way forward and the only way into the EU. Globalization is a reality which won't pause so we can get ready. The pace is being set in Asia, but transition will have to happen here in the Western Balkans if we wish to compete.

Most of us in the Balkans share a common vision about our future -- we want to get into the EU as fast as possible. The way to do it is through reforms. This wasn't an easy process for the Baltic countries. It wasn't easy for Eastern and Central Europe. And it won't be easy for the Balkan states either. The region needs to find its comparative advantage in Europe and in the global market. It will do so as soon as we settle the final status of Kosovo.

Can Kosovo survive? Sure. If we reform, we'll do very well. My government has adopted a proactive "3E" plan for Kosovo based on energy, economy and education. With large deposits of coal, Kosovo can in a few years become a net electricity exporter. With the right technology we can even do this with an environmental face.

The economy is picking up. There is no currency risk in Kosovo now that we've adopted the euro. We have privatized around 90% of the asset value of all state-owned enterprises. The financial sector has already been privatized, and we are now attracting new investments into the telecom and energy sectors. Much remains to be done, including cleaning up corruption in the courts, but we're on the right track.

We have a young population and a positive birth rate. Given the shortages in the EU labor market due to negative demographic trends, Kosovo can help fill the void. To do so, we need to retrain our work force. Hence we're now investing in education.

The EU is facing a crisis, and it needs time to consolidate and reset its internal political balances. However, this is no reason to lose sight of its strategic goal: a Europe whole and free. Right now this is still not the reality, at least not in the Western Balkans.

Mr. Çeku is the prime minister of Kosovo.

Japan Shrinks (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, November 20, 2006

TOKYO -- Japan has embarked on a path no developed nation has ever followed -- of sustained and inexorable population decline.

Japan won't be alone, of course. Italy, Russia, South Korea and many others also will get smaller. The United States is the exception among advanced nations, and not only thanks to immigration; its overall birth rate is higher, too.

But Japan, which shrank by about 21,000 last year, is in the forefront, and so everyone else will be watching. Does population decline inevitably sap vitality and doom a country to genteel poverty? Or is there some way out?

"Japan is the leader, so it's important for Japan to show success," says Hitoshi Suzuki, a cheerful senior researcher at Daiwa Institute of Research, who pronounces himself "not so worried" -- so not worried, in fact, that last year he wrote "Population Decline is Not Something We Need to Fear."

But why not? For a population to hold steady, every woman must give birth on average to 2.1 children. When the birthrate drops below 1.5 and stays there for any time, it's almost impossible to recover, given the momentum of demographics. Below 1.3 is considered "lowest-low." China is at 1.7 and dropping. Japan last year clocked in at 1.25.

As a result, Japan's population, now about 128 million, is expected to fall to about 100 million by mid-century. Big deal, you might say. Wasn't Japan happy enough 50 years ago, when it blew through the 100 million mark on the way up?

Yes, but it was a very different 100 million then. In 1965 there were 25 million children in Japan, 67 million people of working age and 6 million senior citizens. In 2050 there will be 11 million children, 54 million potential workers and 36 million people 65 and over. No one knows whether such a society can maintain a spirit of innovation, or how its capitalists will adapt to a shrinking market. There will potentially be a lot more dependents for every productive worker.

Faced with this prospect, a country could choose to fight (raise the birthrate) or cope (prepare to manage the consequences). Japan gives lip service to the former. Since 1990 the government has sought to encourage more births, but the policy has had no impact. Today the portfolio of the minister in charge of spurring fertility seems to indicate a certain lack of governmental focus: She is minister of state for Okinawa and Northern Territories Affairs, science and technology, innovation, gender equality and social affairs, and food safety.

DOJ_NMG_0096326

In truth, Japan doesn't seem to want to change as it would have to in order to increase the birthrate. Japanese women say in surveys that they want two children, but they delay or abstain from marriage and motherhood in astonishing numbers because fathers don't help around the house, because mothers feel isolated in tiny apartments and because it's so hard for a woman to combine career and motherhood.

In theory, the government is dedicated to reforming this. In practice, its philosophy seems aptly represented by Deputy Chief Cabinet Secretary Hakubun Shimomura, who said this month, when pressed about long waiting lists for public nursery schools, that the problem would be solved if mothers would only "stay at home and raise their children."

When I asked Prime Minister Shinzo Abe last week about this comment, he diplomatically avoided contradicting Shimomura but said his aim is to provide choices so mothers can work or stay home as they see fit. But he also made clear that he is focused on the coping rather than the preventing: "Even considering the decline in the population, I am convinced Japan will be able to continue on a path of growth," he said.

The trick will be "innovation," Abe said, and economic reform. In fact, robots and other ways to improve productivity are one of four possible routes to economic growth despite an aging population. The others would be making better use of women; immigration, which has increased slightly but remains unpopular in this ethnically cohesive country; and keeping the elderly working longer. According to Naohiro Ogawa, a population expert at Nihon University, if every healthy elderly person worked, Japan's total economy in 2025 would be worth 791 trillion yen instead of the currently projected 619 trillion yen, an increase of 28 percent. Just raising the retirement age from 60 to 65 would produce a 12 percent increase.

Not every old person is going to work. But, Ogawa said, "there will be some adjustment. Japan's not going to fall apart."

It could certainly decline, though. Toru Suzuki, a demographer at the National Institute of Population and Social Security Research, believes Japan will eventually accept more immigrants after it has tried everything else. But he's also less convinced than Hitoshi Suzuki that Japan will find a path to growth.

"It brings you to a very tough question," Toru Suzuki says. "What is happiness? Can we be happy without economic growth?"

At least Japan will find out from a starting position of wealth. China, which imposed a one-child policy before it had developed economically, may get old before it gets rich. That will be a first, too.

DOJ_NMG_0096327

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, November 20, 2006 8:18 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, November 20, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061120.pdf; agnb061120.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Lame Duck Session Will Not Act On Domestic Surveillance Program 3
Open-Ended Detentions Could Be Barred 3
Legal Ambiguity Seen As Inducement To Develop "Truth Serum." 3

Homeland Response:

Federal Air Marshals Kept Off Flight At National Airport 3
AFGE Will Lobby Congress To Unionize Airport Screeners 3
International Travelers Rate US Entry System "World's Worst." 4

War News:

Pentagon Group Outlines Three Options For Iraq 4
Pentagon Says "Minor Miracle" Of Reconstruction Under Way In Iraq 4
Kissinger Says Military Victory In Iraq Not Possible 5
McCain, Graham Call For Additional US Troops In Iraq 6
Rangel Proposes Bringing Back The Draft 7
Critics Say Rice Bears Much Responsibility For Iraq "Mess." 8
Critic Of Invasion Could Be Next US Ambassador To Iraq 9
Cycles Of Revenge Seen As Fueling Violence In Iraq 9
Hostage Search Continues 9
Human Rights Watch Says Saddam's Trial Was Flawed 10
General Odierno Discusses Return To Iraq 10
Iraqis Describe Mixed Feelings About US 10
Afghan Army Will Attack Taliban In Winter 11

Corporate Scandals:

State Bar Associations Fighting Back Against Privilege Waivers 11
SEC Formally Inquires About Ford Earnings Disclosures 12
SEC Says Most Restatements Due To Accounting Mistakes 12
KB Home's CEO Leaves Amid Options Probe With $175 Million Compensation Package 13

Criminal Law:

HUD Probes Allegations Against NASA Official 13
Maryland Mall Shooting Under Investigation 14
NYTimes Columnist Decries Sexual Abuse Of Children 14

Civil Rights:

Riot Retrospective Seeks To Increase Understanding Of Civil Rights Struggle 14
Airline Employee's Treatment Of Nursing Mother Sparks National Protest 15
McCain Says Supreme Court Should Overturn Roe 15
Romney Makes Effort To Place Gay Marriage Ban Onto Ballot 15
Advocates See Chance For Revival Of Gays In Military Debate 15

Antitrust:

Freeport To Buy Phelps In Copper Merger 15
Blackstone Near Deal To Buy Equity Officer Properties 16
US Airways Head Faces Daunting Management Challenge .17
Final Putnam Bids Due Before Thanksgiving 17
Philadelphia Exchange Chief Urges Close Scrutiny Of CME-CBOT Merger 17

Environment:

NYTimes Warns Deforestation Will Cause Climate Problems 18
WPost Calls Responsible Fisheries Management Crucial 18
WPost Praises DC Bill Establishing "Green" Building Requirements 18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Investigation Of Online Prescription Drug Operation 19
27 Indicted, $15.7 Million Worth Of Drugs Seized In Mississippi Investigation 19
NFL To Keep Drug Program Agents Until End Of Season 19

Opium Poppy Crop Destroyed In Colombia, Elimination Of Industrial Plantations Declared 19

Immigration:

NYTimes Says Urges Attention To Immigration Reform 20

Tax:

IRS Advisory Committee Seeks Tax Payments From Online Auctioneers 20
LATimes Calls For Overhaul Of Federal Tax Code 20

Congress-Administration:

Levin Undecided On Gates Confirmation 20
Cheney Praises Olson For Bush v. Gore Performance 21
Hoyer Seeks Assurance From Pelosi That Backers Won't Face Retaliation 21
House GOP Sticks With Leadership Team Of Boehner, Blunt 21
Remains Of "Gang Of 14" May Play Role In 110th Congress 22
In Face Of "Rumors," Lindsey Warns Bush Against Tax Increase Deal 23
Reid Says Prospect Of Cheney Presidency Means No Bush Impeachment 23
Paulson To Deliver Address On US Capital Market Competitiveness 23
Official's Role In Bush Effort To Promote Marriage Examined 23
Florida 13th CD Race Could End Up Before House Administration Committee 24
Novak Says Senate Dissenters Block Pork 24
Public Gets First Glimpses Of New Justices 24
DISA Leads Federal Government In Embracing Telecommuting 25
Gerberding "Under Attack" Over CDC's Difficulties 25
Mint To Unveil Presidential Dollar Coin Series 25
WSJournal Says FDA's Approval Of Breast Implants Is Good News 25
Chances Of Congressional Reform Already Said To Be Fading 25

Other News:

Incomes Rising At Highest Pace Since 1990s 26
Drug Industry Begins Courting Democrats 26
McCain Leads Early Odds For 2008 GOP Nomination 26
Kerry Says "Botched" Iraq Joke Won't Affect Presidential Run 26
Gingrich Won't Make Decision On 2008 Until September 26
Obama Seen As Main Impediment To Clinton Presidential Nomination 27
Dean Addresses Gay Leadership Conference 27
Foley Ends Stay At Rehabilitation Facility 28
Four Defeated GOP Lawmakers Live On Same D Street Block 28
Food Banks Falling Behind Demand For Holiday Assistance 28
Studies Find Minority Test Performance Gap Persists 28
States Struggle To Fund Transportation Needs 28
Allen's "Macaca" Gaffe Seen As Worst Self-Inflicted Wound Of 2006 29
MSNBC Gives Greater Emphasis To Politics, Opinion 29
WSJournal Says AHI Can Improve 29
NYTimes Urges New York Officials To Use Public Transportation 29
APEC Statement On North Korea Seen As Falling Short Of US Goal 29
Bush Touts Trade As Conducive To Political Freedom 30
Bush Defends Religious Freedom In Visit To Vietnamese Church 31
Massive Protests Await Bush In Indonesia 31
IAEA Meets To Considers Iran Request For Nuclear Aid 32
Palestinians Form Human Shields To Prevent Israeli Air Strikes 33
Nasrallah Calls For Protests Against Beirut 33
India Test-Fires Missile 33
Blair, Musharraf Meet, Strengthen Ties 33
Somali Ambush Kills Six Ethiopians 34
Pope Has Become Unexpected Critic Of Islamic Violence 34
Sudanese Military Attacks North Darfur 34
Nicaragua's Anti-Abortion Law Becomes Stricter 34
Exiled KGB Operative Poisoned In Britain 35
G-20 Membership Divided On Energy Policy 35
Mexican Economic Policies Said To Cripple Energy Industry 35
Ban Starts UN Administration Hiring Process 36
Prime Minister Calls For Kosovar Independence 36
WPost Says Japan Should Worry About Decreasing Population 36

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 36

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 37

DOJ_NMG_0096330

TERRORISM NEWS:

Lame Duck Session Will Not Act On Domestic Surveillance Program. US News and World Report (11/27, Halloran) reports, "Republicans who limped back to Washington for a lame duck congressional session last week found a host of marching orders from President Bush, but perhaps none more urgent than this: Before Democrats take control of Congress in January, they must pass legislation authorizing the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program. … The response: deafening silence. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist quickly dispatched aides to put out the word on Bush's request: Not gonna happen." With Democrats "promising oversight hearings next year on how the program was hatched and whom it targets, it appears likely that the issue will be decided in court and, ultimately, the Supreme Court."

Open-Ended Detentions Could Be Barred. The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Serrano, 850K) reports, "Five years after Muslim immigrants were abused in a federal jail here, the guards who beat them and the Washington policymakers who decided to hold them for months without charges are being called to account. Some 1,200 Middle Eastern men were arrested on suspicion of terrorism after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. No holding place was so notorious as Brooklyn's nine-story Metropolitan Detention Center. In a special unit on the top floor, detainees were smashed into walls, repeatedly stripped and searched, and often denied basic legal rights and religious privileges, according to federal investigations." The Bureau of Prisons "disciplined" 13 staffers, firing two of them. The warden retired. In addition, "in what could turn out to be a landmark case, a lawsuit filed by two Brooklyn detainees against top Bush administration officials is moving forward in the federal courts in New York." FBI Director Robert Mueller and former Attorney Gen. John Ashcroft are named in the suit. The Times describes the alleged abuses suffered by the two plaintiffs.

Legal Ambiguity Seen As Inducement To Develop "Truth Serum." The Washington Post (11/20, Brown, 690K) reports, "The debate earlier this year on interrogation techniques in the war on terrorism raised anew a question that goes back at least 2,000 years. Is there something you can give a person that will make him tell the truth? … In the 21st century, however, the answer appears to be: No." The Post notes, "For the record, spokesmen for the Army medical research command, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) and the CIA say there is no work underway on truth serums. Whether such a substance could ever be used legally is a question some legal scholars believe is still open," and "this ambiguous legal status, combined with advances in neuroscience, lead some to suspect there may be a second act for truth serum."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Federal Air Marshals Kept Off Flight At National Airport. The Washington Times (11/20, Hudson, 88K) reports federal air marshals were "prevented from protecting" a Nov. 8 flight departing from Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport "because a gate agent erroneously said they did not have the correct paperwork, say marshals familiar with the incident." Federal Air Marshal Service (FAMS) spokesman Conan Bruce confirmed that "federal air marshals were denied boarding." Sources "told The Washington Times on the condition of anonymity that the gate agent demanded paperwork which is required of other law-enforcement officials, but not from federal air marshals who are on duty to protect the plane from a terrorist attack. … Even the intervention of higher-ups in the Homeland Security Department could not persuade the airline to allow the armed law-enforcement agents aboard, and the plane departed unprotected an hour and a half late, the sources said."

AFGE Will Lobby Congress To Unionize Airport Screeners. USA Today (11/20, 3A, Frank, 2.27M) reports the UN International Labor Organization's recent finding that airport security screeners should have union representation has prompted a plan by the American Federation of Government "to lobby Congress' new Democratic leaders to let TSA screeners unionize. The TSA says unionization could hinder managers from quickly moving screeners to new assignments as security threats arise." International Labor Organization spokesman Hans von Rohland says the finding "reflects that the TSA is not following the United Nations' 'core labor standards,'" and "will encourage Congress to let screeners unionize."

DOJ_NMG_0096331

International Travelers Rate US Entry System "World's Worst." The Washington Post (11/20, A15, Hsu, 690K) reports the US travel industry "blames security" for the nation's decline in world popularity. "A plurality of international travelers rated the US visa and immigration entry system the 'world's worst,' according to data released today that was commissioned by a tourism business lobby. Interviews with 2,011 non-U.S. residents who had traveled beyond their home continents in the past 18 months found that 39 percent rated the United States the least traveler-friendly, more than twice the percentage that gave bottom grades to the Middle East (16 percent), Asia (12 percent) or Africa (12 percent)." The Post adds, 'The questions were somewhat self-serving, and researchers drew more than a fifth of the participants from countries with mixed relations with the United States, such as China and Venezuela."

Noting the survey's findings, the Wall Street Journal (11/20, A4, King, 2.04M) reports that though Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "promised "nearly a year ago to put a friendlier face on the American travel experience," foreign travelers are not "getting that impression." Traveler's "negative experiences appear to be heavily focused on obtaining a visa and then getting past immigration and customs' officials."

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon Group Outlines Three Options For Iraq. The Washington Post (11/20, Ricks, 690K) reports, "The Pentagon's closely guarded review of how to improve the situation in Iraq has outlined three basic options: Send in more troops, shrink the force but stay longer, or pull out, according to senior defense officials. Insiders have dubbed the options 'Go Big,' 'Go Long' and 'Go Home.' The group conducting the review is likely to recommend a combination of a small, short-term increase in US troops and a long-term commitment to stepped-up training and advising of Iraqi forces, the officials said." The military's study, commissioned by Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, "comes at a time when escalating violence is causing Iraq policy to be reconsidered by both the White House and the congressionally chartered, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Pace's effort will feed into the White House review, but military officials have made it clear they are operating independently." The Pentagon group "has given a thumbs-down to what it considered variants of withdrawal, such as pulling US units out of the cities and keeping them in isolated enclaves, where they would not interact with the Iraqi population but would be available to combat major insurgent offensives and also to protect the government against coups."

Bush Appears To Lean Toward "Last Big Push" Option. The Christian Science Monitor (11/20, LaFranchi, 59K) reports, "It's being dubbed by some as the 'last big push' option, and it appears increasingly to be what President Bush favors on Iraq. Despite growing expectations of a troop withdrawal from Iraq in the wake of Democratic gains in Congress, the White House appears to be leaning in a different direction: at least a temporary rise in US troop levels." The numbers "would not be huge, perhaps 20,000 on top of the 144,000 US soldiers already fighting the war." But "the idea would be to stabilize Baghdad -- a priority that has proved dishearteningly elusive since September - and to allow for a major diplomatic push aimed at drawing Iraq's neighbors into resolving the spiraling violence."

Army Rewrites Rumsfeld Doctrine. The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Barnes, 850K) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld may be leaving under a cloud of criticism over his handling of the Iraq war, but his invasion plan -- emphasizing speed over massive troop numbers -- has consistently been held up as a resounding success. Yet with Iraq near chaos 3 1/2 years later, a key Army manual now is being rewritten in a way that rejects the Rumsfeld doctrine and counsels against using it again. The draft version of the Army's Full Spectrum Operations field manual argues that in addition to defeating the enemy, military units must focus on providing security for the population — even during major combat." Rumsfeld and the Pentagon drew criticism, respectively, for dismissing postwar looting and not doing enough postwar planning; "the old manual emphasized that stability operations usually follow combat. The draft version of the 2007 ground operations manual instructs commanders that they cannot wait for offensive operations to end before providing security and services for the population, and stresses a combination of offense, defense and stability operations."

Pentagon Says "Minor Miracle" Of Reconstruction Under Way In Iraq. The

DOJ_NMG_0096332

Washington Times (11/20, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "When and if the smoke ever clears in Iraq, Pentagon officials say the world finally will see a minor miracle. 'Most Americans don't understand something equivalent to the Marshall Plan has been accomplished in Iraq,' said Dean G. Popps, principal assistant secretary of the Army for acquisitions, logistics and technology. ... Amid constant deadly threats from bloodthirsty insurgents, and without a viable Iraqi private contracting sector, the Army Corps of Engineers has supervised the construction of electric grids, health care centers, schools, water and sewage treatment facilities, police stations, academies and border posts." The positively oriented article notes that inspector general Stuart Bowen "has said fraud involving U.S. money, while serious, is not widespread and that the huge majority of projects proceeded as required."

Kissinger Says Military Victory In Iraq Not Possible. ABC World News (11/19, story 2, 2:00, Morrell, 8.78M) reported, "Henry Kissinger, who helped negotiate the end of the Vietnam war and who more recently had been advising President Bush on Iraq, today said a clear military victory is not possible there." Henry Kissinger, former Secretary of State: "I think we have to redefine the course. But I don't believe that the alternative is between military victory, as it had been defined previously, or total withdrawal." ABC added, "Sen. John McCain, who spent more than five years as a prisoner of the North Vietnamese, disagrees. But says we are repeating mistakes made in Vietnam." Sen. John McCain: "The lesson I learned from Vietnam is applicable today. If you're going to do what's necessary to succeed, i.e. the Powell Doctrine, then go ahead and do it. If you're not going to, then don't."

The Financial Times (11/20, Negus, Kirchgaessner) says Kissinger offered a "dire" assessment of the situation in Iraq. Asked if the US-led coalition could win the war, he said, "If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control...I don't believe that is possible." Kissinger also endorsed the "view that the US should engage Iraq's neighbours in seeking a diplomatic solution," and "reinforced calls by Democratic lawmakers in Washington for the White House to speak to Iran and Syria to help stem the tide of violence in Iraq."

The AP (11/20) also reports Kissinger "presented a bleak vision of Iraq, saying the US government must enter into dialogue with Iraq's regional neighbors -- including Iran -- if progress is to be made in the region." The Washington Post (11/20, 690K) runs a brief report on Kissinger's comments, noting he also "warned against a rapid withdrawal of US-led troops, saying it could destabilize Iraq's neighbors and cause a long-lasting conflict."

Syria Pledges To Help End Iraq Violence, Calls For Timetable On US Withdrawal. The New York Times (11/20, A14, Semple, 1.16M) reports Syria's foreign minister said Sunday during a visit to Baghdad "that his government was prepared to help stabilize Iraq, and he called for a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops, saying that it would help reduce the violence." During the first trip to Baghdad by a senior Syrian official since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem "promised Sunday to cooperate with Iraqi officials in an effort to curb violence." Meanwhile, the Times notes that the Syrian ambassador in Washington said co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, James Baker, "has met several times with Syrian officials to discuss how they might cooperate with the United States."

The Washington Post (11/20, Trejos, 690K) also reports the Syrian official "pledged cooperation in stemming the sectarian violence." Syria and Iraq "have been adversaries since the 1980s, when Syria sided with Iran in its war against Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Moore, 850K) quotes Moallem saying, "We think that the presence of a timetable for withdrawal of foreign troops will assist in reducing the violence and creating security." In a news conference, Moallem "denied suggestions that Syria had been pressured by the United States to meet with Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari." The AP (11/20, Hurst) and USA Today (11/20, 2.27M) run similar reports.

Lawmakers Endorse Talks With Iran And Syria Regarding Iraq. A number of lawmakers from both parties yesterday urged a change in US policy regarding Iraq. Specifically, they urged the Administration to engage Iran and Syria. Democratic Sen. Carl Levin, asked if on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer) if Iran and Syria "should be part of this international conference that you want to see convene to deal with Iraq," said, "Yes, I think so. And not only do I think so; 40 senators thought so when we voted for that about six, seven months ago, that there should be an international conference. I'll predict the Baker-Hamilton commission will propose an international conference. It has to include those countries, whether we like them or not. And we don't."

DOJ_NMG_0096333

Sen. John McCain was asked on ABC's This Week (11/19, Stephanopoulos) if he could support "the possibility of engaging Syria and Iran in [a] diplomatic process," McCain responded, "I don't mind engaging them at all. I think we have to understand that we not only have the Iranian nuclear problem, but the Iranians are on the ascendancy if we fail. So it's going to be very difficult to find common interests. Now, maybe long-term, it's in Iran's interests not to see chaos in the region. I don't know. But in the short term, both Iran and Syria do not share the same goals that the United States of America does. And we have to take that in consideration when we have discussions with them."

Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (11/19, Russert) to describe "a real way forward in Iraq," Senator-elect James Webb said, "I was saying, even before we went in, that there were three major issues in the Middle East that had to be addressed. One was the Israeli-Arab situation, the other was terrorism, and the third was Iraq, and that if we lumped them together that we risked having a problem with all three of them. That has happened. … What we need…is a diplomatic approach that will bring the countries in the region to the table so that we can have…diplomatic ownership from the countries that have long-term cultural and historical ties with Iraq. … We need to talk to Iran and Syria. I think it was a great mistake not to, as this moves forward. And that's one thing that I've been encouraged to hear from former Secretary of State Baker that, you know, you need to talk to your enemies as well as your friends. You don't have to give up anything in terms of national concerns, to be talking to them, but it's impossible to resolve the situation now without talking to them."

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer), said, "I, too, have called for a region-wide conference. I think we should bring other countries in that region into this mix because it's not good for any of them to have an eruption or a terrorist haven in Iraq." Asked if the conference should include Iran and Syria, Hutchison responded, "I think that depends on Iran and Syria. I think that, of course, Iran would have to agree to immediately stop making a nuclear weapon because that is a destabilizing force in the region. And certainly, Syria would have to agree to stop aiding and abetting the insurgents and the terrorists that have showed up around the Middle East. So I think it depends on their behavior. If they would be a positive force, I think, of course. But it does take prerequisites."

Sen. Jon Tester, also on NBC's Meet the Press (11/19, Russert), remarked, "We need to work with our allies within the region. We also need to talk to our enemies and put diplomatic pressure on them. But we also need to visit with our allies around the world to develop a plan to make, to make this war come to some sort of conclusion and get our troops home."

Rep. Steny Hoyer, on ABC's This Week (11/19, Stephanopoulos), said, "We need to reach out to the surrounding states. We need to have bilateral talks with the Syrians and the Iranians. … As Jim Baker has said, if you don't sit down and talk, there's not going to be progress."

Rep. Roy Blunt, on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer), said, "I think we ought to have the right kind of discussions with Iran and Syria. But the worst thing that can happen in Iraq is if we let the future of Iraq be determined by the Syrians, by the Iranians or by the Saudis. They may be very well in a conflict, internally, that they're going to have to solve themselves. But one of the things that we can do is insist that that happen. Maybe that involves discussions with the Syrians and the Iranians. Maybe it doesn't. But what would be a big mistake is to let those neighboring countries come in and have undue influence on what happens for the people of Iraq."

McCain, Graham Call For Additional US Troops In Iraq. During his appearance on ABC's This Week (11/19, Stephanopoulos), Sen. John McCain was asked if it is "currently immoral to keep" US soldiers in Iraq because he believes more troops are necessary to win the war. McCain replied, "Yes, it is. And we've got to ask ourselves some questions. One, are we winning? And I think the answer is no. … Can we still win? Yes, I believe we can. It'll be tough, but we need to do it. And what we need to do is we've got to control the strongholds in Anbar. We've got to hold them with Iraqi and US forces and provide sufficient security. We've got to arrest the momentum of the death squads. We've got to continue training the Iraqi army and American presence in Iraqi units, and put Americans into the police force. Do we have enough troops to do all that? No, we do not." Later in the interview McCain said US soldiers are "fighting and dying for a failed policy."

USA Today (11/20, 2.27M) briefly notes McCain's call for "an overwhelming number of troops to stabilize Iraq or face the possibility of more terrorist attacks -- in the region and on American soil." The AP (11/20, Heilprin) reports McCain,

DOJ_NMG_0096334

"who spent 5 1/2 years as a prisoner of war after his Navy plane was shot down in 1967, recalled the Vietnam War's lessons. 'We left Vietnam. It was over. We just had to heal the wounds of war,' he said. '"We leave this place, chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict, in my view, a lot more.'" Bloomberg (11/20, Mathewson) also runs an account of McCain's remarks.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, on CBS's Face the Nation (11/19, Schieffer), made a similar point. He said, "It is obvious to me we don't have enough troops in Iraq to provide the security necessary to create a democracy from the ashes of a dictatorship. … I disagree with the idea of keeping the troop levels where they're at now. I think we need an overwhelming presence in Iraq for the short term. You cannot have a democracy where people are getting killed and kidnapped and murdered at the level they are now. So we need more Iraqi troops; we need more American troops. We need to increase the Army and Marine Corps by at least 50,000. … We do not have security in Iraq. The only way you'll ever get a political solution to the differences that exist among the Iraqi people is to control the violence. I am willing to send more American troops to make that happen."

Levin Calls For "Phased Reduction" Of US Troops In Iraq In Four To Six Months. Sen. Carl Levin, on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer), said, "We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction of our troops. Because if you don't do that, they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way. … Four to six months gives them an opportunity to do that if there is an international conference. And one other thing, General Abizaid said that if in the next four to six months, the violence is not put -- if there's not an end put to the violence and if the militias are not put under control, then it is going to be irretrievable. So he himself used a four- to six-months timeframe."

Kristol Predicts Congress May "Pull The Plug" On Iraq In Coming Months. The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (11/19, Wallace), said, "What's striking about Pelosi's endorsement of Murtha is she believes that the duty of the Democratic Congress is to get us out of Iraq. I think that's an honest belief of hers, and of Jack Murtha's. … The conventional wisdom in Washington right now is 'but of course they'll never cut off funds -- that would be politically suicidal, and that's not going to happen.' I don't believe that. Four months from now, if things continue to slide downhill, if the president hasn't adjusted course, if hawks like Senator McCain haven't been satisfied that there's been an increase in troops or that we have a real strategy for victory, I think Nancy Pelosi and the Democratic House will move at some point to enforce timetables and to enforce a funds cutoff. … And if things aren't better four or six months from now, I think we could be looking at a Democratic House and some Republicans who are willing to just pull the plug on Iraq. … If by the State of the Union, things aren't getting better on the ground or there's not a really plausible change of tactics here at home, I am very worried that political support will crumble; not among Democrats, but among Republicans."

Rangel Proposes Bringing Back The Draft.

ABC World News (11/19, story 2, 2:00, Morrell, 8.78M) reported that in an "echo of the Vietnam War," Democratic Rep. Charlie Rangle, "said he would soon introduce legislation that would bring back the draft." Rep. Charlie Rangel: "This President and this Administration, would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if, indeed, we had a draft. And members of the Administration thought their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way." Morrell: "Draft legislation would seem to be dead on arrival on Capitol Hill. The fact that a prominent Democrat such as Charlie Rangel is raising this issue is certain to conjure up a lot of debate on Capitol Hill. Especially if consideration is given to Senator McCain's recommendation, that America increase its troop presence in Iraq."

The AP (11/20, Heilprin) reports Rangel, the incoming House Ways and Means Chairman, says a bill he will propose will mean "Americans would have to sign up for a new military draft after turning 18." Rangel said he "sees his idea as a way to deter politicians from launching wars." Rangel said, "There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the Administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way." Rangel "has said the all-volunteer military disproportionately puts the burden of war on minorities and lower-income families."

Rep. Rangel was asked on CBS's Face the Nation (11/19, Schieffer) if he would "still seriously favor a draft," Rangel replied, "You bet your life. Underscore serious.

DOJ_NMG_0096335

There's no question in my mind that this President and this Administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way. … I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session. … I don't see how anyone can support the war and not support the draft. I think to do so is hypocritical."

The Washington Post (11/20, A4, Babington, 690K) reports Rangel "said yesterday that he will push to renew the military draft, as lawmakers in both parties sharpened their criticisms of the situation in Iraq and struggled for consensus and solutions." Sen. John McCain "leveled one of his harshest assessments yet, saying U.S. troops are 'fighting and dying for a failed policy.' He renewed his call for more U.S. troops in Iraq and said it is immoral to keep them fighting at the current deployment levels." Sen. Carl Levin "repeated yesterday his view that troop withdrawals must begin within four to six months." The "varying proposals underscored the extent to which key policymakers remain at odds two weeks after voters registered deep discontent over the war and restored Democrats to power in Congress." Rangel "portrayed the draft, suspended since 1973, as a means of spreading military obligations more equitably and prompting political leaders to think twice before starting wars."

The Washington Times (11/20, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Rangel said, "If we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft." Rangel said "his bill, which he will introduce again early next year, would allow Americans turning 18 to choose between several forms of national service, including airport security, or jobs in schools and hospitals." But Sen. Lindsey Graham "said in his own 'Face the Nation' appearance that military conscription was unnecessary."

Critics Say Rice Bears Much Responsibility For Iraq "Mess." US News and World Report (11/27, Ragavan) writes that "three and a half years" after the fall of Baghdad, "the promise of democracy in Iraq seems a cruel joke, and the administration in Washington that launched the invasion seems utterly bereft of clues as to how to sort out the mess." Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation "was intended to signal a change in course on Iraq. But many national security experts say that Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security adviser at the time of the invasion, and the National Security Council share much of the blame for the problems in Iraq." These critics say Rice, with her "ardent support for the invasion," was "unable to play the traditional role of national security adviser-impartial broker in the rough-and-tumble of interagency government. That was further complicated by the fact that Rumsfeld all but ignored the input of other agencies, then never took responsibility for postwar reconstruction, leaving Rice to try to manage the Iraq rebuilding effort from the White House."

"Vietnam Syndrome" Recurring As Iraq War Drags On. Time (11/27, Allen, 4.03M) writes, "Fifteen years ago, in the flush of his Gulf War triumph, President George H.W. Bush crowed to state legislators, 'By God, we've kicked the Vietnam syndrome once and for all.' But now, as Washington's wise men look for a way out of a situation in Iraq, the symptoms of that malady seem to be reappearing." In June, asked if he "saw a parallel between Iraq and Vietnam," the current President Bush "replied curtly, 'No.' But he is now embracing the inevitable, and he answered yes last week when asked roughly the same question at the Sheraton Hanoi. 'One lesson is, is that we tend to want there to be instant success in the world,' he said. 'And the task in Iraq is going to take a while.'"

"New Course" For Iraq Hard To Pinpoint. US News and World Report (11/27, Mulrine) writes that the midterm elections indicate voters "expect to see a new course in Iraq." But "what course exactly? Washington is buzzing with possibilities-a number of which were swatted down by Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command, in testimony last week before the House and Senate Armed Services committees. The most popular option, a sizable troop withdrawal in the next six months, would inflame sectarian violence, he warned," while "partitioning the country along ethnic-religious lines, he said, is 'not viable' and would create a Sunni state that would be little more than an al Qaeda safe haven."

"Cocky" Iran, Syria Anticipate Larger Say Over Iraq. Newsweek (11/27, Hirsh, Barry, 3.12M) reports that Iran "knows" President Bush is facing "new political pressure from an incoming Democratic Congress to withdraw from Iraq sooner rather than later. Tehran also hears, through the media, that the forthcoming report by the Iraq Study Group…is expected to recommend fuller engagement with Iran and Syria." Newsweek says both Iran and Syria "are clearly feeling cocky. Negotiations to halt Iran's nuclear program remain stalemated, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad declared last week that 'many countries have agreed to live with an Iran that has mastered enrichment.' One key nation that Tehran thinks it can count on is Russia, which wants to protect its huge investments in Iran and is resisting tough sanctions in the U.N. Security Council." As for Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, he is "enjoying the resumption of what Syrian Embassy spokesman Ahmed Salkini calls 'unofficial contacts' from Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0096336

Iraq's Impact On 2008 Presidential Hopefuls Considered. Newsweek (11/27, Darman, 3.12M) examines how the Iraq war may impact various potential 2008 presidential candidates. Sen. John McCain "was an early administration ally on Iraq" even while "kibitzing with Republican war critics like Bush 41 national-security adviser Brent Scowcroft." McCain "is that rare Republican with sympathy for both his party's realist and idealist wings." Sen. Hillary Clinton, "from her first hours in the Senate," was "careful to work on her national-security credentials." She has "backed a phased redeployment of troops…and championed engagement with Syria and Iran. But she has yet to offer a comprehensive plan of her own." Sen. Barack Obama's "chief assets as a potential challenger to Clinton: consistency on Iraq." Obama has "resisted taking a strong position on an exit strategy for Iraq." Rudy Giuliani "has tried to shore up his conservative credentials with a vociferous defense" of President Bush's Iraq policy. Gov. Mitt Romney, "more than any other top-tier candidate," can "legitimately claim he's had nothing to do with the mess in Iraq. But as he travels the country selling himself as the strongest potential challenger to McCain, Romney has had to scramble to make up for his lack of foreign-policy bona fides." John Edwards wrote a 2005 op-ed "saying 'I was wrong' and calling for a drawdown in troops and increased engagement with Iraq's neighbors in the Middle East." Edwards now "feels the rest of the party is coming around to his view." Sen. Sam Brownback "has long been an Iraq hawk." And Sen. Joe Biden, the "Democrats' biggest long shot," also "happens to be the author of the party's most comprehensive Iraq plan."

Critic Of Invasion Could Be Next US Ambassador To Iraq. In his Washington Post (11/20, A15, 690K) "Inside The Loop" column, Al Kamen writes that US Ambassador to Pakistan Ryan Crocker, who has also held that post in Kuwait, Lebanon, and Syria, and who was "one of the few people at the legendary Coalition Provisional Authority who actually knew anything about Iraq," could succeed Zalmay Khalilzad as US ambassador in Baghdad. In 2002, Crocker co-wrote to then-Secretary of State Colin Powell "warning of disaster if the United States invaded Iraq. The memo, titled 'The Perfect Storm,' detailed all the things that were likely to explode if the United States took over Iraq -- sectarian violence, a power vacuum, and so on."

Cycles Of Revenge Seen As Fueling Violence In Iraq. The New York Times (11/20, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports, "In a cycle that has been tracked by the American military since May and June, after months of apparently random sectarian violence the pattern has become one of attack and counterattack, with Sunni militants staging what commanders call 'spectacular' strikes and Shiite militias retaliating with abductions and murders of Sunnis. ... General Caldwell said that a recent and intensive series of American raids against Al Qaeda cells, as well as against Shiite militias that have struck back at Sunnis, had seriously damaged some of their networks. But American commanders have made similar claims on several occasions in the course of the war only to have the killing resume later at a higher level. Scores of survivors and witnesses have noted the emerging cycle of revenge in interviews, describing highly personal attacks that involve a bullet in the head far more often than a bomb. In the past eight days, at least 715 Iraqis have been killed or have been found dead, according to The Associated Press." The Times adds, "Iraqis are hardening against one another as the deaths chip away at any remaining trust between the sects and radicalize even larger portions of their fringes."

Hostage Search Continues. ABC World News (11/19, story 3, 1:45, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Now, the latest on a hostage crisis involving four American contractors in Iraq. Today, we learn more about these men who were snatched on Thursday. We have two reports tonight." ABC (Brown) added, "Masked Iraqi police rounded up about 200 men in southern Iraq, today, in a fruitless search for the hostages. But the dragnet was more media circus than anything else. One of their suspects, a double amputee in a wheelchair. Two of the four kidnapped American security guards have now been identified. Jonathan Cote, from Buffalo. And Paul Reuben, from Minnesota. ... The prime suspects are the Shiite militias who have infiltrated the police and the army. As many as 150 people were kidnapped from the Ministry of Higher Education by suspected Shia militiamen in police commando uniform, earlier this week. Today, in retaliation, a suicide bomber in a minibus offered Shiite laborers casual work. When they rushed forward, he blew himself up, killing 22."

DOJ_NMG_0096337

ABC World News (11/19, story 4, 1:50, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "These latest contractors to be kidnapped are among thousands of civilians working in Iraq, doing extremely dangerous jobs for what can be very large paychecks." ABC (Yang) added, "Twenty-three-year-old Jonathan Cote spent four years in the 82nd Airborne Division. He survived mortar attacks and other dangers in Afghanistan and Iraq. Back home, Cote joined a private security company and went back to Iraq. Tonight, he's a hostage. One of the approximately 80,000 civilian contractors working in Iraq. It's a dangerous job. There are concerns that private companies aren't doing enough to protect their employees in the war zone." Jeff Beatty, President, www.totalsecurity.us: "More of that has to be done. More of it will be done. But we're not there yet." ... Roger Smith, truck driver: "It's a lot of sheer terror moments. ... it sounds real good before you go start doing it. And then, after you're doing it, it ain't quite as good as you thought it was." Yang: "Especially when friends and colleagues start paying for that extra money with their lives."

Upstate New Yorker Identified As Abductee. The AP (11/19, Bauman) reports, "A former soldier from western New York is among the four Americans and one Austrian who were kidnapped in southern Iraq last week, family members said Sunday. Jonathon Cote, 23, a native of Getzville, N.Y., a suburb of Buffalo, was working as a guard for Crescent Security Group when he was captured Thursday, his stepmother said. ... Cote spent four years in the Army and served in Iraq and Afghanistan. He was stationed at Fort Bragg with the 82nd Airborne Division before receiving an honorable discharge, and has been in Iraq since June."

Human Rights Watch Says Saddam's Trial Was Flawed. The Washington Post (11/20, A14, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "The trial of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein "was marred by flaws so serious that they undermined the trial's fairness and called into question the verdict, an international human rights watchdog group said in a report to be released Monday." In a 97-page report by the Human Rights Watch, an analysis "based on courtroom observations and dozens of interviews with judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers," is the "first significant challenge to what the Iraqi government and its U.S. patrons assert was a fair, if messy, trial." The report "asserts that there was failure to disclose key evidence to Hussein's attorneys and that there were violations of basic rights of the defendants to confront witnesses." On Sunday, "two US. advisers to the tribunal denounced the report as 'misguided' and said that the trial was conducted properly and that a credible justice was delivered." One adviser said, "To question the overall integrity of the justice without reading the judgment is premature, at best."

General Odierno Discusses Return To Iraq. The New York Times (11/20, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who returns to Iraq next month to take charge of the day-to-day fight as commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, says he departs for Baghdad with a clearer, perhaps even diminished, set of expectations of what the military can be expected to accomplish now, more than three years after the invasion." After discussing some accomplishments, "General Odierno paused, and added, 'Notice I left out a few things, such as a democracy in the sense that we see a democracy in the United States. We have to allow them to shape their own democracy, the type of democracy that fits them and their country.'" Odierno "has felt criticism from some officers, especially among marines, that made it into the public debate via op-ed columns and books by noted military affairs writers, including 'Cobra II,' by Michael R. Gordon of The New York Times and Bernard E. Trainer; and 'Fiasco,' by Thomas E. Ricks of The Washington Post. The Fourth Infantry Division focused too much on traditional combat operations in 2003 and 2004, the critics argued, saying that those efforts, with an emphasis on capturing and killing adversary fighters rather than on rebuilding the country and winning the confidence of Iraqis, actually fueled the insurgency." He replies, "We worked very hard to take the balanced approach." Odierno replaces "the current corps commander, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the author of an influential essay warning that success in Iraq cannot be achieved solely by training local security forces or through combat operations. General Chiarelli wrote that the military must work to provide essential city services, create jobs and promote local governmental control. He also began the new operation this autumn to secure Baghdad."

Iraqis Describe Mixed Feelings About US. Three Iraqis who fled death squads and now live abroad write about their impressions of the US occupation. In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/20, 1.16M), poet Basim Mardan writes about his service as a translator for US forces in Iraq, "I was the first or second translator to work with the coalition forces in my city, the first or second Iraqi to set foot on the American base in Mosul. The Marines paid me $150 a month, which was better than the $2 I was making as a librarian." However, Mardan was upset by Abu Ghraib, "I grew sad, and I didn't know what to believe, because the people I worked with were great," and by her perception of lack of support from the US after he began receiving death threats: "The American Army, or whoever's in charge, has badly disappointed the translators. ... They could have helped my family move to Kurdistan, helped find me a job with the government there. ... But I'm not going to be ungrateful to the people who were fighting and dying for my country. ... I would never say that those people exploited me or exploited my thinking. The system did. Not them."

DOJ_NMG_0096338

In another op-ed for the New York Times (11/20, 1.16M), poet Waddah Ali writes that the US failed to account for the Iraqi mentality after occupying Iraq: "America did well to liberate Iraq. But Iraqis were used to tyranny and afraid of freedom. The Americans entered Iraq without a psychological program for dealing with this fact."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/20, 1.16M), essayist Omar Fathi writes that the US should have imposed a strongman: "America should have removed Saddam Hussein and the closest circle around him and appointed a strong government right away. It would have been another dictatorship, but a different kind. It could have imposed martial law, then done the job that the Americans were not able to do, which was to cut power away from the old system by removing those people who might become terrorists in the future. After four to eight years, we could have had an election, and the new government could have started working on the basis of the new Constitution. ... Now the problems of Iraq will not be solved without a long and very bloody civil war."

Afghan Army Will Attack Taliban In Winter. The AP (11/20, Krane) reports, "The U.S.-backed Afghan army will step up counter-Taliban offensives this winter, which could see heavy fighting during a period traditionally used by Afghan fighters for rest and resupply, a U.S. general said here Sunday. U.S. Army Brig. Gen. Douglas Pritt, who oversees the U.S.-led effort to train the Afghan military, said Afghan forces have tripled the number of forward bases to more than 60 and plan to spend the winter harassing Taliban and gathering intelligence from combat outposts deep inside rebel strongholds." The AP adds, "The Afghan National Army remains hamstrung by desertion rates of around 15 percent, Pritt said, little different from its rate in May. The previous year, the desertion rate peaked above 25 percent, according to U.S. military figures. Afghan soldiers recently received a raise for their tiny salaries, from $70 to $100 a month, Pritt said, a decision that followed the revelation that AWOL soldiers could earn $70 a month as day laborers without facing combat."

Southern Afghans Send Mixed Signals About Insurgency. In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/20, A1, Constable, 690K) reports that in Afghanistan's four southern provinces, "the Taliban insurgency is on a fierce rebound five years after U.S. and Afghan forces toppled the Islamic militia from power in Kabul. Months of aggressive ground combat and NATO airstrikes have failed to halt continuous violence in the south, as well as some sporadic attacks in other parts of the country. ... In Helmand, a vast and arid region where much of the worst fighting has taken place and thousands of people have fled their homes, residents and elders have been sending urgent but contradictory signals about how to restore peace," with some saying "their worst problem was the devastation from months of bombing by foreign military forces. If the authorities would allow tribal leaders to administer their district, they said, they would guarantee no further Taliban attacks." The Post adds, "In Helmand's Musa Qala district, NATO has cautiously agreed to test the tribal approach. Under a deal brokered in September by the provincial governor, NATO agreed to pull back British forces from Musa Qala, and local elders pledged that Taliban attacks would cease. ... both NATO and senior Afghan officials say they are largely satisfied with the arrangement, which they said has brought fighting to a halt and allowed foreign troops to focus on creating a central zone for security and development around Helmand's capital city, rather than manning scattered outposts and chasing after bands of insurgents."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

State Bar Associations Fighting Back Against Privilege Waivers. The National Law Journal (11/20, Qualters) reports, "State bar associations are jumping into the roiling debate over the attorney-client privilege-waiver issue triggered by the U.S. Department of Justice's Thompson Memorandum." The Journal continues, "Several states have recently convened task forces to fight the 2003 directive penned by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, which, among other things, instructs prosecutors to trade leniency for waivers of the attorney-client privilege during corporate investigations." The Journal adds, "The states are lobbying the federal government to change Justice Department policies and practices that give incentives to corporate defendants who waive attorney-client privilege and pressure companies not to pay the legal fees of current or former employees facing corporate criminal investigations. In some cases, states are mulling changes to their own rules of professional conduct to sidestep Thompson-style waivers. .. .New task forces in Florida, Illinois and Michigan join ongoing efforts in Arkansas, Maryland, New York and Boston." The Journal notes, "Samuel Damren, a litigator in the Detroit office of Dykema Gossett, heads Michigan's task force. He hopes that his group will recommend changing the state's rules of professional conduct to prohibit government attorneys practicing in Michigan from requesting that companies waive their attorney-client privilege to prove they are cooperating with the government probe. … An Arkansas Bar Association task force is recommending that its House of Delegates ask the Arkansas Supreme Court to adopt rule changes allowing for selective waiver, or disclosure of some information to a government agency without revoking the attorney-client privilege, and barring discovery of attorney communications with experts. … The 72,000-member New York State Bar Association is informally discussing whether to push for changes to the rules of professional conduct to curtail waivers. But state Bar President Mark H. Alcott said he's unsure if such a rule would work in practice, since the client ultimately has the right to waive and could succumb to pressure from the government." The Journal notes, "A company's willingness to cooperate in investigations is not a 'litmus test' and is only one of several factors the Justice Department considers when charging a company, said DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. The DOJ is still 'reviewing the specific concerns and suggestions' of bar associations and other groups, Roehrkasse said."

DOJ_NMG_0096339

SEC Formally Inquires About Ford Earnings Disclosures. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A7, Cooke, Stoll) reports, "Ford Motor Co. said it has received an informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission related to disclosures detailing its recent restatements of earnings because of accounting errors." The Journal continues, "The company also restated financial results for the first and second quarters of 2006, deepening its loss for the two periods and finalizing the financial corrections it has said it needed to make." The Journal adds, "On Nov. 14, Ford restated the bulk of the affected earnings, which span from 2001 to the third quarter of 2006. The restatements are necessary because Ford failed to sufficiently comply with certain rules related to its accounting for transactions used to hedge against interest-rate risk. … Ford on Friday said it has been contacted by the SEC's divisions of corporation finance and enforcement regarding the amended restatements for the entirety of 2005, the third quarter of 2006 and another filing discussing the restatements. Ford said it is 'voluntarily cooperating' with the 'informal inquiries,' which also relate to disclosures made by Ford Motor Credit Co. … It is unclear whether the SEC will also inquire into the first- and second-quarter restatements issued Friday."

SEC Says Most Restatements Due To Accounting Mistakes. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, C4, Reilly) reports, "Public companies continue to restate financial results at a record pace. Ask executives why and they will likely cite complex accounting rules or hypersensitive auditors." The Journal continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has come to a different conclusion: A majority of restatements are due to basic mistakes with nuts-and-bolts accounting. .. .Research by the SEC's Office of the Chief Accountant found about 55% of recent restatements were due to companies misapplying basic accounting rules or to problems with records that meant they didn't have the correct data to get the accounting right, said SEC Deputy Chief Accountant Scott Taub." The Journal adds, "He expressed surprise so many restatements were 'just from flat-out errors.' Mr. Taub outlined the study's results during a presentation in New York on Friday at the annual conference of Financial Executives International, a professional group. … 'Internal-control structures are missing things, corporate-finance staffs are missing things and auditors are missing things,' he said. 'All of these things are not working as well as we'd like them to.' .. .The findings come as the SEC, along with the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, an accounting-firm regulator, have been working to ease internal-control rules designed to ensure companies avoid accounting mistakes or fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0096340

Companies, especially smaller firms, have bristled at the costs of rules imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-reform legislation. Besides mandating that managers attest to having adequate controls, the rules require an auditor to sign off that the controls are sufficient."

KB Home's CEO Leaves Amid Options Probe With $175 Million Compensation Package. The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Kristof) reports, "When KB Home Chief Executive Bruce Karatz retired last week amid a stock option controversy, he agreed to give up $13 million in disputed stock gains. But that doesn't mean he will leave the company empty-handed. … Karatz is walking away with as much as $175 million in severance pay, pension benefits and stock options, regulatory filings show." The Times continues, "The windfall is possible in part because Karatz was not fired for cause but simply retired, making him eligible for his severance pay and pension unless the company's board of directors blocks payment, compensation experts say. … 'It's like he hit the jackpot,' said Patrick McGurn, general counsel of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises large investors such as pension plans and mutual funds. 'He might not like the hit to his reputation, but he's certainly not going to take one to his bank account.'" The Times adds, "Karatz, 61, stepped down as head of the Los Angeles home-building company Nov. 12, after an internal probe found that he had picked stock option grant dates that inflated the value of the options to himself and other executives. … Under his employment agreement, Karatz would get a severance payment equal to the sum of what he earned in salary and incentive pay over the last three years, according to KB Home's proxy statement. That adds up to nearly $80 million. .. .Karatz also has a special executive pension plan that guarantees him $1 million a year for up to 25 years in retirement, making it potentially worth $25 million. … And Karatz has vested stock options that aren't in dispute, which are worth about $70 million based on KB Home shares' closing price Friday of $49.07. … Add it all up, and it comes to $175 million."

Firms Find It Hard To Reclaim Executive Pay. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A1, Dvorak, Ng) reports, "In April 2001, directors of utility FPL Group Inc. faced a sticky problem. A few months earlier, they'd awarded top executives $62 million in bonuses linked to a merger that would have created the U.S.'s biggest electric company. Now the deal had fallen apart and shareholders were clamoring to get the money back." The Journal continues, "FPL directors scrutinized payment plans. They clashed with executives. Shareholders sued. After three years and millions in legal bills, executives returned $9 million, based largely on a technicality. Insurers paid another $12.5 million." The Journal adds, "The FPL saga is an object lesson in why companies rarely recoup money paid to executives for results they didn't actually achieve. Although the concept seems simple, at least from an ethical point of view, so-called 'clawbacks' of executive pay are in practice disruptive, divisive and difficult to pull off. In addition to a murky legal environment, the process is complicated by compensation contracts and insurance provisions. Most boards don't try recovering the money. Those that do often get mired in years of litigation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

HUD Probes Allegations Against NASA Official. The Orlando Sentinel (11/20, Cabbage, 230K) reports, "A federal probe of NASA Inspector General Robert Cobb outlines allegations that he stifled investigations, mistreated department employees and maintained a close personal relationship with top officials of the agency he was supposed to independently monitor. Preliminary findings from a 10-month investigation into Cobb's conduct have been forwarded to an oversight group, the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency. That group is expected to make a final decision before the end of the year on what, if any, action to take. Cobb has denied any wrongdoing. However, he said during an interview with the Orlando Sentinel last week that it was inappropriate for him to publicly rebut many of the specific allegations until the process had run its course." The probe was conducted by investigators from the Department of Housing and Urban Development. HUD "called in to conduct the inquiry, have examined 69 allegations against Cobb, a White House appointee. The allegations came primarily from career employees in his own office. A confidential summary of the HUD probe detailing the investigative findings was obtained by the Sentinel. Not all of the allegations against Cobb were substantiated. However, current and former employees in Cobb's office interviewed by HUD inspectors and the Sentinel described him as a partisan manager who often failed in his responsibility to independently investigate possible wrongdoing at NASA. Cobb vehemently disagreed with that characterization."

DOJ_NMG_0096341

Maryland Mall Shooting Under Investigation. The Washington Post (11/20, B01, Rich, Smith) reports, "Shoppers returned to Westfield Shoppingtown Annapolis in droves yesterday, undeterred by a gun battle that wounded three in the mall's food court the night before and sent scores of others racing for exits or diving under tables." The Post continues, "An 18-year-old Annapolis resident who was shot twice in the abdomen remained in a hospital under police guard, authorities said, and an off-duty U.S. Secret Service agent with whom he allegedly traded fire was recovering from a single gunshot wound. .. .The injuries to each man -- as well as to Tahzay L. Brown, a 16-year-old male struck in the crossfire -- were not considered life-threatening." The Post adds, "The violence began at 7:15 Saturday evening when the agent intervened after spotting as many as eight young men assaulting another young man, according to a preliminary police account. .. .The 18-year-old drew a handgun and fired, hitting the agent once in the leg, police said. The agent then drew his weapon, fired seven times and struck the 18-year-old twice in the abdomen, police said. The agent was with a family member, who was not injured. … Georgia Goslee, an attorney authorized to speak on behalf of Brown's family, described the Annapolis High School student as a victim drawn into the violence merely because the person who was being assaulted is his friend. She said the confrontation between the friend and the larger group was 'spillover from an earlier incident that happened at the school . . . back in September.'"

NYTimes Columnist Decries Sexual Abuse Of Children. In a column for the New York Times (11/20), Bob Herbert writes, "When (Atlanta) Mayor Shirley Franklin recently announced that the city would be cracking down on the pimps and johns who prey on under-age prostitutes, she also disclosed publicly for the first time that she had been molested when she was a young girl. … Speaking at a gathering of reporters, local officials and civic leaders, the mayor spoke frankly about the incident, in which she was abused at the age of 10 by the father of a girlfriend. She then asked how many of the women in attendance had endured similar experiences. Several women in the room raised their hands." Herbert continues, "One of the most tightly kept secrets in the U.S. is the extent to which children are sexually exploited, not just by child pornographers and compulsive pedophiles, but by men who are viewed by their relatives, friends and neighbors as quintessentially solid citizens. … In an interview on Friday, Ms. Franklin told me: 'It seemed appropriate to reveal my story in that setting, because what we were trying to do is demonstrate that this can happen to anyone. Not only can it happen; it does happen to a lot of children.'" Herbert adds, "Atlanta has become a major hub of commercial sex in the U.S. It's a full-fledged sex-tourism destination, with thousands of strippers, prostitutes and other sex workers accommodating an endless stream of johns from around the country. Under-age girls (some as young as 10 and 11) are a significant part of that trade. Many of them were already carrying the scars of sexual molestation when they got into prostitution."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Riot Retrospective Seeks To Increase Understanding Of Civil Rights Struggle. USA Today (11/20, Jones) reports from Newark, NJ, "In the first major exhibit documenting the 1967 Newark riots, the New Jersey Historical Society is assembling a retrospective that is scheduled to open by next summer, the 40th anniversary of the unrest. … Tentatively titled 'What's Going On,' the exhibit will use oral histories, text and artifacts to examine the six days of rioting in Newark. It also will look at the violence that engulfed Detroit 11 days later and the 1965 riots in Los Angeles' Watts district." USA adds, "These and other riots in scores of cities in the late 1960s — many triggered by incidents involving police — focused attention on the lack of economic opportunity in predominantly poor, black neighborhoods. A presidential commission studying the causes concluded in 1968 that the nation was moving toward 'two societies, one black, one white, separate and unequal.' … 'We want to move beyond Newark and show the parallels between what happened in those summers of the 1960s,' says Max Herman, an assistant professor of sociology at Rutgers University in New Jersey who has conducted many of the interviews for the project. 'The frustration was building for several decades." … The exhibit will stay in Newark for nearly a year. Organizers then plan to take it to Los Angeles and Detroit, where they will work with local museums. The University of Baltimore also is planning a 40th anniversary exhibit on the 1968 riots in that city that followed the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. Sociologists say such exhibits are critical in helping the nation understand the legacy of that turbulent time."

DOJ_NMG_0096342

Airline Employee's Treatment Of Nursing Mother Sparks National Protest. The USA Today/AP (11/20) reports, "A national 'nurse-in' will be held Tuesday to protest the treatment of a passenger who was kicked off a plane for refusing to cover herself while breast-feeding her baby." The AP continues, "A similar protest, in which mothers sat on the floor near the Delta Airlines counter, breast-fed their babies and held signs, took place at the Burlington International Airport last week." The AP adds, "Chelsea Clark, 31, of Fairfax, said she is using Web message boards to organize a national protest at Delta counters across the country. What happened to Emily Gillette, 27, of Santa Fe, N.M., has prompted an 'out-swell of outrage,' Clark said. … 'This is for all of the nursing mothers in the country who felt that way,' Clark said. 'This is our opportunity to make a statement.' … Freedom Airlines, a regional airline for Delta, said it has disciplined the flight attendant who ordered Gillette off the plane when she declined to cover up with a blanket. Spokesman Paul Skellon said the attendant did not meet company expectations when Gillette was told to leave the plane. … A spokesman for the airline said the pilot apologized and asked Gillette and her family to get back on the plane, but Gillette said that never happened. … On Oct. 13 Gillette was sitting aboard a plane, which was three hours late in taking off, when she began to breast-feed her 22-month-old daughter. She says a flight attendant handed her a blanket and told her to cover up, which Gillette declined to do. … The attendant said Gillette was offending her and she was removed from the plane. … Gillette filed a complaint with the Vermont Human Rights Commission because breast-feeding in a public place is protected under state law."

McCain Says Supreme Court Should Overturn Roe. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports Sen. John McCain, "who supports a ban on abortion except in cases of rape, incest and to save a mother's life, said he doubted a constitutional amendment could pass but that one would not be needed because 'it's very likely or possible that the Supreme Court should — could — overturn Roe v. Wade.'" McCain said, "I'm a federalist. Just as I believe that the issue of gay marriage should be decided by the states, so do I believe that we would be better off by having Roe v. Wade return to the states. And I don't believe the Supreme Court should be legislating in the way that they did on Roe v. Wade."

McCain Not Opposed To Civil Unions For Gay Couples. Asked on ABC's This Week (11/19, Stephanopoulos) if he would describe himself as "pro-gay rights," McCain responded, "In the respect that I believe that the don't ask, don't tell policy is working in the military. … I believe in the sanctity and unique role of marriage between man and woman, but I certainly don't believe in discriminating against any American." Asked if he is "against civil unions for gay couples," McCain said, "No, I am not. … I do not believe gay marriage should be legal, but I do believe that people ought to be able to enter into contracts, exchange powers of attorney…"

Romney Makes Effort To Place Gay Marriage Ban Onto Ballot. The New York Times/AP (11/20) reports Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts "said on Sunday that he would ask the state's highest court to order a question banning same-sex marriage onto the ballot if legislators did not address the issue." Romney said he "would file a request this week for a justice of the Supreme Judicial Court to direct the secretary of state to place the question on the ballot if lawmakers do not vote on the issue on Jan. 2, the final day of the session." Romney "made his announcement to the cheers of same-sex-marriage opponents at a rally on the Statehouse steps. Supporters of same-sex marriage staged a protest across the street." The Washington Post (11/20, 690K) also ran the AP story.

Advocates See Chance For Revival Of Gays In Military Debate. Newsweek (11/27, 3.12M) reports, "With the Democrats in control of Congress, some activists are hoping they'll add a controversial issue to their to-do list: revisiting the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy on gays in the military." Supporters "hope they might make some progress at a time when the military can't afford to turn away the willing and able."

ANTITRUST:

Freeport To Buy Phelps In Copper Merger. The Financial Times (11/20, Politi) reports, "Freeport-McMoRan on Sunday night agreed to buy Phelps Dodge for $25.9bn (£13.7bn) in cash and stock to become the world's largest publicly traded copper company with mines stretching from Indonesia to Chile." The Times continues, "The takeover is the latest in a wave of consolidation that has swept through the global mining industry as commodity prices soared because of high demand, particularly from China."

DOJ_NMG_0096343

The Times adds, "Amid the boom, both Freeport and Phelps were faced with key strategic challenges that they decided to address by combining the two companies. Freeport has been seeking ways to diversify away from its main Grasberg mine, which is based in a remote part of Indonesian Papua and has been criticised for containing too much political risk. … Phelps, on the other hand, has been a takeover target since its twin bid for Canadian mining groups Inco and Falconbridge fell apart in September. .. .Under the terms of the deal, Phelps shareholders will receive $126.46 per share – or a 33 per cent premium to the company's market value on Friday. About 70 per cent of the transaction value, or $18bn, will be in cash, with the rest in shares, meaning Phelps investors will end up owning 38 per cent of the combined group."

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A3, Heinzl, Gold) reports, "reeport said it pursued the deal to gain the scale it needs to compete among other miners for equipment and prospects amid increased Chinese demand for commodities and high prices. But the deal comes after copper has fallen from loftier levels, leading to some industry concerns of a potential cyclical downturn." The Journal adds, "The combination -- resulting in what would be North America's largest copper producer -- continues the recent streak of big-ticket mining deals, as the industry scrambles to secure new production and mine developments."

The New York Times (11/20, Sorkin, Austen) reports, "The transaction, if approved by shareholders, would create the world's largest copper producer and the largest mining company based in North America. It is the latest move in a series of mining and metals mergers. Like companies involved in other mining mergers, Freeport-McMoRan promoted the idea that increased size has become an important competitive factor." The Times adds, "Freeport-McMoRan, which has a market capitalization of $11.3 billion compared with Phelps Dodge's value of $19.4 billion, will finance the transactions by borrowing about $17.5 billion. Freeport said it expected the deal would be accretive to the combined company's earnings per share and cash flow immediately. … To a considerable extent, Phelps-Dodge now finds itself being acquired because of its failure earlier this year to bulk up with an acquisition of Inco, the large Toronto-based nickel miner. … Inco had approached Phelps Dodge in an attempt to help it with its bid for another Canadian nickel miner, Falconbridge. In exchange for financing for that transaction, Inco's board agreed to be acquired by Phelps Dodge in a deal cash and stock worth about $17 billion."

Bloomberg (11/20, Shankar, Ann) also reports on the proposed merger.

Blackstone Near Deal To Buy Equity Officer Properties. The Financial Times (11/20, Politi) reports, "Blackstone was on Sunday night in advanced discussions to seal the biggest private equity deal on record as the board of Equity Office Properties, the US commercial real estate company founded by Sam Zell, met to vote on a takeover worth $36bn including debt." The Times continues, "Although the outcome of the meeting remained unclear, the talks will highlight the growing audacity of cash-rich, buy-out firms, which are taking over some of the biggest US companies in a range of industries." The Times adds, "Last week Thomas H. Lee Partners, Bain Capital and a group of banks agreed to buy Clear Channel Communications, the biggest chain of US radio stations. Harrah's Entertainment, the US casino giant, has for weeks been in talks to be taken over by Apollo Management and Texas Pacific, although it remained unclear on Sunday night if that would result in an agreement. … In July, HCA, the biggest US hospital chain, agreed to be taken private by a consortium including Bain Capital, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, and Merrill Lynch for about $33bn. That agreement broke the record for the biggest private equity deal, sealed in 1989 when KKR bought RJR Nabisco, the food and tobacco conglomerate. … But the huge amounts of money flooding into private equity and the availability of cheap debt to finance acquisitions have led to expectations that the HCA deal size would soon be trumped."

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, Berman) reports, "Joining an unprecedented rush to remove corporations from the public markets, the real estate arm of private-equity firm The Blackstone Group is set to announce a $20 billion takeover plan for Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. office-building owner and manager, people familiar with the matter said." The Journal adds, "If completed, the deal would become the largest such 'take private' deal in history -- and the largest real-estate deal in history -- when factoring in Equity Office's existing $16 billion in debt. It's a record that has already been broken this year, and could be broken again by year-end, as private-equity firms train hundreds of billions of dollars of capital on once untouchable names of the stock-market firmament."

DOJ_NMG_0096344

The New York Times (11/20, Sorkin, Pristin) reports, "The deal marks the largest leveraged buyout in history, eclipsing the $33 billion paid earlier this year for H.C.A., the hospital chain, and it illustrates how private equity firms continue to gobble up corporate America. Under the transaction, Equity Office will go from being a publicly held company to a private one. Blackstone will pay $20 billion and assume $16 billion in debt." The Times adds, "Matthew L. Ostrower, an analyst at Morgan Stanley, called the proposed deal 'a ground-breaking transaction for the real estate world in general and an earthquake for the REIT industry.' … Mr. Ostrower said that if a company the size of Equity Office chose not to remain public, 'now every public company out there is going to have to some degree examine their capitalization, whether being public makes sense.'"

Bloomberg (11/20, Cimilluca, Louis) reports, "Blackstone in July raised a $15.6 billion fund, to which it is adding. In June, it raised $5.25 billion for the largest-ever fund for high-return real estate investments, the majority of which has been spent already. … The company and other private equity firms, which finance the bulk of their takeovers using the target company's cash flow, have announced $600 billion of acquisitions so far this year, compared with $241 billion in 2005, according to data compiled by Bloomberg News."

US Airways Head Faces Daunting Management Challenge. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, B1, Trottman) reports, "It's hard enough post-Sept. 11 to manage one airline. Now, US Airways Group Inc. Chief Executive Doug Parker wants to run three." The Journal continues, "With his $8.67 billion hostile bid last week for Delta Air Lines, the CEO is proposing to add yet another company to the two he's already combining as a result of his America West Airlines acquiring US Airways late last year. He envisions that the new airline would fly under the Delta name." The Journal adds, "The 45-year-old, known for his financial expertise, is rolling the dice again in what would become the greatest management challenge of his career if a deal goes through. By merging with the much-larger Atlanta carrier Delta as it emerges from bankruptcy court, US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., would become the largest U.S. airline in terms of passenger traffic, a huge leap from its No. 6 ranking right now. … It would add an exponential level of complexity to an already daunting task. Though the earlier merger is considered a financial success so far, some of its customer-service rankings have been among industry lows in recent months as the airline has had rising problems with baggage handling and overall service complaints. Management is still blending the cultures of the two airlines, which were in many ways steeped in vastly different processes and procedures."

Final Putnam Bids Due Before Thanksgiving. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, C5, Mcdonald, Berman) reports, "The auction of Boston money manager Putnam Investments will move into its latter stages this week with final offers due from three bidders before the Thanksgiving holiday, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "Prior to the Thursday holiday, bids are expected from three suitors: Amvescap PLC of the United Kingdom, Unicredito Italiano SpA of Italy and Power Corp. of Canada, according to one of these people." The Journal adds, "It could be weeks before any decision is made by Putnam's parent, Marsh & McLennan Cos., of New York. Marsh President and Chief Executive Michael Cherkasky has called the auction 'a market check,' and the company may decide to hang onto Putnam, which manages $187 billion of assets, if it can't get a price its board considers fair. .. . A final sale price could be affected by the inclusion of 'earn out' clauses. These agreements might allow for a lower payment up front but also additional payments if Putnam meets specific financial goals. … The Putnam auction is seen as an important step in Marsh's recovery from a tangle with New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. Mr. Cherkasky took the company's reins in October 2004 when an industry-wide bid-rigging inquiry put the firm and its Marsh Inc. insurance brokerage in crisis. Marsh Inc. and other large insurance brokers reached civil settlements with state authorities."

Philadelphia Exchange Chief Urges Close Scrutiny Of CME-CBOT Merger. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (11/20, A17), Meyer S. Frucher, chairman and CEO of the Philadelphia Stock Exchange, writes, "The announcement of the proposed merger between the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade has sparked applause from the shareholders who will benefit. But for the marketplace, the growing derivatives trading community, and the American consumer, the merger of two already powerful monopolies into a single pre-eminent force in the risk markets may be the perfect illustration of why monopolies are a bad thing. For regulators, therefore, the proposed merger represents an urgent challenge and an opportunity to ensure the competitiveness of these essential markets." Frucher continues, "Historically, both the CME and the CBOT have operated as effective monopolies as futures contracts were typically traded exclusively at a particular marketplace. Yet to the idea that there is a downside to two discrete but not overlapping monopolies merging into one, many in the financial markets have responded: So what? After all, contracts traded at both exchanges are cleared by a single entity today. So long as the products are distinct from one another and the transaction does not result in incremental concentration of the marketplace for futures clearing, then there is no incremental concentration of market share either." Frucher adds, "So how does this merger affect the average trader or public investor? As more and more people use derivatives to manage their own portfolio risk or speculate on the direction of interest rates or commodities, it is a certainty that their transaction costs will be higher if CME and CBOT merge. Since both went public, they have raised their transaction and clearing fees, and can certainly continue to do so unilaterally as a merged organization. … What can the CFTC and the Department of Justice do to ensure that a merger benefits the markets? First, the CTFC should insist on fungibility of products so that if another futures market offers a Eurodollar future, any firm can take or unwind a position on different marketplaces. That will encourage competition. Second, DOJ can insist that CME 'universalize' its clearing services by separating the clearinghouse from its common ownership with the exchanges, or by allowing other clearinghouses the benefits of cross-margining." Frucher concludes, "Exchanges that have gone public -- especially futures exchanges -- have commanded the attention of the capital markets and enjoyed the benefits of investment. That is a good thing. A CME/CBOT merger, however, holds the potential to cast a disproportionate shadow over the risk markets -- with adverse impact on the markets themselves and certainly on the public."

DOJ_NMG_0096345

ENVIRONMENT:

NYTimes Warns Deforestation Will Cause Climate Problems. The New York Times (11/20, 1.16M) editorializes, "A new study published by the National Academy of Sciences and based on a recent international assessment of forests confirms that reforestation has become a widespread pattern in well-off countries and also in a few that are not so well off." Reforestation is "obviously good news," but in "some parts of the world, deforestation is only expanding, with dire consequences for biodiversity and the climate." Even if forests will be recovered," some of the "most biologically diverse forests are being logged or burned without ceasing," therefore "destroying irreplaceable habitat and extinguishing species one by one."

WPost Calls Responsible Fisheries Management Crucial. The Washington Post (11/20, 690K) editorializes, "A new paper by a team of respected scientists estimates that unless policymakers take substantial steps to preserve marine biodiversity, the world will face 'the global collapse of all taxa currently fished by the mid-21st century.'" The challenge domestically is to "get other regions to follow Alaska's lead and internationally to get countries bent on destructive fishing practices to adopt more sustainable models," and Congress "needs to reauthorize and improve the law that governs fisheries management." The ban on "unregulated bottom trawling on the high seas" that the Bush Administration is pushing, would "be a significant coup environmentally and would burnish the record of oceanic protection" that Bush "established this year with his creation of a mammoth marine protected area in the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands." Responsible fisheries management is "one of the most pressing ecological concerns of our time." If policymakers "fail to address it seriously," the oceans will become "giant dead zones, and seafood will be a thing of the past."

WPost Praises DC Bill Establishing "Green" Building Requirements. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/20, A16, 690K) writes, "The environmental benefits of better building requirements remain an insight overripe for policymakers to exploit. That's why we welcome a bill the D.C. Council unanimously supported in its first reading last week." If the legislation "passes, government structures built three years after the legislation takes effect will have to meet a high standard of environmental friendliness. Five years on, private construction projects will also have to fulfill building requirements aimed at lessening environmental impact." The Post concludes, "After years of presidential neglect on global climate change, states and localities have had to pioneer their own approaches to reducing the atmospheric pollution they produce. Smart building requirements are a promising new tool for American cities to do just that. More jurisdictions should follow the District's example."

DOJ_NMG_0096346

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Investigation Of Online Prescription Drug Operation. In the first part of a series on a DEA investigation of online prescription drug sales, the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/19, Shiffman) highlights Akhil Bansal's "family business" and writes, "The Bansals were the guys who supplied the guys who sent that relentless spam, luring American consumers with cheap Viagra, no-prescription Ambien, next-day codeine. Akhil oversaw the family's North American operations, shipping roughly 75,000 pills a day via UPS." According to the Inquirer, since his arrival in Philadelphia in 2003, Akhil "had at age 26 blossomed into a global businessman. … To take down the network, agents were using a number of weapons - surveillance, undercover buys, cell-tower pings, trash pulls, e-mail wiretaps, bank subpoenas, immigration reports, even provisions of the Patriot Act." According to the Inquirer, Congress "was pressuring [Karen] Tandy to do something about illegal online pharmacies. She recognized the emerging public health threat. After all, any kid with a credit card and Internet access could order highly addictive drugs from the safety of home. … Tandy was counting on the Bansal case to make a splash." However, the Inquirer notes that at the time, laws were "vague, outdated, inconsistent. Technology - new medicines and ways to deliver them - was outpacing regulation."

In "online extras" the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/19) has posted on its Web site a recorded interview with Karen Tandy in which she "discusses why it is important for law enforcement agencies to focus on the distribution of prescription drugs over the Internet."

In a sidebar titled, "The Bansal Pill Network," the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/19) outlines the operation.

In today's story titled "Origins," the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/20) writes, "Hours before DEA agents are to arrest Internet drug dealers in a worldwide sweep, Temple grad student Akhil Bansal races from his Roxborough apartment to flee home to India. Today's installment takes us back to the day the case began. It is February 2004." The Inquirer continues, "Akhil's father had put [people] in touch with an Indian couple living in Queens, N.Y., David and Elizabeth Armstrong. From now on, the Armstrongs would handle the shipping. Under the improved scheme, bulk quantities - pills by the tens of thousands - would be shipped from India to a Queens rowhouse. In the basement, newly arrived Indian immigrants would earn $6 an hour repackaging and labeling pills."

27 Indicted, $15.7 Million Worth Of Drugs Seized In Mississippi Investigation. The Hattiesburg (MS) American (11/18) reports, "The indictments of 27 people - including five Hattiesburg men - as well as the seizure of $15.7 million worth of drugs and $2.9 million in cash and property resulted from breaking up one of the largest and most sophisticated drug-trafficking operations in Mississippi history, officials said Friday. … 'This is really the big, top-tier guys,' Stephen Luzinski, assistant special agent in charge of Mississippi Drug Enforcement Administration, said of the 27 suspects. 'It was especially significant in that agents were able to successfully trace the movement of both drugs and money from the hands of high-level Mississippi traffickers into the hands of some of Mexico's most powerful drug traffickers.'" Mississippi's Jackson Clarion Ledger also published this story.

NFL To Keep Drug Program Agents Until End Of Season. The New York Daily News (11/19, Quinn) reports, "As more of the NFL's Drug Program Agents join a potential lawsuit for tens of millions of dollars over back payroll tax and benefits, the league has changed its plan to replace them in midseason. After the IRS ruled over the summer that the DPAs, the men who collect urine samples from players, were employees, not independent contractors, the NFL told the 80DPAs that they would be replaced by an outside company called Comprehensive Drug Testing (CDT) in mid-November. … In a memo sent to DPAs last week, however, DPA supervisor Warren Welsh wrote, 'It has become apparent that ongoing discussions between the Management Council and CDT make the original date unrealistic....it seems, more likely than not, that the change will not take place until the end of the season.'"

Opium Poppy Crop Destroyed In Colombia, Elimination Of Industrial Plantations Declared. The Los Angeles Times (11/20) reports, "With the destruction of a 12-acre opium poppy crop in southern Narino state on Sunday, the Colombian government declared it had rid its territory of all 'industrial' plantations of the flower used to make heroin. Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos made the declaration during a media trip to a mountainside poppy field 375 miles southwest of Bogota near the Ecuadorean border, minutes before dozens of troops destroyed the crop with machetes. It was perhaps no coincidence the assertion came as the U.S. Congress was considering extending Plan Colombia, the $600-million anti-drug and terrorism aid package whose effectiveness has been called into question." However, even critics of Plan Colombia "say strides have been made. Poppy cultivation fell to less than 4,500 acres last year, or 10% of what was farmed in the early 1990s, according to Colombian statistics."

DOJ_NMG_0096347

IMMIGRATION:

NYTimes Says Urges Attention To Immigration Reform. The New York Times (11/20, 1.16M) editorializes that immigration "remains a high-voltage issue that Congress may be too timid or distracted to touch," but it is "crucial" that Democrats "find their voice," and attempt to "revive immigration reform in the Senate." The McCain-Kennedy bill is a "decent bill" except for the other "tough-posing amendments" added by other senators that made it "fundamentally unworkable and unjust." The Senate should "strip those away."

TAX:

IRS Advisory Committee Seeks Tax Payments From Online Auctioneers. USA Today (11/20, McCoy) reports, "Attention online auction sellers: An IRS advisory committee wants you — to pay federal income taxes on your profits." USA continues, "Anyone who sells goods online should first be required by law to submit a federal tax identification number, a change that would enable the IRS to track the transactions and seek any taxes owed, the committee recommended in a new report to the federal tax-collection agency. The recommendation is similar to an enforcement option raised in August by the staff of the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation." USA adds, "The IRS advisory panel of tax specialists, citing the rapid growth of Americans selling via eBay, uBid and other online sites, said it's likely that 'a significant number of those users either choose to ignore income reporting requirements or are unaware of their obligations.' … 'We're trying to help close the tax gap' between what Americans actually earn and what they report to the IRS, said committee member Rachel Paliotti, corporate tax manager for Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island." USA notes, "The non-government panel's report cited IRS data that estimated non-farm sole proprietors under-report 57% of their annual income. The committee also highlighted a 2005 eBay-commissioned report by ACNielsen International Research that said more than 724,000 Americans described the top online auction site as their primary or secondary source of income. … Although the IRS has no estimate of under-reporting specifically by online sellers, the agency estimated that unreported capital gains by all businesses totaled $11 billion for the 2001 federal tax year."

LATimes Calls For Overhaul Of Federal Tax Code. The Los Angeles Times (11/20, 850K) says in an editorial, "Twenty years have passed since President Reagan signed the landmark Tax Reform Act of 1986, a bipartisan effort to simplify the egregiously complex federal tax code. Since then, Washington has taken about 15,000 steps backward — enacting an average of 750 new or modified exemptions, deductions and other wrinkles to tax law every year. The code not only grew more burdensome, it became less efficient, more likely to distort markets and more prone to evasion. The latter is a huge problem, as seen in the estimated $350-billion tax gap — the difference between what taxpayers should be paying the feds each year and what the Internal Revenue Service collects." It is "time for Congress to take another stab at a major rewrite of the tax code that eliminates most of the preferences and loopholes. By broadening the tax base — in other words, requiring more corporate and personal income to be taxed — lawmakers can lower rates without reducing the total amount collected by the IRS."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Levin Undecided On Gates Confirmation. Sen. Carl Levin was asked on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer) if he plans to vote to confirm Robert Gates as the next defense secretary. Levin answered, "Depends on…how he answers questions, whether he's forthright or not at hearings. And those hopefully can take place this year so we can vote on his confirmation. I voted against him last time because I didn't think he was forthright relative to his role in Iran-Contra. I hope he is forthright. I hope he's independent and objective relative to Iraq. I hope he'll speak truth to power unlike too many other people in this Administration. So it all depends on how he does at the hearings."

DOJ_NMG_0096348

Webb Wants Gates Confirmation Delayed Until Next Congress. Senator-elect James Webb, appearing on NBC's Meet the Press (11/19, Russert), was asked if he would like Defense Secretary nominee Robert Gates' confirmation hearings to be held next year when the Democrats take control of the Senate, Webb answered, "I would, and that has been misinterpreted by some. I heard there was a column by Robert Novak saying that I have some personal animus toward Mr. Gates. I don't even know Mr. Gates. But if this is an individual that I'm going to be working with for the next two years, I would like to be able to ask my own questions and to examine…his qualifications."

Cheney Praises Olson For Bush v. Gore Performance. The Washington Times (11/20, McCaslin, 88K) "Inside The Beltway" column reports under the sub-headline "Thanks For My Job" that Vice President Cheney, "heaping praise" on ex-Solicitor General Ted Olson at the Federalist Society national convention, said, "To this day, I'm still impressed with his effective performance in a case called Bush v. Gore."

Hoyer Seeks Assurance From Pelosi That Backers Won't Face Retaliation. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports Rep. Steny Hoyer "acknowledged Sunday he was seeking assurances from incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi that she would not retaliate against his supporters after he won the No. 2 House leadership post." Hoyer "insisted there was 'no bad blood' with Pelosi after she publicly supported Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania for the job of majority leader. Hoyer said he was confident Pelosi would not punish House colleagues who voted 149-86 last week to make Hoyer the majority leader." Hoyer said, "One of the reasons it's going to not happen is that there are a lot of them. It's one thing ... if you have a margin of one or two or five or even 10, but when you have a margin as decisively as the caucus made a decision, then it's time to move on." The AP adds former GOP Speaker Newt Gingrich "called Pelosi's decision to support Murtha a 'mistake' but said Republicans should not underestimate her."

Roll Call (11/20, Yachnin) reports the "newly elected House Democratic leaders vowed to quickly reunify their Caucus in the wake of a bitter leadership contest last week, but offered few details and left some rank-and-file Members questioning how the party will mend its divisions as it prepares to take control of the chamber in the 110th Congress." But at least "a few Democratic lawmakers remained angry Thursday over allegedly heavy-handed tactics employed by Murtha supporters in the contest, and others publicly suggested that House leaders could have a difficult time alleviating any lingering bruises." Rep. Allen Boyd (Fla.), "who will be a co-chairman of the Democratic Blue Dog Coalition in the 110th Congress," said, "I think the Caucus is fractured." Boyd added Pelosi's "biggest challenge is figuring out how to wrap her arms around all the Caucus." Roll Call adds, "Several Members, however, asserted that with the election completed Democrats will focus on readying their legislative agenda, rather than dwell on differences."

Majority Leader "Gang War" Raises Doubts About Pelosi. Time (11/27, Tumulty, Bacon, 4.03M) writes, "There's only one thing dumber in politics than picking a fight when you don't have to; it's picking one when you can't win. That's why pretty much everyone in Washington is mystified by Nancy Pelosi," who "decided to step on her own coronation by turning what would otherwise have been an all-but-ignored secret ballot for majority leader into a gang war. … All that raised a lot of new questions about Pelosi herself--about her judgment, her political instincts and her real ideology," and whether she is "really up to the job" of leading House Democrats.

In his Newsweek (11/27, 3.12M) column, Howard Fineman writes that as Pelosi tries to bring her caucus together, the "tectonic plates move in dangerous ways when the topics are taxes, trade, torts and terrorism," and some of the effects were seen in the majority leader vote, an "embarrassing strategic debut for the Speaker-to-be. Not an earthquake, to be sure, but a tremor that may be worth remembering."

House GOP Sticks With Leadership Team Of Boehner, Blunt. Roll Call (11/20, Davis) reports that despite "efforts by a small band of House Republicans last week to convince their colleagues that a change in leadership was important, if not critical, to winning back a majority in 2008, the House Republican Conference overwhelmingly sided with the status quo Friday and handed landslide victories to Minority Leader-elect John Boehner (Ohio) and Minority Whip-elect Roy Blunt (Mo.)." Both leaders "recast themselves in their campaigns and argued they would be agents for change in the 110th Congress, committing to return the Republican Party to its roots of fiscal conservatism and reform and to battle the new Democratic majority tooth and nail." Boehner said, "We are going to work as a team and we are going to earn our way back into our majority." Boehner "defeated Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, in a landslide 168-27 vote." Roll Call adds Friday's elections "were a significant defeat for prominent conservatives Pence and Shadegg."

DOJ_NMG_0096349

Gingrich Encourages House GOP To Operate Independently Of The White House. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, on Fox News Sunday (11/19, Wallace), said House Majority Leader John Boehner has "got to decide, is he going to focus on regaining control of the House, or is he going to focus on being the White House's floor leader? They are very different jobs. And my hope is that Boehner is going to decide that he wants to be the leader who helps the party get back into majority status." Asked if he thinks "the White House and President Bush have gone off-track," Gingrich replied, "The president…has a legacy concern. 'What do I do in the next two years?' I hope he'll decide that that legacy is in a bipartisan coalition that helps also, by the way, elect a Republican president in '08. The House Republicans have a different institutional challenge. How do they reach out in very closely contested districts, recruit the candidates, build the record, create the excitement and the energy to regain a majority? They're not automatically identical."

House GOP Said To Be Ignoring Lessons Of Midterm Elections. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "House Democrats and Republicans elected their leaders for the next Congress last week, and the results suggest there's a reason Democrats will have the majority. They seem to have absorbed the election's lessons better than the GOP." Republicans "easily re-elected their top two leaders in the face of challenges from younger conservatives." House Republicans are "talking a good game of recovering their small-government principles, but their leadership choices suggest they think their defeat had little to do with their own image or performance. Instead -- and we also hear these whispers privately -- they blame everything on President Bush and Iraq. Mr. Blunt is said to have impressed the Members with a plan to defeat freshman Democrats in 2008; so much for self-reflection and new ideas."

"Liberated" Lott Makes Return To Senate Leadership. A Time (11/27, Calabresi, 4.03M) piece called "The Revival Of Trent Lott" begins, "'Hello, Mr. President. This is Lazarus speaking.' That is how Trent Lott answered a phone call last week" from President Bush, "the man who helped force him out of the Senate's top job in 2002." Lott won the Senate minority whip race "because he spent the past four years quietly making himself as useful as possible to his colleagues. He lent his old strengths as a backroom dealmaker and a master of arcane Senate rules to sometimes thankless tasks. He not only won back allies that way, but he also sharpened the exact skills that his party will need for the next two years." And "smooth relations with the Bush White House aren't the priority they used to be. … As he was campaigning for the whip job, Lott says, he told his colleagues that when it came to White House pressure, 'there's nothing they can do to me or for me that they haven't already done. I'm not mad, but I am a little bit of a liberated guy these days.'"

Remains Of "Gang Of 14" May Play Role In 110th Congress. Roll Call (11/20, Pierce, Billings) reports, "Having successfully averted what could have been an explosive partisan showdown over judges in the Senate last year, Senators in the 'Gang of 14' believe they have attained a relevancy that will allow them to play an even more prominent role in the 110th Congress — not just on judicial nominations but on other issues as well." Though their "original mission vanishes at the end of this year," Sen. Mary Landrieu said she "expects that a broader role for the holdover gang members, and perhaps other like-minded Senators, likely will develop in the coming weeks." Landrieu said, "The 12 of us still remaining [in the Senate] will have that discussion sometime soon to see what the mood is. There have been many individual and group meetings about how to advance a civil and productive agenda." Roll Call adds that on the Republican side, "the Louisiana Democrat said, Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) is helping lead efforts to engage the gang's GOP Senators and other moderates." This "possible re-emergence of the gang comes even though the group saw two key GOP players -- Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) -- go down in defeat on Nov. 7."

DOJ_NMG_0096350

In Face Of "Rumors," Lindsey Warns Bush Against Tax Increase Deal. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/20, A16), Lawrence B. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group and formerly President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002, says, "During the recent off-year elections, the president repeatedly pointed to the booming economy and noted that his tax cuts were responsible. With growth strong and unemployment low despite the ending of the stock-market bubble, terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq, he had every reason to be proud. Moreover, both economic theory and the actual timing of the economic revival support his claims regarding the tax cuts." That is why "it is so odd that rumors swarm around Washington that the president may be willing to raise taxes as part of a 'deal' on entitlement reform. In particular, the rumors suggest the president might be willing to get rid of the provision that caps the income level used to compute Social Security taxes and benefits. These rumors aren't without substance; last year the president would not rule out raising the cap when asked." Should the President "do this, he doubtless would be thinking that saving Social Security would be worth the price. He would be wrong. In practice this idea would both destroy the basis on which Social Security was started and fail to produce the expected revenue that supposedly would save the system."

Rangel Denies Democrats Intend To Raise Taxes. Rep. Charles Rangel, on CBS's Face the Nation (11/19, Schieffer), said, "The truth of the matter is that raising taxes that have already been put into effect is poor tax policy and bad politics. … Nobody talking about an increase in taxes. … I'm assuming that the President and the Vice President will put an end to the rhetoric that Democrats just want to raise your taxes and they just want to raise spending."

Reid Says Prospect Of Cheney Presidency Means No Bush Impeachment. US News and World Report (11/27, Bedard) reports in "Washington Whispers" that the "degree to which the new Democratic leadership on Capitol Hill despises Vice President Dick Cheney is a big plus for President Bush. Consider why incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid scrapped an idea to impeach Bush: 'Two words: Dick Cheney,' he says."

Paulson To Deliver Address On US Capital Market Competitiveness. The Financial Times (11/20, Guha, Grant) reports US Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson today will "say what the US needs to do to ensure that its markets remain globally competitive in a landmark speech on capital market regulation." The "move comes amid growing concern in the US that New York is losing out to emerging financial centres in Asia and to London, with its lighter-touch, principles-based regulatory regime." It is "also a sign that the concerns on Wall Street about the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate compliance and controls laws have moved higher up the agenda in Washington since the arrival at the Treasury three months ago of the former Goldman Sachs chief executive. Senior figures, including Dick Cheney, the vice-president, have said that Sarbox may have gone too far."

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, Solomon, 2.04M) reports Paulson, "in a speech scheduled for delivery to the Economic Club of New York today, will press the case for a re-examination of government rules and laws he believes are putting US financial markets at a disadvantage amid competition from abroad." Paulson, "in his first major public comments since Democrats won control of Congress, is expected to stress the need for 'regulatory balance' and to outline challenges regulators and policy makers face as they try to juggle the need for regulation with the imperative to make U.S. markets competitive." Paulson is not "expected to call for any new laws or for repeal of any rules" but will "emphasize the impact of existing regulations, the legal environment, and the complexity of dealing with multiple, overlapping regulators. He likely will call on federal regulators to tweak a provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, known as Section 404, that requires companies to assess internal controls to ensure financial reporting is accurate and reliable."

Official's Role In Bush Effort To Promote Marriage Examined. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A1, Meckler, 2.04M) reports in a front page story about the "notion that government can help children escape poverty by promoting marriage for their parents was once considered a fringe idea from right field. It is now federal policy." The Journal adds that in "very large part, that's due to Wade Horn, a child psychologist turned bureaucrat who has put marriage atop the Bush administration's limited antipoverty agenda." As "head of the federal Administration for Children and Families, Dr. Horn has employed the zeal of an ideologue and the discipline of an academic to inject marriage promotion into a host of government programs under his purview, even before Congress authorized an official marriage program. Today, more than 200 programs are at work across the country, seeking to change public attitudes surrounding marriage, persuade teenagers to aspire to matrimony and teach relationship skills to young couples." Horn has "co-opted critics, fine-tuned his rhetoric, and persuaded Congress to insert his marriage agenda into this year's welfare legislation, winning $500 million over five years." Six years "into the Bush administration, Dr. Horn is one of the few remaining political appointees interested in 'compassionate conservatism,' the slogan from the President's first campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0096351

Florida 13th CD Race Could End Up Before House Administration Committee. Roll Call (11/20, McArdle, Murray) reports with "five House races around the country still unresolved as of Friday, election watchers on Capitol Hill believe it is increasingly likely that the contest for the open Florida 13th district seat could end up before the House Administration Committee, which has oversight over federal elections." In the race to fill the seat of outgoing Rep. Katherine Harris, Democrat Christine Jennings faced Republican Vern Buchanan, and it "remains the only district where both Democratic and Republican House Administration Committee staff continue to have observers on the ground." But "just as the election itself is under dispute — Buchanan was leading Jennings by 401 votes as of Friday at press time — the process for determining who decides on the winner also could be controversial, with the House about to switch hands from the Republicans to the Democrats." Florida state election officials "are slated to certify the election results Monday morning. But the contest has been marred by allegations of voting irregularities in Sarasota County." Democrats "claim electronic voting machines are to blame for almost 19,000 missing votes in the Jennings-Buchanan contest." Ed Patru, a "spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, concedes that there was a high number of 'undervotes' in the Jennings-Buchanan race," but he added "there is no evidence to suggest that anyone in district 13 who wanted to vote was unable to do so." Because the Democrats "do not take control of the House until Jan. 3, it is likely that any investigation by House Administration would be launched while Republicans are still in charge -- meaning the GOP will have the 2-1 majority on the investigating committee. But by the time the full House would be asked to seat the new Member, the Democrats would be in the majority." Meanwhile, the races "have not been called in North Carolina's 8th district, New Mexico's 1st district, and Ohio's 2nd and 15th districts. Republican incumbents are leading narrowly in all four races. Two House races -- one in Texas, the other in Louisiana -- will be decided in December runoffs."

Novak Says Senate Dissenters Block Pork. In his column in the Washington Post (11/20, 690K), Robert Novak says, "While House Republicans reacted to stinging rejection from America's voters by refusing to change leadership, their Senate counterparts have tried to use their closing weeks in power to enact a last burst of pork-barrel spending. But that effort was stalled last week by independent-minded Republican senators, spearheaded by two abrasive freshmen and one longtime hair shirt. Before Congress recessed Friday for Thanksgiving, the GOP leadership appeared to capitulate." The freshmen, "Tom Coburn and Jim DeMint, campaigning in 2004 in Oklahoma and South Carolina, promised not to fall in line with GOP leaders. Fulfilling that pledge allied them with the long-termer John McCain. They have been backed by Jeff Sessions of Alabama and another freshman, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire. In the lame-duck session's first week, they played Horatio at the Bridge by combining to block a pork-filled omnibus spending bill." That would "place responsibility for spending excesses on the new Democratic majority taking office next year. It is highly unlikely that Sen. Robert C. Byrd, a legendary king of pork returning as Appropriations Committee chairman, will reverse the habits of a lifetime and listen to ordinary voters' revulsion over excessive federal spending."

Public Gets First Glimpses Of New Justices. The Washington Post (11/20, A15, Barnes, 690K) reports the "two newest Supreme Court justices took off the robes and took to the stump last week, providing glimpses of the fresh personalities that will reshape a court that had remained constant for more than a decade." The settings "could not have been more different. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was interviewed before a crowd of 3,000 last Monday night at the University of Miami, and his telegenic message of moderation was then broadcast to the nation on ABC's 'Nightline.'" Meanwhile, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. "spoke to his fellow members of the Federalist Society, a coalition of conservative lawyers and legal scholars who have gone from rebel outsiders to Washington insiders -- the group drew 1,500 people to its annual banquet and warranted appearances by administration leaders from Vice President Cheney on down." Roberts "provided a little something for everyone. For the feature pages, he had a cute explanation of how his jiggling son Jack almost stole the show with his hammy performance before the cameras when President Bush introduced Roberts and his family to the nation last year: 'People think Jack was dancing. He was not dancing. He was being Spiderman. He was shooting the webs off.'" Alito, "too, drew laughs with his speech Thursday night to the Federalist Society, but there was a scratchier tone to his address. He still seems a little sore about his confirmation hearings, which were tougher than what Roberts faced." Members "loved his comment that when he gets near the Hart Senate Office Building, where he spent days last November paying courtesy calls to senators, 'invariably without thinking . . . I cross to the other side of the street.'"

DOJ_NMG_0096352

DISA Leads Federal Government In Embracing Telecommuting. The Washington Post (11/20, D1, Barr, 690K) reports the Defense Information Systems Agency "describes itself as providing 'global net-centric solutions' for the White House, the Pentagon and the armed forces." Most of the "engineers, computer scientists, telecommunication experts and technology wizards who work for DISA live in Northern Virginia and work in offices scattered through Arlington and Falls Church. Many are less than thrilled with the idea that by 2011 their jobs will be moved to Fort Meade, Md., as part of Defense Department base closures and realignments." To "keep from losing experienced employees, DISA has embraced telecommuting -- a way of working that the government has been slower to accept than the private sector. Of the about 2,000 DISA jobs that have been identified as suitable for telecommuting, more than 500 employees have been cleared to work from home."

Gerberding "Under Attack" Over CDC's Difficulties. Time (11/27, Gorman, 4.03M) reports Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Director Julie Gerberding is "under attack. The massive reorganization she ordered -- combined with painful budget cuts in key divisions -- seems to be tearing" the CDC apart, and "the agency has been targeted by three different congressional probes. … Nobody is claiming that the CDC has become another governmental basket case like FEMA -- at least not yet." But the "bad publicity" comes as 2007 and 2008 budgets are being drawn up, and "if lawmakers believe that Gerberding is floundering, her institution's budget will suffer."

Mint To Unveil Presidential Dollar Coin Series. USA Today (11/20, 1B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "The US Mint today is unveiling designs for its newest additions: dollar coins that will feature deceased presidents on a rotating basis, similar to the popular state quarters." More "use of dollar coins instead of bills would save the government hundreds of millions of dollars each year, even though the coins are more expensive to produce, because coins last for about 30 years, more than 16 times longer than dollar bills." In 1995, the Federal Reserve estimated that "replacing dollar bills with coins would save $500 million a year," and the savings would "likely be much bigger today, because the number of $1 bills in circulation has risen 40% in the past decade." In a USA TODAY/Gallup survey conducted Oct. 20-22, "more than half" said the presidential dollar coins was a "good idea." However, on replacing dollar bills entirely, "79% said they would oppose such a move. Even when told that replacing bills with coins would save the government $500 million a year, 69% said they still opposed making such a change." The New York Times (11/20, Healey, 1.16M) also reports the story.

WSJournal Says FDA's Approval Of Breast Implants Is Good News. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, 2.04M) editorializes, "It took 14 years, but science finally trumped politics Friday, with the Food and Drug Administration's lifting of its longstanding ban on silicone-gel breast implants," which is "especially welcome news for mastectomy patients." One of the "ugliest aspects of the breast-implant controversy" has been "the irresponsibility of the feminist movement, whose championship of a woman's right to "choose" doesn't extend to breast implants." However, it is unlikely that the FDA's moves "closes the chapter on this nasty episode," because Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women, called Friday's announcement a "'reckless decision' and promises to seek reversal 'when the new Congress takes office.'" It's "worth remembering the enormous price that has been paid: to the credibility of the legal system, in jobs lost, and in public health," and it's worth asking "what is more toxic: the silicone implants preferred by thousands of women, or the trial bar that purports to 'protect' them."

Chances Of Congressional Reform Already Said To Be Fading. US News and World Report (11/27, Brush) writes, "Americans had ethics on their mind when they took control of Congress away from Republicans," and "both the winners and the losers promised to heed the message." But as the post-election week "wore on, and both parties turned to the business of electing new leaders, the lofty rhetoric seemed in the view of many to be giving way to the same old thing. … By week's end, reform -- substantive or otherwise -- was looking like a mighty tall order."

DOJ_NMG_0096353

OTHER NEWS:

Incomes Rising At Highest Pace Since 1990s. The Christian Science Monitor (11/20, Trumbull, 59K) reports American workers' paychecks "are rising again at a pace not seen since the 1990s. The pay increase amounts to 4 percent on average over the past 12 months, and it comes at a very helpful time for millions of households." While 4 percent "may not sound like much, but you have to look back to 1997 to find a calendar year with a gain that big. Equally significant, tamer energy prices mean that the 'real' wage gains, after inflation, are above 3 percent for the past 12 months. That, too, hasn't happened since the 1990s, even though the economy has been expanding over the past five years."

Drug Industry Begins Courting Democrats. The Financial Times (11/19, Kirchgaessner) reports, "The pharmaceutical industry was in the enviable position two years ago of having the right friends in the right places in Washington." The "industry's mirrored that of other big companies and trade associations that had strengthened their ties with the Republican majority by hiring only Republican lobbyists for top positions – a practice championed by" Senator Rick Santorum (R) "that was known as the 'K Street project'." Now, "the prospects of the industry's giants have taken a turn." The industry, however, "has already" began recruiting "high-profile Democrat[s] to help it make inroads with the incoming majority party." But "for all the emphasis some lobbyists pin on hopes of making new friends in the Democratic caucus, others privately admit that the Democrats' narrow victory in the Senate means the industry is not in dire straits."

McCain Leads Early Odds For 2008 GOP Nomination. Time (11/27, 4.03M) notes the early line on the 2008 GOP nomination from betting site Tradesport.com. Sen. John McCain is at 10 to 11 (52% chance of being the nominee), followed by Rudy Giuliani at 47 to 1, Tommy Thompson at 124 to 1, and Duncan Hunter at 142 to 1.

Kerry Says "Botched" Iraq Joke Won't Affect Presidential Run. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports Sen. John Kerry "insisted on Sunday his 'botched joke' about President Bush's Iraq policy would not undermine a possible White House campaign in 2008." Asked if the "furor over his comment had caused him to reconsider a 2008 race," Kerry said, "Not in the least. The parlor game of who's up, who's down, today or tomorrow, if I listened to that stuff, I would never have won the nomination."

Kerry Claims GOP Response To His "Botched Joke" Boosted Democrats. Kerry was asked on Fox News Sunday (11/19, Wallace) if his Democratic colleagues asked him to remain out of the spotlight after the uproar over his "botched joke" regarding US troops in Iraq, Kerry answered, "First of all, obviously, it was a bad joke, and I apologized for it. And we moved on, and we should move on. You know, we had an historic election, absolutely historic. The American people spoke. And I worked very, very hard for those two years to help us elect a Democratic majority. It was clear to me that if people wanted to make that joke a distraction, I didn't want it to be. I wanted to win. … I had a discussion with a number of leaders, including my colleague Ted Kennedy and others, in order to make a judgment about what was best to accomplish the goal that I had been working for. And since you had some very close races, I thought it was important. I made the decision. It was my decision to make certain that I didn't distract. And the results are what speak for themselves. In fact, the Republicans made a terrible mistake, because they shifted the topic back to Iraq. The polls showed that we went up. They didn't want to talk about Iraq, and within two days, they tried to shift back to taxes."

Gingrich Won't Make Decision On 2008 Until September. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports, "One of the GOP politicians mentioned in a crowded field for the White House, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, said he would not make a decision until September — a relatively late date in the campaign cycle — to focus in the private sector on trade policies." Gingrich said, "We have lots of time for personal ambition. And I think an awful lot of this early energy is wasted, and we ought to be focusing on, you know, how are you going to compete with China and India, how are you going to solve the problem in Iraq?"

DOJ_NMG_0096354

Obama Seen As Main Impediment To Clinton Presidential Nomination. Newsweek (11/27, Alter, 3.12M) examines "Bill And Hillary Clinton's War Plan," saying that "unless personal concerns surface soon, the odds strongly favor" Sen. Hillary Clinton entering the presidential race "early next year. If she does, it will not be because her party is clamoring for her to do so. While her celebrity and command of issues always draw friendly crowds, they cannot be fairly described as tumultuous. While Bill is a virtuoso at weaving together seemingly unrelated threads, Hillary is still too often what one of her biographers, Michael Tomasky, calls the 'Laundry Lady,' reciting a laundry list of worthy ideas that don't yet add up to a compelling vision." While "one conventional take" says she could easily win the Democratic nomination but not a general election, "the reverse may be closer to the truth. … The last four Democratic nominees have all received more than 250 electoral votes." The "bigger problem for her would be getting past Barack Obama, who now seems poised to run." And the "primary schedule favors Obama. Hillary Clinton has no Rove-like master strategist yet (other than her husband), but the logic of her front-runner game plan suggests building a firewall in the South to recover if she's upset in Iowa or New Hampshire." But that plan "doesn't account for Obama, who would likely crush her among black voters."

Edwards Says Obama Should Run In 2008. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, "the 2004 Democratic nominee for vice president, said Illinois Sen. Barack Obama should get into the race." Edwards said, "I hope he runs. I think he should run. This is such an important job that I would urge anybody who can make a serious contribution to the campaign and the dialogue — either in our party or the other party — to run." The AP adds Edwards "isn't yet willing to commit to another run for president."

Dean Addresses Gay Leadership Conference. The Washington Times (11/20, Pierce, 88K) "Inside Politics" column reports DNC Chairman Howard Dean said his party "needs to look beyond getting homosexuals and minorities a place at the table and instead work toward getting them on the ballot." Addressing the International Gay & Lesbian Leadership Conference in Houston this weekend, Dean said, "We've got to share power, not just responsibility, from now on." Dean "said little about issues such as same-sex 'marriage' or discrimination laws, and instead addressed broader Democratic agendas, such as raising the minimum wage."

Dean Models DNC Leadership On Ron Brown. US News and World Report (11/27, Bedard) reports in "Washington Whispers" that DNC Chairman Howard Dean has taken to saying his model for the job is late ex-chairman Ron Brown. Both "entered the job as outsiders under fire from moderates who worried that they were too liberal. Both surprised the establishment by raising tons of money. Both took a shattered party and built a national organization geared to winning a presidential election." And both "focused on the key Democratic demographic -- blacks. Brown brought African-Americans to the table," and Dean wants to put "more blacks on the ballot. 'It's going to be about opportunities and a place on the ticket,' says Dean. 'Ron Brown was really the beginning of that.'"

Christian Leaders Said To Risk Losing Credibility Over Homosexuality. In a USA Today op-ed (11/20), Baptist minister Oliver "Buzz" Thomas says, "What if Christian leaders are wrong about homosexuality? I suppose, much as a newspaper maintains its credibility by setting the record straight, church leaders would need to do the same: Correction: Despite what you might have read, heard or been taught throughout your churchgoing life, homosexuality is, in fact, determined at birth and is not to be condemned by God's followers." Religion's "only real commodity, after all, is its moral authority. Lose that, and we lose our credibility. Lose credibility, and we might as well close up shop." Christianity "is in danger of squandering its moral authority by continuing its pattern of discrimination against gays and lesbians in the face of mounting scientific evidence that sexual orientation has little or nothing to do with choice. To the contrary, whether sexual orientation arises as a result of the mother's hormones or the child's brain structure or DNA, it is almost certainly an accident of birth. The point is this: Without choice, there can be no moral culpability."

Defeat Of Arizona Gay Marriage Ban Examined. The Washington Post (11/20, A3, Geis, 690K) reports retirees Al Breznay, 79, and Maxine Piatt, 75, "were pivotal in defeating an Arizona initiative that defined marriage as the union of one man and one woman -- the only one of 28 such state measures ever to fail." Breznay, "a retired mechanic who still does odd jobs to bring in extra cash, and Piatt, a former bank teller, are at the forefront of a strategy to defeat a tide of same-sex marriage bans by talking about straight people." Of those "28 state marriage initiatives, 17 have included language outlawing domestic partnerships. Gay rights advocates see this as an opening to highlight for heterosexual voters the impact such initiatives may have on them, and in Arizona, activists kept the spotlight on couples such as Breznay and Piatt, registered domestic partners whose faces appeared on fliers and television ads." The campaign "against the Arizona measure, Proposition 107, avoided almost any mention of gay marriage, except in small liberal pockets of the state. Instead, the message was about the section of the measure that would have banned government agencies from recognizing civil unions or domestic partnerships." That "apparently struck home in the state's sizable senior-citizen enclaves, where many older couples do not marry because their retirement income would be affected. The initiative was defeated, 52 percent to 48 percent."

DOJ_NMG_0096355

Foley Ends Stay At Rehabilitation Facility. Roll Call (11/20, Akers) reports ex-Rep. Mark Foley "ended his stay at a rehab facility in Arizona that treats alcohol addiction as well as sexual addiction and compulsion before he headed back to Florida to attend the funeral of his father." Foley "faces a Florida criminal investigation into his sexually explicit Internet messages."

Four Defeated GOP Lawmakers Live On Same D Street Block. In his Washington Post (11/20, A15, 690K) "Inside The Loop" column, Al Kamen writes, "Incoming Democrats: Alert! Do not, repeat, not, buy a home on the 100 block of D Street SE on Capitol Hill. It may be jinxed." The block is home to GOP Reps. Chris Chocola, Clay Shaw, Jim Ryun, and Nancy Johnson, who all lost their seats this month. Another resident: ex-Rep. Mark Foley.

Food Banks Falling Behind Demand For Holiday Assistance. USA Today (11/20, Koch, 2.27M) reports the nation's "food banks are scrambling to serve a growing demand for help during the holidays at a time when government food donations and private cash contributions have fallen." More people are "asking for food even as the amount of government commodities available — milk, cheese, canned goods and other staples — is down 55% from 2005, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. A second USDA program of emergency food aid has stayed about the same. Together, they supply about one-fourth of what food banks give away." USDA "buys fewer commodities when it has less need to boost farm prices. It gives 80% of purchases to America's Second Harvest, a network of more than 200 food banks."

NYTimes Criticizes Government Decision To Not Use Word "Hunger." The New York Times (11/20, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "First the good news: the government's annual hunger report shows a slight decline last year in the number of citizens in need of food. Now the bad news: the annual hunger report has dropped the word 'hunger.' Instead, there were 35 million Americans last year suffering from 'low food security,' meaning they chronically lacked the resources to be able to eat enough food." To the "extent that more public empathy is needed to prod a stronger attack on low food security, we opt for 'hunger' as a most stirring word."

Studies Find Minority Test Performance Gap Persists. The New York Times (11/20, Dillon, 1.16M) reports that when President Bush "signed his sweeping education law a year into his presidency, it set 2014 as the deadline by which schools were to close the test-score gaps between minority and white students that have persisted since standardized testing began." Now, as Congress "prepares to consider reauthorizing the law next year, researchers and a half-dozen recent studies, including three issued last week, are reporting little progress toward that goal. Slight gains have been seen for some grade levels." Despite "concerted efforts by educators, the test-score gaps are so large that, on average, African-American and Hispanic students in high school can read and do arithmetic at only the average level of whites in junior high school."

States Struggle To Fund Transportation Needs. USA Today (11/20, Copeland, 2.27M) reports on the "many local efforts around the country to bridge the gap between the federal, state and local funds available for transportation and what's needed." Nationwide, the "gap tops $100 billion a year, says Gary Maring of the transportation consulting firm Cambridge Systematics, which studied the issue last year for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce." The "potentially most far-reaching financing initiative is a pilot program in Oregon that is testing the feasibility of a 'virtual tollway' system that would replace the state gas tax with a road-user fee." Volunteers "driving vehicles equipped with state-installed Global Positioning System (GPS) devices pull into gas stations where a transmitter in their car 'tells' the pump how many miles they have driven. They then pay for their gas and 1.2 cents for every mile they've driven since their last fill-up; they don't have to pay the 24-cent-per-gallon state gas tax."

DOJ_NMG_0096356

Allen's "Macaca" Gaffe Seen As Worst Self-Inflicted Wound Of 2006. In his Roll Call column (11/20), Stuart Rothenberg discusses the "Worst Self-Inflicted Wound Of 2006." The "nominees" are Reps. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.), Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Sens. George Allen (R-Va.) and John Kerry (D-Mass.), and Reps. John Sweeney (R-N.Y.) and Mark Foley (R-Fla.). Rothenberg picks Allen for his "'macaca' comment," which "not only brought about his own defeat and destroyed his once considerable chances of winning the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 but he also realigned the nation's entire governing balance for the next two years. Because of that jaw-dropping achievement, the award for worst self-inflicted wound must go to Allen. But it was a very close contest."

MSNBC Gives Greater Emphasis To Politics, Opinion. In the Washington Post's "Media Notes" column (11/20, C1), Howard Kurtz says, "MSNBC has seen the future, and it is politics. Delivered with plenty of opinion. Preferably with lots of cameo appearances by big-name news stars from the mothership." The "perennial third-place cable news channel enjoyed a nice bump in the ratings during the midterm campaign, in part because the likes of Brian Williams, Tim Russert, David Gregory and Campbell Brown broke away from their NBC duties to help out." MSNBC General Manager Dan Abrams "doesn't plan to put on 'all politics all the time until 2008,' Abrams says he wants to continue 'branding' MSNBC as a haven for political junkies." Kurtz adds MSNBC "has done well in other campaigns, only to have the gains vanish after Election Day. All of cable news tends to get big spikes during major stories -- war, scandal, missing white women -- that fade when the news cycle moves on."

WSJournal Says AHI Can Improve. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A16, 2.04M) editorializes that it's "encouraging that America's private health insurers are thinking about ways to preserve a competitive market for health services," but America's Health Insurance Plans (AHI)" should do "more to promote a genuine free market in health care." It's "one really good idea is the creation of something called a Universal Health Account, which would end the tax bias that lets employers deduct health care expenditures but doesn't let individuals do the same." The 2003 Medicare bill's Health Savings Accounts (HAS) would not just "go a long way toward making insurance more affordable for those who don't get it from their employers," but would also "provide incentives to move beyond the employer-based insurance system." The "biggest disappointment" is that the insurers "aren't calling for a national market in health insurance -- which is essential if their Universal Health Accounts are to work as well as they should."

NYTimes Urges New York Officials To Use Public Transportation. The New York Times (11/20, 1.16M) editorializes, "The answer to one question raised by the scandal involving State Comptroller Alan Hevesi should be easy: public officials could take public transportation as a matter of public policy." The issue of public officials unrestricted access to cars and drivers would not be a problem if the state "would follow Mayor Michael Bloomberg's lead," but using the subway. Even though there are "no subways in Albany, and the bus and taxi services are meager, there is "something to be said for anything that reminds public officials that they are no different from other citizens who struggle with traffic jams and subway doors and the ordinary hazards of moving about."

APEC Statement On North Korea Seen As Falling Short Of US Goal. The Financial Times (11/20, Daniel, Beattie, Kazmin) reports that APEC members Sunday "presented a united front to North Korea, urging it to start dismantling its nuclear weapons program." However, the Times says US officials "had wanted a formal published statement to show the combined resolve of countries in the region surrounding North Korea. But they could manage only an oral statement." NSC spokesman David McCormick said the statement was "very firm in the need for full implementation" of the UNSCR 1695 and 1718" and stressed that "what was important was the leaders of APEC coming together in a common statement." Meanwhile, Secretary Rice cited Vietnam as an example, saying, "If the leaders of Burma and North Korea were to follow the example of Vietnam, if they made the strategic choice and took the necessary steps to join the international community, then it would open a new path to peace and prosperity."

The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports that "un a separate discussion, McCormick said, Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao had agreed 'on the path ahead' in dealing with North Korea. McCormick and White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush and Hu had not set specific conditions to present to Pyongyang." The Korean situation also "formed a backdrop to a meeting between Bush and President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia."

DOJ_NMG_0096357

ABC World News (11/19, lead story, 2:50, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported Bush "pushed leaders to push North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons program. The results were not as tough as the US had hoped." Similarly, in an analysis of this weekend's summit, AFP (11/20, Harmsen) says the "closed-doors diplomacy…came nowhere nearer to resolving the crisis over North Korea's nuclear dream, analysts say -- and may even have made matters worse." According to AFP, "Some analysts saw the general absence here of results on North Korea as a failure of US leadership, following the Republican Party's defeat in mid-term elections earlier this month."

The AP (11/20, Alexander) notes that although "they would not put it in writing," the APEC members "joined together Sunday to say they worry about North Korea's nuclear weapons program and to urge the reclusive country to resume disarmament negotiations." The AP says the "method of delivery provided a curious culmination to the issue that overshadowed" the summit.

Under the headline "US Stance On North Korea Hits Hurdles At Summit," the Wall Street Journal (11/20, A5, Dreazen, Ramstad, 2.04M) says the Bush administration's "efforts to raise international pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear program hit a series of roadblocks" at the summit. Among them, the US was "unable to persuade the other 20 APEC member states to issue a written statement about North Korea's nuclear program." Instead, the administration "settled for Vietnamese President Nguyen Minh Triet taking the unusual step of delivering a statement to reporters in Hanoi expressing concern about North Korea." Meanwhile, White House officials said Bush "used at least one of his private meetings with other leaders to detail the incentives the US was prepared to give North Korea if it gave up its nuclear program." The Washington Post (11/20, Fletcher, 690K) runs a similar report, titled "Pacific Rim Statement On N. Korea Falls Short Of What Bush Sought,"

Bush Touts Trade As Conducive To Political Freedom. USA Today (11/20, Jackson, 2.27M) reports "global trade issues dominated the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum President Bush attended this weekend in Hanoi. He sought to expand the US business presence in Vietnam and other parts of Asia." The President "met with leaders from Vietnam, China, Russia, Japan, Australia and South Korea, urging an expansion of free trade. However, Bush headed to Vietnam without congressional approval to widen Vietnam trade more quickly." Today, Bush "plans to underscore US commercial ties by visiting Vietnam's stock market before he heads to Indonesia, where crowds Sunday protested Bush's visit. … Economic expansion helps political freedom, Bush said last week, adding that 'by opening up to trade, countries build wealth and empower their citizens.'"

The New York Times (11/20, Sanger, Cooper, 1.16M) reports on Bush's visit to Ho Chi Minh City, a "booming, wildly capitalist commercial center of an ostensibly Communist Vietnam," where he stopped by "the stock exchange to talk with local business leaders before preparing for a quick visit to Indonesia. … As he has throughout his trip, Mr. Bush has avoided dwelling on America's past with Vietnam, though it is difficult in a city like this one, filled with so much potent symbolism of American defeat."

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A5, Hookway, 2.04M) reports "the US and other Pacific Rim countries said they were prepared to cut farm subsidies and tariffs to revive stalled world trade talks, putting pressure on other economic powers such as the European Union, Brazil and India to follow suit. Leaders at the summit of the 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum also said they would consider a free-trade area of their own if the global talks fail." The Journal adds, "The initiative may not break the deadlock over politically sensitive farm subsidies that stalled the so-called Doha Round of talks, which began in 2001 under the auspices of the World Trade Organization. Some trade officials attending the summit say global trade talks could remain on hold despite the offer. … The idea of an APEC free-trade area was introduced in 2004. It was quickly dropped, largely because hopes were still high the WTO negotiations could provide a more direct route to freer trade."

Russia, US Sign Trade Pact. The AP (11/20, Nicholson) reports, "Russia and the United States signed a key trade agreement Sunday, removing the last major obstacle in Moscow's 13-year journey to join the World Trade Organization. The deal, inked on the sidelines of a gathering of Pacific Rim economies, is a powerful vote of confidence in Russia -- the largest economy still outside the 149-member WTO -- and signals its integration into the global trading system." It also "marks a bright spot in the two countries' relations that have been marred by disagreements over Iran's controversial nuclear program and Washington's fears of a roll back of democratic freedoms under Russian President Vladimir Putin."

DOJ_NMG_0096358

China, South Korea To Discuss Trade Agreement. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, 2.04M) reports, "China and South Korea will start talks next year on the feasibility of a free-trade agreement, China's official Xinhua news agency reported." Xinhua "said an agreement on the talks was reached at a meeting late Friday between Chinese Commerce Minister Bo Xilai and South Korean Trade Minister Kim Hyun Chong."

Bush Urged To Mount Domestic Campaign In Support Of Free Trade. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (11/20), "Having failed to convince fellow Republicans of the merits of comprehensive immigration reform…Bush now faces the even more difficult task of defending free trade against protectionist Democrats. A tide of populism, protectionism, nationalism and xenophobia is washing over the country, fueled by right-wing radio talk show hosts, CNN firebrand Lou Dobbs -- and legitimate concerns that US workers are falling behind in the global struggle for jobs and good wages. … Even though his influence is at its all-time lowest ebb, Bush somehow needs to mount a campaign to convince Americans that their continued prosperity depends on an open world trading system."

In his Washington Post column (11/20), Sebastian Mallaby says the partisan split on trade is "is undermining the U.S. ability to play its traditional postwar role in driving global trade liberalization. And if anti-trade Democrats can win elections when unemployment stands at 4.4 percent, they may do even better next time." To "forge a bipartisan consensus, we need a different approach. Here is a three-part formula." Democrats "need to be honest about development in the poor world," because "the real key to raising living standards is economic growth. And growth, in turn, is highly correlated with trade openness." Instead, Democrats "should be frank about their real reason for ambivalence on trade, which is that some Americans suffer from it." Republicans "need to get serious about the fact that, since 1980 or so, real incomes for the majority of Americans have stagnated." And "both parties should cooperate on overhauling the nation's farm program, which comes up for renewal next year."

Bush Defends Religious Freedom In Visit To Vietnamese Church. The AP (11/20, Loven) reports, "Though no sermon was delivered Sunday in the church where President Bush took a 'moment to converse with God,' he offered his own precept outside. 'A whole society is a society which welcomes basic freedoms,' Bush said, adding that there's none more basic than 'the freedom to worship as you see fit.'" The President and First Lady Laura Bush "visited Cua Bac Church, a Catholic basilica on a tree-lined street in the diplomatic district, to show support for Vietnam's faithful, who live under a government that tightly controls religious institutions." Said Bush, "It's our way of expressing our personal faith and at the same time urging societies to feel comfortable with and confident in saying to their people, 'If you feel like praising God, you're allowed to do so in any way you see fit.'" The AP adds "just this month, the United States removed Vietnam from a list of the world's worst violators of religious freedom."

Massive Protests Await Bush In Indonesia. The AP (11/20, Hunt) reports, "Warmly greeted by world leaders in Vietnam, President Bush drew a different reaction Sunday at his upcoming stop in Indonesia, where thousands angrily protested America's policy in the Middle East and wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The White House said it was confident about security precautions for Bush's visit Monday despite police warnings of an increased threat of attack by al-Qaida-linked groups." Bush "was to spend just six hours in Indonesia, most of it at Bogor Palace, a presidential retreat outside the capital of Jakarta and far from the scene of protests Sunday where Bush was denounced as a 'war criminal' and 'terrorist.'"

ABC World News (11/19, lead story, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) reported on the "massive street protest and mounting terror threats that await…Bush as he heads to Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim country. It's the next stop on his week-long Asia trip, a visit deemed so dangerous, the President won't even spend the night." ABC (Raddatz) added, "The demonstrations have been widespread and personal. Wanted, George Bush, dead or alive, for crimes against humanity and the planet. With tens of thousands more protesters chanting 'America, America, terrorist, terrorist.' … In recent days, warnings for an Al Qaeda-linked attack have increased dramatically, which security officials are taking deadly seriously, given the hundreds who have already been killed in attacks there."

The Washington Times (11/20, Curl, 88K) reports, "Despite the protests in Jakarta, the United States is viewed positively by many Indonesians for its swift response to the tsunami that struck the islands nearly two years ago, killing 100,000. Almost 60 percent of Indonesians surveyed nationwide said that American assistance made them favorable to the United States, according to Terror Free Tomorrow, a nonpartisan group that includes Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, as an adviser."

DOJ_NMG_0096359

More Commentary. Author Sadanand Dhurme writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/20, A16, 2.04M) that when Bush "arrives in Indonesia today, he'll find perhaps the most dramatic reversal of fortunes in recent times," because today, Indonesia "is viewed as a sort of Southeast Asian Bangladesh: a cesspool of corruption, buffeted alternately by terrorist violence and natural disasters." Yet Indonesia "also presents an exceptional opportunity," as it is the "only major Muslim country where modernity stands a fighting chance, or to put it starkly, where the options are not between bad and worse, but between good and bad." Indonesia "boasts advantages that others lack: an innate tolerance bequeathed to its people by nearly a millennium and a half of Hindu-Buddhism." It "won't be easy," with "homegrown Islamists and their wealthy Arab patrons," but "simple certitudes of Islamism…deeply appeal to many," and add to "this the peculiar subculture of Western academia and NGOs, whose efforts to inoculate themselves against that mysterious new ailment, Islamophobia."

IAEA Meets To Considers Iran Request For Nuclear Aid. As the IAEA prepares to meet Monday in Vienna, the AP (11/20, Jahn) reports that a "Western push to deny Iran technical help in building a plutonium-producing reactor has gathered enough support to be approved," diplomats said Sunday. However, "differences both within the Western camp and more broadly among different factions…on how harshly to punish Iran for its nuclear defiance persisted on the eve of the opening meeting Monday, said the diplomats." The AP notes that "normally, the United States takes the lead in demanding tough action against Tehran…But with council agreement on sanctions mired down because of Russian and Chinese efforts to block tough punishment, diplomats said the Americans have taken a back seat to France."

In a front page article, the New York Times (11/20, A1, Broad, 1.16M) reports that Iran is seeking "technical aid" to assist with its building of "a heavy-water nuclear reactor" in Arak that Tehran says will produce "radioactive isotopes for medical treatments. As an unavoidable byproduct, it will also make plutonium." The Times notes that although assistance is "routinely granted," the US and its allies "say the agency should deny Iran's request. Helping make Arak's operations safe, they say, would only speed the reactor's completion -- and Iran's emergence as a nuclear power. But some developing nations say that a rebuff to the Iranians would set a bad precedent that could threaten their own peaceful atomic pursuits."

State Department Opens Office In Dubai To Monitor Iran. Under the headline "US Sets Up A Perch In Dubai To Keep An Eye On Iran," the New York Times (11/20, A3, Fattah, 1.16M) reports that "a group of State Department officials has been setting up offices" in Dubai "as part of an ambitious effort by the United States to better monitor Iran and encourage political change there." The Times notes that the State Dept. announced early this year that it would open the office in Dubai and set up an Iran desk in Washington "to make contact with Iranians and improve its institutional knowledge of the country at a time when tensions over Iran's nuclear ambitions are high." Dubai was selected due to its "large community of Iranian businesspeople" and because the UAE has "become a nexus of political activity concerning Iran, as numerous governments and groups have seized on the country's location and its longstanding ties with Tehran to get a better understanding of Iran and its people." On Friday, Undersecretary Burns "said the Dubai office was created in the spirit of the Riga station in Latvia, which became a critical source of knowledge about the Soviet Union at a time when the United States did not have diplomatic relations with Moscow." Burns noted that when Secretary Rice joined the department last year "it had only two people working on Iran issues," and "today eight are assigned to the Iran desk in Washington and six in the Dubai office, which is within the American consulate."

"Hard-Line Cleric" Leading Candidate To Become Top Ayatollah. The Washington Times (11/20, Freeman, 88K) reports, "A hard-line cleric who opposes all dialogue with the West is a leading contender to become Iran's next supreme spiritual leader." In "a move that would push the country even further into the diplomatic wilderness," Ayatollah Mohammad Taghi Mesbah-Yazdi," who publicly backs the use of suicide bombers against Israel, is campaigning to succeed Grand Ayatollah Ali Khameini, 67, as the head of the Islamic state." The Times adds, "Considered an extremist even by fellow mullahs, he was a fringe figure in Iran's theocracy until last year's election of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a fellow fundamentalist who views him as his ideological mentor. He is known to many Iranians as 'Professor Crocodile' because of a notorious cartoon that depicted him weeping false tears over the imprisoning of a reformist journalist."

DOJ_NMG_0096360

Palestinians Form Human Shields To Prevent Israeli Air Strikes. ABC World News (11/19, story 5, 2:00, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Hundreds of civilians risk their lives today in the Palestinian territories. They were trying out a new tactic, acting as human shields in the face of threatened Israeli air strikes. Israeli warplanes have destroyed 15 homes of suspected militants in the Gaza Strip over the last 3 days. But as ABC's Wilf Dinnick reports, today, they were forced to hold off." ABC (Dinnick) added, "They came to the house by the dozens, filling the rooms and crowing the roof. Creating a human shield to protect the home of this man, Mahmoud Baroud, who is part of a militant group known to fire rockets at Israel. Last night Baroud got a call from the Israeli army, a 30-minute warning before an air strike would destroy his home. He ran to his roof, called for help and hundreds came." Although "Israeli army officials will not say whether" the shields "have forced them to change their tactics," they do "admit it is a worrisome development."

The New York Times (11/20, A8, Fisher, 1.16M) reports "Palestinians celebrated" the tactic "as a possibly potent new defense against air raids that Israel might find difficult to counter." Prime Minister Ismail Haniya said Sunday, "We are so proud of this national stand. It's the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children." The AP (11/20, El Deeb) says the shields also "forced Israel to…re-evaluate a mainstay of its aerial campaign in Gaza." The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Boudreaux, Alouf, 850K) reports Israel said that "it had called off a planned aerial bombardment of a Palestinian militant's home after about 200 of his supporters, in a new defensive tactic, rushed to form a human shield around the residence. The mass mobilization in the Gaza Strip is believed to be the first employed by Palestinians to prevent an Israeli air strike." The AP (11/20, El Deeb) and Washington Times (11/20, El Deeb, 88K) also report the story.

Olmert Criticizes UN Resolution On Gaza Air Strike. AFP (11/20) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Sunday criticized a UN General Assembly resolution passed Friday calling for a fact-finding mission to probe an Israeli artillery strike that killed 19 Palestinians this month. During his weekly cabinet meeting, Olmert said, "We have no doubt that it is the State of Israel which must respond to attacks on civilians. We have expressed our deepest regret over this. But those who preach morality and roll their eyes have yet to see fit to initiate a resolution in condemnation of those who are shooting with the goal of hitting civilians as a long-range, systematic policy."

Nasrallah Calls For Protests Against Beirut. The New York Times (11/20, A8, Bakri, Slackman, 1.16M) reports Hezbollah leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, "pressed his case for bringing down Lebanon's government in a message broadcast Sunday, once again calling for peaceful demonstrations to topple what he described as an 'illegitimate and unconstitutional' government controlled by Washington." According to the Times, Nasrallah used his appearance on Al Manar television "to try to win political support by playing to the deep resentment many Lebanese harbor against the United States for having refused to press for an early end to Israel's war with Hezbollah." Sheik Nasrallah sought to characterize his goals in purely domestic terms, insisting that Hezbollah was not doing the bidding of Iran or Syria — as his opponents have charged." The AP (11/20, Dakroub) also reports the story.

India Test-Fires Missile. The New York Times/AP (11/20, Press) reports that on Sunday, India "successfully test-fired a medium-range missile capable of carrying nuclear warheads days after its rival, Pakistan, had launched a similar missile." The Indian missile, "called the Prithvi," was "fired into the Bay of Bengal from a test range in Chandipur in the eastern state of Orissa." The missile test Sunday was "routine" and "part of the country's air defense exercises," and a Pakistan Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, said Sunday that India "had informed Pakistan ahead of time, as is its standard procedure."

Blair, Musharraf Meet, Strengthen Ties. The New York Times (11/20, Masood, 1.16M) reports, "Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan agreed Sunday to strengthen their nations' cooperation on counterterrorism and other fields, and they stressed the need for political and economic measures along with the use of military force to bring peace in Afghanistan." Blair said relations between Pakistan and Britain were at "their highest point." General Musharraf "brushed off criticism from Afghanistan and the West that Pakistan was not doing enough to curb cross-border infiltration by fighters linked to the Taliban, Afghanistan's ousted rulers," while Blair said "more work needed to be done." Blair's visit included an "assistance package intended to revamp the country's religious schools," a "long-term partnership arrangement to reduce poverty and help Pakistan achieve United Nations goals for development, and both "agreed to increase cooperation between their intelligence services to combat terrorism, illegal immigration and transnational organized crime." Britain also "plans to deliver two MI-17 helicopters in April to the Pakistani antinarcotics force for their antismuggling operation along the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan." During his visit, Blair also "met with Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz and with moderate Islamic religious leaders and went to the Faisal Mosque."

DOJ_NMG_0096361

Somali Ambush Kills Six Ethiopians. The New York Times/AP (11/20, Press) reports, "Islamic fighters ambushed an Ethiopian military convoy on Sunday, killing six Ethiopian soldiers and wounding 20 others, witnesses said, in the first known fight between the rival forces maneuvering for control in Somalia." Land mines destroyed two Ethiopian trucks before Islamic fighters "opened fire on the convoy…made up of more than 80 vehicles and headed for Baidoa," which is the headquarters of the so-called transitional government. Sheik Abdirahim Ali Mudey, a spokesman for the Islamic Courts Union, which controls Mogadishu, and most of southern Somalia, said "four Ethiopian trucks were destroyed and some soldiers were killed, but he denied that his group was responsible," and said the fighting was "'a popular uprising' by villagers opposed to Ethiopian troops in Somalia."

Somalia A Rising Hotbed Of Islamic Extremism. Time (11/27, Dealey, 4.03M) runs a story on Somalia called "Terror's Playground," saying that now that the Islamic Courts Union militias "have consolidated their claim to Mogadishu and expanded their control to include most of Somalia," the fear is that the country, "with nearly 9 million Muslims and one that the U.S. has long suspected is a haven for al-Qaeda, may fall further into the hands of Islamic fundamentalists sympathetic to terrorist organizations."

Pope Has Become Unexpected Critic Of Islamic Violence. Time (11/27, Van Biema, Israely, 4.03M) runs a 3,500-word cover story on Pope Benedict XVI and Islam, saying that when the Pope travels to Turkey next week, he will arrive carrying the reputation "of a hard-knuckle intellect with a taste for blunt talk and interreligious confrontation. Just 19 months into his tenure, the Pope has become as much a moral lightning rod as a theologian; suddenly, when he speaks, the whole world listens. And so what takes place over four days in three Turkish cities has the potential to define his papacy -- and a good deal more. Few people saw this coming." He "was expected to sustain John Paul's conservative line," but "this year he has emerged as a far more compelling and complex figure than anyone had imagined. And much of that has to do with his willingness to confront what some people feel is today's equivalent of the communist scourge -- the threat of Islamic violence." Also in Time, First Things editor Father Richard John Neuhaus writes about "What The Pope Gets Right" on Islam, while Oxford's Tariq Ramadan considers "Where He's Still In The Dark."

Sudanese Military Attacks North Darfur. The AP (11/20, De Montesquiou) reports, "A large force of Sudanese soldiers backed by allied janjaweed militiamen is sweeping through North Darfur, killing civilians and looting and burning villages in violation of a cease-fire agreement, international observers and rebels said Sunday." At least four civilians "were killed near the northern town of Birmaza on Sunday," and "200 pro-government janjaweed fighters riding camels had moved into the zone, backed by mobile army units and the Sudanese air force." The African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur said "it had received reports that the Sudanese air force twice bombed Birmaza this week," and the attacks were a "flagrant violation" of the Darfur Peace Agreement. Earlier this week, the army "denied it was conducting an offensive in North Darfur, and categorically denied it was using the janjaweed to attack civilians." On Saturday, UN chief of humanitarian affairs Jan Egeland said "he had been barred by Sudanese authorities from visiting several of the areas where fighting is now reported." Sudan's government has rejected the UN Security Council resolution, but this week "appeared to accept a compromise in which a mixed U.N.-AU force would take over."

Nicaragua's Anti-Abortion Law Becomes Stricter. The New York Times (11/20, McKinley, 1.16M) reports, "Hopes among women's groups in Nicaragua that President Enrique Bolaños would stop one of the most restrictive abortion laws in Latin America from taking effect have been dashed, as the president signed it into law late Friday." The new law "strikes out a clause that made it possible for a woman to obtain an abortion legally when three doctors certified that unless she did, her own life would be in danger." It was the "the fruit of the recent presidential election, as conservatives saw a chance to gain its passage in Parliament during the election season." For months, the proposed law "has drawn fierce criticism from several local women's groups, the country's association of gynecologists, the United Nations, the World Health Organization and Human Rights Watch, among others."

DOJ_NMG_0096362

Exiled KGB Operative Poisoned In Britain.

The New York Times (11/20, Cowell, 1.16M) reports that on Sunday, the British police said "they were investigating the suspected poisoning of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a Russian former K.G.B. operative living in exile in Britain who had been inquiring into the killing of a journalist in Moscow last month." The Sunday Times of London said "the former agent had met Nov. 1 with an Italian contact identified only as Mario in a central London sushi bar," and last week, Litvinenko "told reporters he began to feel sick within hours of the meeting with Mario." John Henry, a clinical toxicologist who has been treating Litvinenko, told the BBC, "He's got a prospect of recovering. He's a got a prospect of dying." He also identified the poison as "thallium, a toxic metal used in rat poison and insecticides." Friend Alex Goldfarb, said Litvinenko is "one of the top public enemies of the Russian F.S.B. and of Putin, particularly because of his book," and that he belonged to "the so-called London émigré circle, which was branded by Russia as a terrorist cell on British soil." Russian authorities had "no immediate comment on suggestions in news reports that the Russian secret service had poisoned Mr. Litvinenko, who is hospitalized and seriously ill, because he had criticized former colleagues and President Vladimir V. Putin."

The Washington Post (11/20, Jordan, 690K) reports that British police "have placed him under protective guard at a London hospital." Goldfarb said that "precious time was wasted because even though Litvinenko thought he had been poisoned immediately after the lunch meeting, doctors did not become alarmed until nearly two weeks later, when his hair started falling out as his condition worsened." He added, "What happened here is an assassination attempt perpetuated by Russian agents. I thought he would be safe here on British soil."

ABC World News (11/19, story 6, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "ABC correspondent Mike Lee added that Goldfarb said, "He looks terrible. He looks like a ghost, actually. He lost all his hair. He hasn't eaten for 18 days." Lee: "He has accused his former bosses in Russia's intelligence service of murder. His friends say this is payback. One question leads to another. Why use a slow-acting poison that would give your target time to get medical help? Why not just stab him with your umbrella and dump him in the river like proper spies used to do? And who might have approved of his death? That's where it gets really intriguing."

G-20 Membership Divided On Energy Policy.

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A6, Brown, 2.04M) reports, "A two-day annual meeting of the Group of 20 finance ministers and central bankers accepted that rising global demand for energy and minerals will threaten to spark higher inflation. Underscoring the challenges faced by policy makers, an International Energy Agency paper presented to the meeting projected energy demand will grow 50% in the next 25 years." But "[t]he issues of carbon taxes and greenhouse-gas emissions bedeviled attempts to reach a strategy for reining in demand and stabilizing prices. A push by some countries such as Russia, France and India to embrace nuclear power as a way to diversify energy consumption and reduce climate-changing emissions was another topic that split the G-20 membership." The Journal adds, "U.S. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt said that in the wake of higher prices, oil-producing countries needed to avoid supply disruptions and adopt investment codes that reflect best practices around the world."

Mexican Economic Policies Said To Cripple Energy Industry.

The Washington Times (11/20, Mihailescu, 88K) reports, "Mexico, the No. 2 U.S. supplier of oil, is unable to produce enough to meet the demands of its customers, especially its neighbor to the north, because of outdated national economic policies that have hamstrung its oil and gas exploration and production, analysts say. ... Although Mexico has the potential to be an energy powerhouse, the country's national oil company, Pemex, lacks the investment funds to improve production in mature fields." The Times adds, "Although Canada plans to boost production, it cannot make up for the shortfall caused by Mexico's export decline. The shortfall will force the United States to seek alternative suppliers, which will likely increase prices, according to analysts."

DOJ_NMG_0096363

Ban Starts UN Administration Hiring Process. The Washington Times (11/20, Pisik, 88K) reports, "The jockeying for top jobs in a new U.N. administration has begun in earnest with the arrival in New York of incoming Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon," as "senior management in some departments will be replaced for the first time in a decade or more, forcing longtime staffers out of their sinecures" and giving Ban "an opportunity to remake the organization to his liking." Ban arrived at the United Nations on Thursday, and is "is expected to spend most of the next six weeks in New York, except for brief trips back to Seoul and at least one visit to Washington." He is also "expected to announce his senior staff appointments -- including a chief of staff and deputy secretary-general -- shortly after he is sworn in as the eighth U.N. secretary-general on Dec. 14. He takes full charge of the organization on Jan. 1." Departing Secretary-General Kofi Annan has "refused to approve long-term contracts for most senior management," leaving Ban "a free hand to select his own heads of major departments."

Prime Minister Calls For Kosovar Independence. In the Wall Street Journal (11/20, 2.04M) Kosovo's Prime Minister Agim Ceku writes in an op-ed that Kosovo is "ready for independence, and now is not the time to stop the clock." There are "two things we must do in Kosovo to succeed as a progressive and a modern independent state. First, we should further improve our institutions to achieve more transparency and a functioning legal system. Second, we need a broad political commitment to development and modernization." Independence "is only the first step and, in itself, is insufficient to provide for Kosovo's future." Kosovo could survive as Ceku's government "has adopted a proactive '3E' plan for Kosovo based on energy, economy and education." Kosovo "can in a few years become a net electricity exporter, with large deposits of coal." Also, "with the right technology we can even do this with an environmental face." Now is not the time to "lose sight" of the EU's "strategic goal" which is "a Europe whole and free."

WPost Says Japan Should Worry About Decreasing Population. The Washington Post (11/20, A17, Fred Hiatt, 690K) writes in an op-ed column, "Japan has embarked on a path no developed nation has ever followed -- of sustained and inexorable population decline." Japan "shrank by about 21,000 last year, and "is in the forefront, and so everyone else will be watching." Hitoshi Suzuki, "a cheerful senior researcher" at Daiwa Institute of Research, "pronounces himself 'not so worried' and last year, he wrote "Population Decline is Not Something We Need to Fear." For a population "to hold steady, every woman must give birth on average to 2.1 children," and Japan clocked in at 1.25 last year. As a result, Japan's population, "now about 128 million, is expected to fall to about 100 million by mid-century," but "in truth," Japan "doesn't seem to want to change as it would have to in order to increase the birthrate."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Army Gives Rumsfeld Doctrine A Rewrite."
"Oases In Navajo Desert Contained 'A Witch's brew'."
"Single-Sex Classes On A Forward Course."
"9/11 Prisoner Abuse Suit Could Be Landmark."
"Tension Among South Korea's Masseurs."
"Exiting Under A Cloud, With $175 Million."

USA Today:

"Food Banks Have Less To Work With As They Try To Meet Holiday Demand."
"Young People Struggle To Deal With Kiss Of Debt."
"Motorists Face New Costs For Highways."

New York Times:

"Schools Slow In Closing Gaps Between Races."
"Cycle Of Revenge Fuels A Pattern Of Iraqi Killings."
"As Iran Seeks Aid, Atom Agency Faces Quandary."
"A New Strategy To Discourage Driving Drunk."
"Evicted From A Blighted Street, Newark's Mayor Finds Another."
"The Kid With All The News About The TV News."

Washington Post:

"The Meaning Of Work."
"Democrats To Push Pocketbook Issues."
"Embittered Insiders Turn Against Bush."
"Kremlin Inc. Widening Control Over Industry."
"In Competitive Marketplace, Asian Egg Donors in Demand."
"Padilla Case Raises Questions About Tactics."
"For McLean Chamber Group, Tysons Tunnel Dream Endures."

Washington Times:

"Marshals Kept Off Plane At Reagan."

DOJ_NMG_0096364

"Rebuilding in Iraq Tops 4,000 Projects."
"U.N. Job Seekers get Chance To Impress."
"Bush Protesters Gather In Jakarta."
"For Web Sites, A Reason To give Thanks."

Detroit Free Press:
"Fans Flock To Church To Bid U-M's Bo Farewell."
"Ex-Convict Is Charged In 5 Shootings."
"Aggressive Cuts Take Fight To Big Rivals Wal-Mart Swings Low."
"Strapped Schools Give Proposal 5 Wistful Look."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Aquarium Pumps Up Bottom Lines."
"Scores On Test A Bonus For Hall."
"Their Siblings' Keepers."
"Syria Offers To Help Build Stability In Iraq."

Houston Chronicle:
"Leftist Makes High-Stakes Bet In Mexico."
"Sectarian Violence Kills 715 In 8 Days."
"Newspaper Operators To Team Up With Yahoo."
"Foiling The Copper Crooks."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush Protest-Indonesia; Iraq War-Analysis; Hostage Situation-Iraq; The Contractor-Iraq; Human Shields-Gaza Strip; Former Russian Spy Poisoned-London; Young People's Debt; Millionaire Secret Santa.
CBS: Preempted By Football.
NBC: Preempted By Football.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Indonesia-Bush Protestors; Air Force One-Tire Problem; Iraq-Troop Levels Debate; College Presidents-Salaries; Romney-Gay Marriage; German Chancellor-Meeting With Silent German Intelligence Agents; Weekend Box Office.
CBS: Indonesia-Bush Protestors; Air Force One-Tire Problem; Iraq- Kissinger; Syria's Foreign Minister-Iraq; Iraq-McCain; Iraq-Webb; Rangel-Draft Renewal; Congress-Democratic Agenda; London-Former KGB Operative Poisoned; Weekend Box Office.
NPR: Indonesia-Bush Protestors; Bush-APEC Summit; Meeting Of Canada's South Korean Ambassador With North Koreans; Iraq-Kissinger; Iraq-McCain; Iraq-Levin; Blair-Afghanistan, Pakistan Visits; Rangel-Draft Renewal; Colon Cancer-Initiating Cell Discovery; Merger-Copper Companies.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Tours the Ho Chi Minh City Securities Trading Center; participates in a roundtable discussion with business leaders, Ho Chi Minh City Trading Center; tours the Pasteur Institute and briefing on HIV-AIDS and Avian flu, Pasteur Institute, Ho Chi Minh City; visits the Ho Chi Minh City History Museum; meets with the President of Indonesia. Bogor, Indonesia; participates in an education event, Bogor Palace; holds joint media availability with the President of Indonesia, Bogor Palace; participates in roundtable with civic leaders, Bogor Palace; attends dinner with the President of Indonesia. Bogor Palace.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: AMERICAN ACADEMY OF RELIGION _ The American Academy of Religion holds its 2006 annual meeting. Highlights: 11:30 a.m. Plenary Address, ``An Interview with Madeleine Albright," former Secretary of State. Location: Washington Convention Center.

HOLOCAUST MUSEUM-DARFUR _ The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum will project building-sized images of the genocide in Darfur onto the Museums exterior walls to make a dramatic statement about the need for action in Darfur. Highlights: 6:30 a.m. U.S. Special Envoy to Sudan, Andrew Natsios, will speak about the crisis. Other speakers include a Darfurian refugee, a survivor of the Rwandan genocide and a Holocaust survivor. Location: United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 100 Raoul Wallenberg Place SW.

DARFUR _ 10 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Brookings-Bern Project on Internal Displacement hosts two senior officials, Jean-Marie Guehenno, under secretary-general for Peacekeeping at the United Nations; and Andrew Natsios, U.S. presidential special envoy for Sudan, for a discussion on new initiatives being pursued to address the deteriorating situation in Darfur. Carlos Pascual, vice president and director of Foreign Policy Studies, will moderate the discussion, and Roberta Cohen, senior fellow and adviser to the Brookings-Bern Project on Internal Displacement, will give introductory remarks. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0096365

POST-ELECTION POLICIES _ 10 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a panel of AEI experts, who will discuss, ``What Lies Beneath? U.S. Foreign and Domestic Policy after the 2006 Elections." Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12t Floor, AEI 1150 17th St, NW.

MILITARY TRAINING _ 11 a.m. Dr. Paul Mayberry, Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Readiness will brief on Department of Defense training transformation. He will be joined via DVIDS by MG Jason Kamiya and BG Joe Votel from Ft Bragg, N.C. They will provide information on a Mission Readiness Exercise to train U.S., Afghan and International Security Assistance Forces (ISAF) rotating into Afghanistan in January 2007. MG Kamiya was the former commander of coalition forces in Afghanistan until spring 2006 and is currently the Director, Joint Training and commander of the Joint Warfighting Center. BG Votel is the Deputy Commanding General 82nd Airborne Division. Location: DOD Breifing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

RUSSIA-ENERGY _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institutes Center for Global Liberty and Prosperity hosts a policy forum, ``Russian Energy Policy and the New Russian State." Participants are: Robert Amsterdam, attorney for Mikhail Khodorkovsky, and Andrei Illarionov, former economic adviser to President Putin and Senior Fellow, Center for Global Liberty and Prosperity, Cato Institute. Location: Cato Institute, 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

MIDEAST-DEMOCRACY? _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Hudson Institute hosts a panel of Middle-East experts who will discuss whether conditions in the contemporary Middle East are suitable for establishing Western-style political democracies. They also will assess whether the United States should make democracy promotion a core goal of its policy in the region or instead pursue more modest reforms to expand peoples' civil rights even under largely authoritarian governments. Location: Hudson Institute, Betsy and Walter Stern Conference Center, 1015 15th St. NW, sixth floor.

HEALTH REFORM _ 12:15 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform sponsor a luncheon briefing to discuss how many states have moved forward to reduce the rising number of uninsured. This briefing will focus particularly on such efforts in three states Massachusetts, Vermont and Utah. Panelists are: Amy Lischko from the Massachusetts Executive Office of Health and Human Services; Jim Leddy, a Vermont state senator; Norm Thurston, policy analyst with the Utah Department of Public Health; and Alice Burton of AcademyHealths State Coverage Initiatives. Ed Howard of the Alliance and Anne Gauthier of Commonwealth will moderate. Location: Columbus Club, Union Station.

BOLIVIA _ 12:30 p.m. George Washington University sponsors a lecture with Bolivian Ambassador Gustavo Guzman on his nation's cultural and democratic revolution. Location: Room 602, 1957 E. St. NW.

ARMSTRONG-ISLAM _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. Karen Armstrong, author, speaker, teacher and media commentator on religious affairs in the U.S. and England, will launch the Mosaic Foundation's new lecture series ``Re- Discovering the Arab World." Her lecture is titled ``Islam: The Misunderstood Religion." Location: National Press Club, Ballroom.

GOVERNANCE INDICATORS _ 12:30 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. The Center for International Private Enterprise sponsors a roundtable discussion on ``Uses and Abuses of Governance Indicators," with Dr. Charles Oman, senior economist, OECD Development Centre. Location: Center for International Private Enterprise, Suite 700, Madison Building, 1155 15th St. NW.

SMITH-ABORTION _ 2 p.m. Congressman Chris Smith, R-NJ, holds a news conference to call on Amnesty International to resist pressure to support the pro-abortion position. With Deidre McQuade, director, Planning and Information, Pro-Life Secretariat of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops; and Kristen Day, executive director, Democrats for Life. Location: Room 2216, Rayburn.

COMMERCE-PRATT & WHITNEY _ 4 p.m. The Secretary of Commerce delivers brief remarks at the Pratt Whitney Engines signing ceremony. Location: Department of Commerce.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0096366

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Lame Duck Session Will Not Act On Domestic Surveillance Program ... 3
Open-Ended Detentions Could Be Barred ... 3
Legal Ambiguity Seen As Inducement To Develop "Truth Serum." ... 3

Homeland Response:
Federal Air Marshals Kept Off Flight At National Airport ... 3
AFGE Will Lobby Congress To Unionize Airport Screeners ... 3
International Travelers Rate US Entry System "World's Worst." ... 3

War News:
Pentagon Group Outlines Three Options For Iraq ... 4
Pentagon Says "Minor Miracle" Of Reconstruction Under Way In Iraq ... 4
Kissinger Says Military Victory In Iraq Not Possible ... 4
McCain, Graham Call For Additional US Troops In Iraq ... 6
Rangel Proposes Bringing Back The Draft ... 7
Critics Say Rice Bears Much Responsibility For Iraq "Mess." ... 7
Critic Of Invasion Could Be Next US Ambassador To Iraq ... 8
Cycles Of Revenge Seen As Fueling Violence In Iraq ... 8
Hostage Search Continues ... 8
Human Rights Watch Says Saddam's Trial Was Flawed ... 9
General Odierno Discusses Return To Iraq ... 9
Iraqis Describe Mixed Feelings About US ... 9
Afghan Army Will Attack Taliban In Winter ... 10

Corporate Scandals:
State Bar Associations Fighting Back Against Privilege Waivers 10
SEC Formally Inquires About Ford Earnings Disclosures ... 11
SEC Says Most Restatements Due To Accounting Mistakes ... 11
KB Home's CEO Leaves Amid Options Probe With $175 Million Compensation Package ... 11

Criminal Law:
HUD Probes Allegations Against NASA Official ... 12
Maryland Mall Shooting Under Investigation ... 12
NYTimes Columnist Decries Sexual Abuse Of Children ... 12

Civil Rights:
Riot Retrospective Seeks To Increase Understanding Of Civil Rights Struggle ... 13
Airline Employee's Treatment Of Nursing Mother Sparks National Protest ... 13
McCain Says Supreme Court Should Overturn Roe ... 13
Romney Makes Effort To Place Gay Marriage Ban Onto Ballot.. 14
Advocates See Chance For Revival Of Gays In Military Debate 14

Antitrust:
Freeport To Buy Phelps In Copper Merger ... 14
Blackstone Near Deal To Buy Equity Officer Properties ... 14
US Airways Head Faces Daunting Management Challenge ... 15
Final Putnam Bids Due Before Thanksgiving ... 15
Philadelphia Exchange Chief Urges Close Scrutiny Of CME-CBOT Merger ... 16

Environment:
NYTimes Warns Deforestation Will Cause Climate Problems ... 16
WPost Calls Responsible Fisheries Management Crucial ... 16
WPost Praises DC Bill Establishing "Green" Building Requirements ... 16

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Investigation Of Online Prescription Drug Operation ... 17
27 Indicted, $15.7 Million Worth Of Drugs Seized In Mississippi Investigation ... 17
NFL To Keep Drug Program Agents Until End Of Season ... 17
Opium Poppy Crop Destroyed In Colombia, Elimination Of Industrial Plantations Declared ... 17

Immigration:
NYTimes Says Urges Attention To Immigration Reform ... 18

Tax:
IRS Advisory Committee Seeks Tax Payments From Online Auctioneers ... 18
LATimes Calls For Overhaul Of Federal Tax Code ... 18

Congress-Administration:
Levin Undecided On Gates Confirmation ... 18
Cheney Praises Olson For Bush v. Gore Performance ... 19
Hoyer Seeks Assurance From Pelosi That Backers Won't Face Retaliation ... 19
House GOP Sticks With Leadership Team Of Boehner, Blunt ... 19
Remains Of "Gang Of 14" May Play Role In 110th Congress ... 20

In Face Of "Rumors," Lindsey Warns Bush Against Tax Increase Deal ... 20
Reid Says Prospect Of Cheney Presidency Means No Bush Impeachment ... 20
Paulson To Deliver Address On US Capital Market Competitiveness ... 21
Official's Role In Bush Effort To Promote Marriage Examined ... 21
Florida 13th CD Race Could End Up Before House Administration Committee ... 21
Novak Says Senate Dissenters Block Pork ... 21
Public Gets First Glimpses Of New Justices ... 22
DISA Leads Federal Government In Embracing Telecommuting 22
Gerberding "Under Attack" Over CDC's Difficulties ... 22
Mint To Unveil Presidential Dollar Coin Series ... 22
WSJournal Says FDA's Approval Of Breast Implants Is Good News ... 23
Chances Of Congressional Reform Already Said To Be Fading. 23

Other News:

Incomes Rising At Highest Pace Since 1990s ... 23
Drug Industry Begins Courting Democrats ... 23
McCain Leads Early Odds For 2008 GOP Nomination ... 23
Kerry Says "Botched" Iraq Joke Won't Affect Presidential Run ... 23
Gingrich Won't Make Decision On 2008 Until September ... 24
Obama Seen As Main Impediment To Clinton Presidential Nomination ... 24
Dean Addresses Gay Leadership Conference ... 24
Foley Ends Stay At Rehabilitation Facility ... 25
Four Defeated GOP Lawmakers Live On Same D Street Block . 25
Food Banks Falling Behind Demand For Holiday Assistance ... 25
Studies Find Minority Test Performance Gap Persists ... 25
States Struggle To Fund Transportation Needs ... 25
Allen's "Macaca" Gaffe Seen As Worst Self-Inflicted Wound Of 2006 ... 25
MSNBC Gives Greater Emphasis To Politics, Opinion ... 26
WSJournal Says AHI Can Improve ... 26
NYTimes Urges New York Officials To Use Public Transportation ... 26
APEC Statement On North Korea Seen As Falling Short Of US Goal ... 26
Bush Touts Trade As Conducive To Political Freedom ... 27
Bush Defends Religious Freedom In Visit To Vietnamese Church ... 28
Massive Protests Await Bush In Indonesia ... 28
IAEA Meets To Considers Iran Request For Nuclear Aid ... 28
Palestinians Form Human Shields To Prevent Israeli Air Strikes 29
Nasrallah Calls For Protests Against Beirut ... 29
India Test-Fires Missile ... 30
Blair, Musharraf Meet, Strengthen Ties ... 30
Somali Ambush Kills Six Ethiopians ... 30
Pope Has Become Unexpected Critic Of Islamic Violence ... 30
Sudanese Military Attacks North Darfur ... 30
Nicaragua's Anti-Abortion Law Becomes Stricter ... 31
Exiled KGB Operative Poisoned In Britain ... 31
G-20 Membership Divided On Energy Policy ... 31
Mexican Economic Policies Said To Cripple Energy Industry ... 31
Ban Starts UN Administration Hiring Process ... 32
Prime Minister Calls For Kosovar Independence ... 32
WPost Says Japan Should Worry About Decreasing Population 32

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 32

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 33

DOJ_NMG_0096368

TERRORISM NEWS:

Lame Duck Session Will Not Act On Domestic Surveillance Program. US News and World Report (11/27, Halloran) reports, "Republicans who limped back to Washington for a lame duck congressional session last week found a host of marching orders from President Bush, but perhaps none more urgent than this: Before Democrats take control of Congress in January, they must pass legislation authorizing the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program. … The response: deafening silence. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist quickly dispatched aides to put out the word on Bush's request: Not gonna happen." With Democrats "promising oversight hearings next year on how the program was hatched and whom it targets, it appears likely that the issue will be decided in court and, ultimately, the Supreme Court."

Open-Ended Detentions Could Be Barred. The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Serrano, 850K) reports, "Five years after Muslim immigrants were abused in a federal jail here, the guards who beat them and the Washington policymakers who decided to hold them for months without charges are being called to account. Some 1,200 Middle Eastern men were arrested on suspicion of terrorism after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. No holding place was so notorious as Brooklyn's nine-story Metropolitan Detention Center. In a special unit on the top floor, detainees were smashed into walls, repeatedly stripped and searched, and often denied basic legal rights and religious privileges, according to federal investigations." The Bureau of Prisons "disciplined" 13 staffers, firing two of them. The warden retired. In addition, "in what could turn out to be a landmark case, a lawsuit filed by two Brooklyn detainees against top Bush administration officials is moving forward in the federal courts in New York." FBI Director Robert Mueller and former Attorney Gen. John Ashcroft are named in the suit. The Times describes the alleged abuses suffered by the two plaintiffs.

Legal Ambiguity Seen As Inducement To Develop "Truth Serum." The Washington Post (11/20, Brown, 690K) reports, "The debate earlier this year on interrogation techniques in the war on terrorism raised anew a question that goes back at least 2,000 years. Is there something you can give a person that will make him tell the truth? … In the 21st century, however, the answer appears to be: No." The Post notes, "For the record, spokesmen for the Army medical research command, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) and the CIA say there is no work underway on truth serums. Whether such a substance could ever be used legally is a question some legal scholars believe is still open," and "this ambiguous legal status, combined with advances in neuroscience, lead some to suspect there may be a second act for truth serum."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Federal Air Marshals Kept Off Flight At National Airport. The Washington Times (11/20, Hudson, 88K) reports federal air marshals were "prevented from protecting" a Nov. 8 flight departing from Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport "because a gate agent erroneously said they did not have the correct paperwork, say marshals familiar with the incident." Federal Air Marshal Service (FAMS) spokesman Conan Bruce confirmed that "federal air marshals were denied boarding." Sources "told The Washington Times on the condition of anonymity that the gate agent demanded paperwork which is required of other law-enforcement officials, but not from federal air marshals who are on duty to protect the plane from a terrorist attack. … Even the intervention of higher-ups in the Homeland Security Department could not persuade the airline to allow the armed law-enforcement agents aboard, and the plane departed unprotected an hour and a half late, the sources said."

AFGE Will Lobby Congress To Unionize Airport Screeners. USA Today (11/20, 3A, Frank, 2.27M) reports the UN International Labor Organization's recent finding that airport security screeners should have union representation has prompted a plan by the American Federation of Government "to lobby Congress' new Democratic leaders to let TSA screeners unionize. The TSA says unionization could hinder managers from quickly moving screeners to new assignments as security threats arise." International Labor Organization spokesman Hans von Rohland says the finding "reflects that the TSA is not following the United Nations' 'core labor standards,'" and "will encourage Congress to let screeners unionize."

International Travelers Rate US Entry System "World's Worst." The Washington Post (11/20, A15, Hsu, 690K) reports the US travel industry "blames security" for the nation's decline in world popularity. "A plurality of international travelers rated the US visa and immigration entry system the 'world's worst,' according to data released today that was commissioned by a tourism business lobby. Interviews with 2,011 non-U.S. residents who had traveled beyond their home continents in the past 18 months found that 39 percent rated the United States the least traveler-friendly, more than twice the percentage that gave bottom grades to the Middle East (16 percent), Asia (12 percent) or Africa (12 percent)." The Post adds, 'The questions were somewhat self-serving, and researchers drew more than a fifth of the participants from countries with mixed relations with the United States, such as China and Venezuela."

DOJ_NMG_0096369

Noting the survey's findings, the Wall Street Journal (11/20, A4, King, 2.04M) reports that though Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "promised "nearly a year ago to put a friendlier face on the American travel experience," foreign travelers are not "getting that impression." Traveler's "negative experiences appear to be heavily focused on obtaining a visa and then getting past immigration and customs' officials."

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon Group Outlines Three Options For Iraq. The Washington Post (11/20, Ricks, 690K) reports, "The Pentagon's closely guarded review of how to improve the situation in Iraq has outlined three basic options: Send in more troops, shrink the force but stay longer, or pull out, according to senior defense officials. Insiders have dubbed the options 'Go Big,' 'Go Long' and 'Go Home.' The group conducting the review is likely to recommend a combination of a small, short-term increase in US troops and a long-term commitment to stepped-up training and advising of Iraqi forces, the officials said." The military's study, commissioned by Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, "comes at a time when escalating violence is causing Iraq policy to be reconsidered by both the White House and the congressionally chartered, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Pace's effort will feed into the White House review, but military officials have made it clear they are operating independently." The Pentagon group "has given a thumbs-down to what it considered variants of withdrawal, such as pulling US units out of the cities and keeping them in isolated enclaves, where they would not interact with the Iraqi population but would be available to combat major insurgent offensives and also to protect the government against coups."

Bush Appears To Lean Toward "Last Big Push" Option. The Christian Science Monitor (11/20, LaFranchi, 59K) reports, "It's being dubbed by some as the 'last big push' option, and it appears increasingly to be what President Bush favors on Iraq. Despite growing expectations of a troop withdrawal from Iraq in the wake of Democratic gains in Congress, the White House appears to be leaning in a different direction: at least a temporary rise in US troop levels." The numbers "would not be huge, perhaps 20,000 on top of the 144,000 US soldiers already fighting the war." But "the idea would be to stabilize Baghdad -- a priority that has proved dishearteningly elusive since September - and to allow for a major diplomatic push aimed at drawing Iraq's neighbors into resolving the spiraling violence."

Army Rewrites Rumsfeld Doctrine. The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Barnes, 850K) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld may be leaving under a cloud of criticism over his handling of the Iraq war, but his invasion plan -- emphasizing speed over massive troop numbers -- has consistently been held up as a resounding success. Yet with Iraq near chaos 3 1/2 years later, a key Army manual now is being rewritten in a way that rejects the Rumsfeld doctrine and counsels against using it again. The draft version of the Army's Full Spectrum Operations field manual argues that in addition to defeating the enemy, military units must focus on providing security for the population — even during major combat." Rumsfeld and the Pentagon drew criticism, respectively, for dismissing postwar looting and not doing enough postwar planning; "the old manual emphasized that stability operations usually follow combat. The draft version of the 2007 ground operations manual instructs commanders that they cannot wait for offensive operations to end before providing security and services for the population, and stresses a combination of offense, defense and stability operations."

Pentagon Says "Minor Miracle" Of Reconstruction Under Way In Iraq. The Washington Times (11/20, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "When and if the smoke ever clears in Iraq, Pentagon officials say the world finally will see a minor miracle. 'Most Americans don't understand something equivalent to the Marshall Plan has been accomplished in Iraq,' said Dean G. Popps, principal assistant secretary of the Army for acquisitions, logistics and technology. ... Amid constant deadly threats from bloodthirsty insurgents, and without a viable Iraqi private contracting sector, the Army Corps of Engineers has supervised the construction of electric grids, health care centers, schools, water and sewage treatment facilities, police stations, academies and border posts." The positively oriented article notes that inspector general Stuart Bowen "has said fraud involving U.S. money, while serious, is not widespread and that the huge majority of projects proceeded as required."

Kissinger Says Military Victory In Iraq Not Possible. ABC World News (11/19, story 2, 2:00, Morrell, 8.78M) reported, "Henry Kissinger, who helped negotiate the end of the Vietnam war and who more recently had been advising President Bush on Iraq, today said a clear military victory is not possible there." Henry Kissinger, former Secretary of State: "I think we have to redefine the course. But I don't believe that the alternative is between military victory, as it had been defined previously, or total withdrawal."

DOJ_NMG_0096370

ABC added, "Sen. John McCain, who spent more than five years as a prisoner of the North Vietnamese, disagrees. But says we are repeating mistakes made in Vietnam." Sen. John McCain: "The lesson I learned from Vietnam is applicable today. If you're going to do what's necessary to succeed, i.e. the Powell Doctrine, then go ahead and do it. If you're not going to, then don't."

The Financial Times (11/20, Negus, Kirchgaessner) says Kissinger offered a "dire" assessment of the situation in Iraq. Asked if the US-led coalition could win the war, he said, "If you mean by clear military victory an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control...I don't believe that is possible." Kissinger also endorsed the "view that the US should engage Iraq's neighbours in seeking a diplomatic solution," and "reinforced calls by Democratic lawmakers in Washington for the White House to speak to Iran and Syria to help stem the tide of violence in Iraq."

The AP (11/20) also reports Kissinger "presented a bleak vision of Iraq, saying the US government must enter into dialogue with Iraq's regional neighbors -- including Iran -- if progress is to be made in the region." The Washington Post (11/20, 690K) runs a brief report on Kissinger's comments, noting he also "warned against a rapid withdrawal of US-led troops, saying it could destabilize Iraq's neighbors and cause a long-lasting conflict."

Syria Pledges To Help End Iraq Violence, Calls For Timetable On US Withdrawal. The New York Times (11/20, A14, Semple, 1.16M) reports Syria's foreign minister said Sunday during a visit to Baghdad "that his government was prepared to help stabilize Iraq, and he called for a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops, saying that it would help reduce the violence." During the first trip to Baghdad by a senior Syrian official since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem "promised Sunday to cooperate with Iraqi officials in an effort to curb violence." Meanwhile, the Times notes that the Syrian ambassador in Washington said co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, James Baker, "has met several times with Syrian officials to discuss how they might cooperate with the United States."

The Washington Post (11/20, Trejos, 690K) also reports the Syrian official "pledged cooperation in stemming the sectarian violence." Syria and Iraq "have been adversaries since the 1980s, when Syria sided with Iran in its war against Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Moore, 850K) quotes Moallem saying, "We think that the presence of a timetable for withdrawal of foreign troops will assist in reducing the violence and creating security." In a news conference, Moallem "denied suggestions that Syria had been pressured by the United States to meet with Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari." The AP (11/20, Hurst) and USA Today (11/20, 2.27M) run similar reports.

Lawmakers Endorse Talks With Iran And Syria Regarding Iraq. A number of lawmakers from both parties yesterday urged a change in US policy regarding Iraq. Specifically, they urged the Administration to engage Iran and Syria. Democratic Sen. Carl Levin, asked if on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer) if Iran and Syria "should be part of this international conference that you want to see convene to deal with Iraq," said, "Yes, I think so. And not only do I think so; 40 senators thought so when we voted for that about six, seven months ago, that there should be an international conference. I'll predict the Baker-Hamilton commission will propose an international conference. It has to include those countries, whether we like them or not. And we don't."

Sen. John McCain was asked on ABC's This Week (11/19, Stephanopoulos) if he could support "the possibility of engaging Syria and Iran in [a] diplomatic process," McCain responded, "I don't mind engaging them at all. I think we have to understand that we not only have the Iranian nuclear problem, but the Iranians are on the ascendancy if we fail. So it's going to be very difficult to find common interests. Now, maybe long-term, it's in Iran's interests not to see chaos in the region. I don't know. But in the short term, both Iran and Syria do not share the same goals that the United States of America does. And we have to take that in consideration when we have discussions with them."

Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (11/19, Russert) to describe "a real way forward in Iraq," Senator-elect James Webb said, "I was saying, even before we went in, that there were three major issues in the Middle East that had to be addressed. One was the Israeli-Arab situation, the other was terrorism, and the third was Iraq, and that if we lumped them together that we risked having a problem with all three of them. That has happened. … What we need…is a diplomatic approach that will bring the countries in the region to the table so that we can have…diplomatic ownership from the countries that have long-term cultural and historical ties with Iraq. … We need to talk to Iran and Syria. I think it was a great mistake not to, as this moves forward. And that's one thing that I've been encouraged to hear from former Secretary of State Baker that, you know, you need to talk to your enemies as well as your friends. You don't have to give up anything in terms of national concerns, to be talking to them, but it's impossible to resolve the situation now without talking to them."

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer), said, "I, too, have called for a region-wide conference. I think we should bring other countries in that region into this mix because it's not good for any of them to have an eruption or a terrorist haven in Iraq." Asked if the conference should include Iran and Syria, Hutchison responded, "I think that depends on Iran and Syria. I think that, of course, Iran would have to agree to immediately stop making a nuclear weapon because that is a destabilizing force in the region. And certainly, Syria would have to agree to stop aiding and abetting the insurgents and the terrorists that have showed up around the Middle East. So I think it depends on their behavior. If they would be a positive force, I think, of course. But it does take prerequisites."

DOJ_NMG_0096371

Sen. Jon Tester, also on NBC's Meet the Press (11/19, Russert), remarked, "We need to work with our allies within the region. We also need to talk to our enemies and put diplomatic pressure on them. But we also need to visit with our allies around the world to develop a plan to make, to make this war come to some sort of conclusion and get our troops home."

Rep. Steny Hoyer, on ABC's This Week (11/19, Stephanopoulos), said, "We need to reach out to the surrounding states. We need to have bilateral talks with the Syrians and the Iranians. … As Jim Baker has said, if you don't sit down and talk, there's not going to be progress."

Rep. Roy Blunt, on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer), said, "I think we ought to have the right kind of discussions with Iran and Syria. But the worst thing that can happen in Iraq is if we let the future of Iraq be determined by the Syrians, by the Iranians or by the Saudis. They may be very well in a conflict, internally, that they're going to have to solve themselves. But one of the things that we can do is insist that that happen. Maybe that involves discussions with the Syrians and the Iranians. Maybe it doesn't. But what would be a big mistake is to let those neighboring countries come in and have undue influence on what happens for the people of Iraq."

McCain, Graham Call For Additional US Troops In Iraq. During his appearance on ABC's This Week (11/19, Stephanopoulos), Sen. John McCain was asked if it is "currently immoral to keep" US soldiers in Iraq because he believes more troops are necessary to win the war. McCain replied, "Yes, it is. And we've got to ask ourselves some questions. One, are we winning? And I think the answer is no. … Can we still win? Yes, I believe we can. It'll be tough, but we need to do it. And what we need to do is we've got to control the strongholds in Anbar. We've got to hold them with Iraqi and US forces and provide sufficient security. We've got to arrest the momentum of the death squads. We've got to continue training the Iraqi army and American presence in Iraqi units, and put Americans into the police force. Do we have enough troops to do all that? No, we do not." Later in the interview McCain said US soldiers are "fighting and dying for a failed policy."

USA Today (11/20, 2.27M) briefly notes McCain's call for "an overwhelming number of troops to stabilize Iraq or face the possibility of more terrorist attacks -- in the region and on American soil." The AP (11/20, Heilprin) reports McCain, "who spent 5 1/2 years as a prisoner of war after his Navy plane was shot down in 1967, recalled the Vietnam War's lessons. 'We left Vietnam. It was over. We just had to heal the wounds of war,' he said. '"We leave this place, chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict, in my view, a lot more.'" Bloomberg (11/20, Mathewson) also runs an account of McCain's remarks.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, on CBS's Face the Nation (11/19, Schieffer), made a similar point. He said, "It is obvious to me we don't have enough troops in Iraq to provide the security necessary to create a democracy from the ashes of a dictatorship. … I disagree with the idea of keeping the troop levels where they're at now. I think we need an overwhelming presence in Iraq for the short term. You cannot have a democracy where people are getting killed and kidnapped and murdered at the level they are now. So we need more Iraqi troops; we need more American troops. We need to increase the Army and Marine Corps by at least 50,000. … We do not have security in Iraq. The only way you'll ever get a political solution to the differences that exist among the Iraqi people is to control the violence. I am willing to send more American troops to make that happen."

Levin Calls For "Phased Reduction" Of US Troops In Iraq In Four To Six Months. Sen. Carl Levin, on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer), said, "We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction of our troops. Because if you don't do that, they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way. … Four to six months gives them an opportunity to do that if there is an international conference. And one other thing, General Abizaid said that if in the next four to six months, the violence is not put -- if there's not an end put to the violence and if the militias are not put under control, then it is going to be irretrievable. So he himself used a four- to six-months timeframe."

Kristol Predicts Congress May "Pull The Plug" On Iraq In Coming Months. The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (11/19, Wallace), said, "What's striking about Pelosi's endorsement of Murtha is she believes that the duty of the Democratic Congress is to get us out of Iraq. I think that's an honest belief of hers, and of Jack Murtha's. … The conventional wisdom in Washington right now is 'but of course they'll never cut off funds -- that would be politically suicidal, and that's not going to happen.' I don't believe that. Four months from now, if things continue to slide downhill, if the president hasn't adjusted course, if hawks like Senator McCain haven't been satisfied that there's been an increase in troops or that we have a real strategy for victory, I think Nancy Pelosi and the Democratic House will move at some point to enforce timetables and to enforce a funds cutoff. … And if things aren't better four or six months from now, I think we could be looking at a Democratic House and some Republicans who are willing to just pull the plug on Iraq. … If by the State of the Union, things aren't getting better on the ground or there's not a really plausible change of tactics here at home, I am very worried that political support will crumble; not among Democrats, but among Republicans."

DOJ_NMG_0096372

Rangel Proposes Bringing Back The Draft. ABC World News (11/19, story 2, 2:00, Morrell, 8.78M) reported that in an "echo of the Vietnam War," Democratic Rep. Charlie Rangle, "said he would soon introduce legislation that would bring back the draft." Rep. Charlie Rangel: "This President and this Administration, would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if, indeed, we had a draft. And members of the Administration thought their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way." Morrell: "Draft legislation would seem to be dead on arrival on Capitol Hill. The fact that a prominent Democrat such as Charlie Rangel is raising this issue is certain to conjure up a lot of debate on Capitol Hill. Especially if consideration is given to Senator McCain's recommendation, that America increase its troop presence in Iraq."

The AP (11/20, Heilprin) reports Rangel, the incoming House Ways and Means Chairman, says a bill he will propose will mean "Americans would have to sign up for a new military draft after turning 18." Rangel said he "sees his idea as a way to deter politicians from launching wars." Rangel said, "There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the Administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way." Rangel "has said the all-volunteer military disproportionately puts the burden of war on minorities and lower-income families."

Rep. Rangel was asked on CBS's Face the Nation (11/19, Schieffer) if he would "still seriously favor a draft," Rangel replied, "You bet your life. Underscore serious. There's no question in my mind that this President and this Administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way. … I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session. … I don't see how anyone can support the war and not support the draft. I think to do so is hypocritical."

The Washington Post (11/20, A4, Babington, 690K) reports Rangel "said yesterday that he will push to renew the military draft, as lawmakers in both parties sharpened their criticisms of the situation in Iraq and struggled for consensus and solutions." Sen. John McCain "leveled one of his harshest assessments yet, saying U.S. troops are 'fighting and dying for a failed policy.' He renewed his call for more U.S. troops in Iraq and said it is immoral to keep them fighting at the current deployment levels." Sen. Carl Levin "repeated yesterday his view that troop withdrawals must begin within four to six months." The "varying proposals underscored the extent to which key policymakers remain at odds two weeks after voters registered deep discontent over the war and restored Democrats to power in Congress." Rangel "portrayed the draft, suspended since 1973, as a means of spreading military obligations more equitably and prompting political leaders to think twice before starting wars."

The Washington Times (11/20, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Rangel said, "If we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft." Rangel said "his bill, which he will introduce again early next year, would allow Americans turning 18 to choose between several forms of national service, including airport security, or jobs in schools and hospitals." But Sen. Lindsey Graham "said in his own 'Face the Nation' appearance that military conscription was unnecessary."

Critics Say Rice Bears Much Responsibility For Iraq "Mess." US News and World Report (11/27, Ragavan) writes that "three and a half years" after the fall of Baghdad, "the promise of democracy in Iraq seems a cruel joke, and the administration in Washington that launched the invasion seems utterly bereft of clues as to how to sort out the mess." Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation "was intended to signal a change in course on Iraq. But many national security experts say that Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security adviser at the time of the invasion, and the National Security Council share much of the blame for the problems in Iraq." These critics say Rice, with her "ardent support for the invasion," was "unable to play the traditional role of national security adviser-impartial broker in the rough-and-tumble of interagency government. That was further complicated by the fact that Rumsfeld all but ignored the input of other agencies, then never took responsibility for postwar reconstruction, leaving Rice to try to manage the Iraq rebuilding effort from the White House."

"Vietnam Syndrome" Recurring As Iraq War Drags On. Time (11/27, Allen, 4.03M) writes, "Fifteen years ago, in the flush of his Gulf War triumph, President George H.W. Bush crowed to state legislators, 'By God, we've kicked the Vietnam syndrome once and for all.' But now, as Washington's wise men look for a way out of a situation in Iraq, the symptoms of that malady seem to be reappearing." In June, asked if he "saw a parallel between Iraq and Vietnam," the current President Bush "replied curtly, 'No.' But he is now embracing the inevitable, and he answered yes last week when asked roughly the same question at the Sheraton Hanoi. 'One lesson is, is that we tend to want there to be instant success in the world,' he said. 'And the task in Iraq is going to take a while.'"

DOJ_NMG_0096373

"New Course" For Iraq Hard To Pinpoint. US News and World Report (11/27, Mulrine) writes that the midterm elections indicate voters "expect to see a new course in Iraq." But "what course exactly? Washington is buzzing with possibilities-a number of which were swatted down by Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command, in testimony last week before the House and Senate Armed Services committees. The most popular option, a sizable troop withdrawal in the next six months, would inflame sectarian violence, he warned," while "partitioning the country along ethnic-religious lines, he said, is 'not viable' and would create a Sunni state that would be little more than an al Qaeda safe haven."

"Cocky" Iran, Syria Anticipate Larger Say Over Iraq. Newsweek (11/27, Hirsh, Barry, 3.12M) reports that Iran "knows" President Bush is facing "new political pressure from an incoming Democratic Congress to withdraw from Iraq sooner rather than later. Tehran also hears, through the media, that the forthcoming report by the Iraq Study Group…is expected to recommend fuller engagement with Iran and Syria." Newsweek says both Iran and Syria "are clearly feeling cocky. Negotiations to halt Iran's nuclear program remain stalemated, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad declared last week that 'many countries have agreed to live with an Iran that has mastered enrichment.' One key nation that Tehran thinks it can count on is Russia, which wants to protect its huge investments in Iran and is resisting tough sanctions in the U.N. Security Council." As for Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, he is "enjoying the resumption of what Syrian Embassy spokesman Ahmed Salkini calls 'unofficial contacts' from Washington."

Iraq's Impact On 2008 Presidential Hopefuls Considered. Newsweek (11/27, Darman, 3.12M) examines how the Iraq war may impact various potential 2008 presidential candidates. Sen. John McCain "was an early administration ally on Iraq" even while "kibitzing with Republican war critics like Bush 41 national-security adviser Brent Scowcroft." McCain "is that rare Republican with sympathy for both his party's realist and idealist wings." Sen. Hillary Clinton, "from her first hours in the Senate," was "careful to work on her national-security credentials." She has "backed a phased redeployment of troops…and championed engagement with Syria and Iran. But she has yet to offer a comprehensive plan of her own." Sen. Barack Obama's "chief assets as a potential challenger to Clinton: consistency on Iraq." Obama has "resisted taking a strong position on an exit strategy for Iraq." Rudy Giuliani "has tried to shore up his conservative credentials with a vociferous defense" of President Bush's Iraq policy. Gov. Mitt Romney, "more than any other top-tier candidate," can "legitimately claim he's had nothing to do with the mess in Iraq. But as he travels the country selling himself as the strongest potential challenger to McCain, Romney has had to scramble to make up for his lack of foreign-policy bona fides." John Edwards wrote a 2005 op-ed "saying 'I was wrong' and calling for a drawdown in troops and increased engagement with Iraq's neighbors in the Middle East." Edwards now "feels the rest of the party is coming around to his view." Sen. Sam Brownback "has long been an Iraq hawk." And Sen. Joe Biden, the "Democrats' biggest long shot," also "happens to be the author of the party's most comprehensive Iraq plan."

Critic Of Invasion Could Be Next US Ambassador To Iraq. In his Washington Post (11/20, A15, 690K) "Inside The Loop" column, Al Kamen writes that US Ambassador to Pakistan Ryan Crocker, who has also held that post in Kuwait, Lebanon, and Syria, and who was "one of the few people at the legendary Coalition Provisional Authority who actually knew anything about Iraq," could succeed Zalmay Khalilzad as US ambassador in Baghdad. In 2002, Crocker co-wrote to then-Secretary of State Colin Powell "warning of disaster if the United States invaded Iraq. The memo, titled 'The Perfect Storm,' detailed all the things that were likely to explode if the United States took over Iraq -- sectarian violence, a power vacuum, and so on."

Cycles Of Revenge Seen As Fueling Violence In Iraq. The New York Times (11/20, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports, "In a cycle that has been tracked by the American military since May and June, after months of apparently random sectarian violence the pattern has become one of attack and counterattack, with Sunni militants staging what commanders call 'spectacular' strikes and Shiite militias retaliating with abductions and murders of Sunnis. ... General Caldwell said that a recent and intensive series of American raids against Al Qaeda cells, as well as against Shiite militias that have struck back at Sunnis, had seriously damaged some of their networks. But American commanders have made similar claims on several occasions in the course of the war only to have the killing resume later at a higher level. Scores of survivors and witnesses have noted the emerging cycle of revenge in interviews, describing highly personal attacks that involve a bullet in the head far more often than a bomb. In the past eight days, at least 715 Iraqis have been killed or have been found dead, according to The Associated Press." The Times adds, "Iraqis are hardening against one another as the deaths chip away at any remaining trust between the sects and radicalize even larger portions of their fringes."

Hostage Search Continues. ABC World News (11/19, story 3, 1:45, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Now, the latest on a hostage crisis involving four American contractors in Iraq. Today, we learn more about these men who were snatched on Thursday. We have two reports tonight." ABC (Brown) added, "Masked Iraqi police rounded up about 200 men in southern Iraq, today, in a fruitless search for the hostages. But the dragnet was more media circus than anything else. One of their suspects, a double amputee in a wheelchair. Two of the four kidnapped American security guards have now been identified. Jonathan Cote, from Buffalo. And Paul Reuben, from Minnesota. ... The prime suspects are the Shiite militias who have infiltrated the police and the army. As many as 150 people were kidnapped from the Ministry of Higher Education by suspected Shia militiamen in police commando uniform, earlier this week. Today, in retaliation, a suicide bomber in a minibus offered Shiite laborers casual work. When they rushed forward, he blew himself up, killing 22."

DOJ_NMG_0096374

ABC World News (11/19, story 4, 1:50, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "These latest contractors to be kidnapped are among thousands of civilians working in Iraq, doing extremely dangerous jobs for what can be very large paychecks." ABC (Yang) added, "Twenty-three-year-old Jonathan Cote spent four years in the 82nd Airborne Division. He survived mortar attacks and other dangers in Afghanistan and Iraq. Back home, Cote joined a private security company and went back to Iraq. Tonight, he's a hostage. One of the approximately 80,000 civilian contractors working in Iraq. It's a dangerous job. There are concerns that private companies aren't doing enough to protect their employees in the war zone." Jeff Beatty, President, www.totalsecurity.us: "More of that has to be done. More of it will be done. But we're not there yet." ... Roger Smith, truck driver: "It's a lot of sheer terror moments. ... it sounds real good before you go start doing it. And then, after you're doing it, it ain't quite as good as you thought it was." Yang: "Especially when friends and colleagues start paying for that extra money with their lives."

Upstate New Yorker Identified As Abductee. The AP (11/19, Bauman) reports, "A former soldier from western New York is among the four Americans and one Austrian who were kidnapped in southern Iraq last week, family members said Sunday. Jonathon Cote, 23, a native of Getzville, N.Y., a suburb of Buffalo, was working as a guard for Crescent Security Group when he was captured Thursday, his stepmother said. ... Cote spent four years in the Army and served in Iraq and Afghanistan. He was stationed at Fort Bragg with the 82nd Airborne Division before receiving an honorable discharge, and has been in Iraq since June."

Human Rights Watch Says Saddam's Trial Was Flawed. The Washington Post (11/20, A14, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "The trial of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein "was marred by flaws so serious that they undermined the trial's fairness and called into question the verdict, an international human rights watchdog group said in a report to be released Monday." In a 97-page report by the Human Rights Watch, an analysis "based on courtroom observations and dozens of interviews with judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers," is the "first significant challenge to what the Iraqi government and its U.S. patrons assert was a fair, if messy, trial." The report "asserts that there was failure to disclose key evidence to Hussein's attorneys and that there were violations of basic rights of the defendants to confront witnesses." On Sunday, "two US. advisers to the tribunal denounced the report as 'misguided' and said that the trial was conducted properly and that a credible justice was delivered." One adviser said, "To question the overall integrity of the justice without reading the judgment is premature, at best."

General Odierno Discusses Return To Iraq. The New York Times (11/20, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who returns to Iraq next month to take charge of the day-to-day fight as commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, says he departs for Baghdad with a clearer, perhaps even diminished, set of expectations of what the military can be expected to accomplish now, more than three years after the invasion." After discussing some accomplishments, "General Odierno paused, and added, 'Notice I left out a few things, such as a democracy in the sense that we see a democracy in the United States. We have to allow them to shape their own democracy, the type of democracy that fits them and their country.'" Odierno "has felt criticism from some officers, especially among marines, that made it into the public debate via op-ed columns and books by noted military affairs writers, including 'Cobra II,' by Michael R. Gordon of The New York Times and Bernard E. Trainer; and 'Fiasco,' by Thomas E. Ricks of The Washington Post. The Fourth Infantry Division focused too much on traditional combat operations in 2003 and 2004, the critics argued, saying that those efforts, with an emphasis on capturing and killing adversary fighters rather than on rebuilding the country and winning the confidence of Iraqis, actually fueled the insurgency." He replies, "We worked very hard to take the balanced approach." Odierno replaces "the current corps commander, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the author of an influential essay warning that success in Iraq cannot be achieved solely by training local security forces or through combat operations. General Chiarelli wrote that the military must work to provide essential city services, create jobs and promote local governmental control. He also began the new operation this autumn to secure Baghdad."

Iraqis Describe Mixed Feelings About US. Three Iraqis who fled death squads and now live abroad write about their impressions of the US occupation. In an op-ed for the

DOJ_NMG_0096375

New York Times (11/20, 1.16M), poet Basim Mardan writes about his service as a translator for US forces in Iraq, "I was the first or second translator to work with the coalition forces in my city, the first or second Iraqi to set foot on the American base in Mosul. The Marines paid me $150 a month, which was better than the $2 I was making as a librarian." However, Mardan was upset by Abu Ghraib, "I grew sad, and I didn't know what to believe, because the people I worked with were great," and by her perception of lack of support from the US after he began receiving death threats: "The American Army, or whoever's in charge, has badly disappointed the translators. ... They could have helped my family move to Kurdistan, helped find me a job with the government there. ... But I'm not going to be ungrateful to the people who were fighting and dying for my country. ... I would never say that those people exploited me or exploited my thinking. The system did. Not them."

In another op-ed for the New York Times (11/20, 1.16M), poet Waddah Ali writes that the US failed to account for the Iraqi mentality after occupying Iraq: "America did well to liberate Iraq. But Iraqis were used to tyranny and afraid of freedom. The Americans entered Iraq without a psychological program for dealing with this fact."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/20, 1.16M), essayist Omar Fathi writes that the US should have imposed a strongman: "America should have removed Saddam Hussein and the closest circle around him and appointed a strong government right away. It would have been another dictatorship, but a different kind. It could have imposed martial law, then done the job that the Americans were not able to do, which was to cut power away from the old system by removing those people who might become terrorists in the future. After four to eight years, we could have had an election, and the new government could have started working on the basis of the new Constitution. ... Now the problems of Iraq will not be solved without a long and very bloody civil war."

Afghan Army Will Attack Taliban In Winter. The AP (11/20, Krane) reports, "The U.S.-backed Afghan army will step up counter-Taliban offensives this winter, which could see heavy fighting during a period traditionally used by Afghan fighters for rest and resupply, a U.S. general said here Sunday. U.S. Army Brig. Gen. Douglas Pritt, who oversees the U.S.-led effort to train the Afghan military, said Afghan forces have tripled the number of forward bases to more than 60 and plan to spend the winter harassing Taliban and gathering intelligence from combat outposts deep inside rebel strongholds." The AP adds, "The Afghan National Army remains hamstrung by desertion rates of around 15 percent, Pritt said, little different from its rate in May. The previous year, the desertion rate peaked above 25 percent, according to U.S. military figures. Afghan soldiers recently received a raise for their tiny salaries, from $70 to $100 a month, Pritt said, a decision that followed the revelation that AWOL soldiers could earn $70 a month as day laborers without facing combat."

Southern Afghans Send Mixed Signals About Insurgency. In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/20, A1, Constable, 690K) reports that in Afghanistan's four southern provinces, "the Taliban insurgency is on a fierce rebound five years after U.S. and Afghan forces toppled the Islamic militia from power in Kabul. Months of aggressive ground combat and NATO airstrikes have failed to halt continuous violence in the south, as well as some sporadic attacks in other parts of the country. ... In Helmand, a vast and arid region where much of the worst fighting has taken place and thousands of people have fled their homes, residents and elders have been sending urgent but contradictory signals about how to restore peace," with some saying "their worst problem was the devastation from months of bombing by foreign military forces. If the authorities would allow tribal leaders to administer their district, they said, they would guarantee no further Taliban attacks." The Post adds, "In Helmand's Musa Qala district, NATO has cautiously agreed to test the tribal approach. Under a deal brokered in September by the provincial governor, NATO agreed to pull back British forces from Musa Qala, and local elders pledged that Taliban attacks would cease. ... both NATO and senior Afghan officials say they are largely satisfied with the arrangement, which they said has brought fighting to a halt and allowed foreign troops to focus on creating a central zone for security and development around Helmand's capital city, rather than manning scattered outposts and chasing after bands of insurgents."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

State Bar Associations Fighting Back Against Privilege Waivers. The National Law Journal (11/20, Qualters) reports, "State bar associations are jumping into the roiling debate over the attorney-client privilege-waiver issue triggered by the U.S. Department of Justice's Thompson Memorandum." The Journal continues, "Several states have recently convened task forces to fight the 2003 directive penned by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, which, among other things, instructs prosecutors to trade leniency for waivers of the attorney-client privilege during corporate investigations." The Journal adds, "The states are lobbying the federal government to change Justice Department policies and practices that give incentives to corporate defendants who waive attorney-client privilege and pressure companies not to pay the legal fees of current or former employees facing corporate criminal investigations. In some cases, states are mulling changes to their own rules of professional conduct to sidestep Thompson-style waivers. .. .New task forces in Florida, Illinois and Michigan join ongoing efforts in Arkansas, Maryland, New York and Boston." The Journal notes, "Samuel Damren, a litigator in the Detroit office of Dykema Gossett, heads Michigan's task force. He hopes that his group will recommend changing the state's rules of professional conduct to prohibit government attorneys practicing in Michigan from requesting that companies waive their attorney-client privilege to prove they are cooperating with the government probe. … An Arkansas Bar Association task force is recommending that its House of Delegates ask the Arkansas Supreme Court to adopt rule changes allowing for selective waiver, or disclosure of some information to a government agency without revoking the attorney-client privilege, and barring discovery of attorney communications with experts. … The 72,000-member New York State Bar Association is informally discussing whether to push for changes to the rules of professional conduct to curtail waivers. But state Bar President Mark H. Alcott said he's unsure if such a rule would work in practice, since the client ultimately has the right to waive and could succumb to pressure from the government." The Journal notes, "A company's willingness to cooperate in investigations is not a 'litmus test' and is only one of several factors the Justice Department considers when charging a company, said DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. The DOJ is still 'reviewing the specific concerns and suggestions' of bar associations and other groups, Roehrkasse said."

DOJ_NMG_0096376

SEC Formally Inquires About Ford Earnings Disclosures. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A7, Cooke, Stoll) reports, "Ford Motor Co. said it has received an informal inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission related to disclosures detailing its recent restatements of earnings because of accounting errors." The Journal continues, "The company also restated financial results for the first and second quarters of 2006, deepening its loss for the two periods and finalizing the financial corrections it has said it needed to make." The Journal adds, "On Nov. 14, Ford restated the bulk of the affected earnings, which span from 2001 to the third quarter of 2006. The restatements are necessary because Ford failed to sufficiently comply with certain rules related to its accounting for transactions used to hedge against interest-rate risk. … Ford on Friday said it has been contacted by the SEC's divisions of corporation finance and enforcement regarding the amended restatements for the entirety of 2005, the third quarter of 2006 and another filing discussing the restatements. Ford said it is 'voluntarily cooperating' with the 'informal inquiries,' which also relate to disclosures made by Ford Motor Credit Co. … It is unclear whether the SEC will also inquire into the first- and second-quarter restatements issued Friday."

SEC Says Most Restatements Due To Accounting Mistakes. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, C4, Reilly) reports, "Public companies continue to restate financial results at a record pace. Ask executives why and they will likely cite complex accounting rules or hypersensitive auditors." The Journal continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has come to a different conclusion: A majority of restatements are due to basic mistakes with nuts-and-bolts accounting. .. .Research by the SEC's Office of the Chief Accountant found about 55% of recent restatements were due to companies misapplying basic accounting rules or to problems with records that meant they didn't have the correct data to get the accounting right, said SEC Deputy Chief Accountant Scott Taub." The Journal adds, "He expressed surprise so many restatements were 'just from flat-out errors.' Mr. Taub outlined the study's results during a presentation in New York on Friday at the annual conference of Financial Executives International, a professional group. … 'Internal-control structures are missing things, corporate-finance staffs are missing things and auditors are missing things,' he said. 'All of these things are not working as well as we'd like them to.' .. .The findings come as the SEC, along with the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, an accounting-firm regulator, have been working to ease internal-control rules designed to ensure companies avoid accounting mistakes or fraud. Companies, especially smaller firms, have bristled at the costs of rules imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-reform legislation. Besides mandating that managers attest to having adequate controls, the rules require an auditor to sign off that the controls are sufficient."

KB Home's CEO Leaves Amid Options Probe With $175 Million Compensation Package. The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Kristof) reports, "When KB Home Chief Executive Bruce Karatz retired last week amid a stock option controversy, he agreed to give up $13 million in disputed stock gains. But that doesn't mean he will leave the company empty-handed. … Karatz is walking away with as much as $175 million in severance pay, pension benefits and stock options, regulatory filings show." The Times continues, "The windfall is possible in part because Karatz was not fired for cause but simply retired, making him eligible for his severance pay and pension unless the company's board of directors blocks payment, compensation experts say. … 'It's like he hit the jackpot,' said Patrick McGurn, general counsel of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises large investors such as pension plans and mutual funds. 'He might not like the hit to his reputation, but he's certainly not going to take one to his bank account.'" The Times adds, "Karatz, 61, stepped down as head of the Los Angeles home-building company Nov. 12, after an internal probe found that he had picked stock option grant dates that inflated the value of the options to himself and other executives. … Under his employment agreement, Karatz would get a severance payment equal to the sum of what he earned in salary and incentive pay over the last three years, according to KB Home's proxy statement. That adds up to nearly $80 million. .. .Karatz also has a special executive pension plan that guarantees him $1 million a year for up to 25 years in retirement, making it potentially worth $25 million. … And Karatz has vested stock options that aren't in dispute, which are worth about $70 million based on KB Home shares' closing price Friday of $49.07. … Add it all up, and it comes to $175 million."

DOJ_NMG_0096377

Firms Find It Hard To Reclaim Executive Pay. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A1, Dvorak, Ng) reports, "In April 2001, directors of utility FPL Group Inc. faced a sticky problem. A few months earlier, they'd awarded top executives $62 million in bonuses linked to a merger that would have created the U.S.'s biggest electric company. Now the deal had fallen apart and shareholders were clamoring to get the money back." The Journal continues, "FPL directors scrutinized payment plans. They clashed with executives. Shareholders sued. After three years and millions in legal bills, executives returned $9 million, based largely on a technicality. Insurers paid another $12.5 million." The Journal adds, "The FPL saga is an object lesson in why companies rarely recoup money paid to executives for results they didn't actually achieve. Although the concept seems simple, at least from an ethical point of view, so-called 'clawbacks' of executive pay are in practice disruptive, divisive and difficult to pull off. In addition to a murky legal environment, the process is complicated by compensation contracts and insurance provisions. Most boards don't try recovering the money. Those that do often get mired in years of litigation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

HUD Probes Allegations Against NASA Official. The Orlando Sentinel (11/20, Cabbage, 230K) reports, "A federal probe of NASA Inspector General Robert Cobb outlines allegations that he stifled investigations, mistreated department employees and maintained a close personal relationship with top officials of the agency he was supposed to independently monitor. Preliminary findings from a 10-month investigation into Cobb's conduct have been forwarded to an oversight group, the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency. That group is expected to make a final decision before the end of the year on what, if any, action to take. Cobb has denied any wrongdoing. However, he said during an interview with the Orlando Sentinel last week that it was inappropriate for him to publicly rebut many of the specific allegations until the process had run its course." The probe was conducted by investigators from the Department of Housing and Urban Development. HUD "called in to conduct the inquiry, have examined 69 allegations against Cobb, a White House appointee. The allegations came primarily from career employees in his own office. A confidential summary of the HUD probe detailing the investigative findings was obtained by the Sentinel. Not all of the allegations against Cobb were substantiated. However, current and former employees in Cobb's office interviewed by HUD inspectors and the Sentinel described him as a partisan manager who often failed in his responsibility to independently investigate possible wrongdoing at NASA. Cobb vehemently disagreed with that characterization."

Maryland Mall Shooting Under Investigation. The Washington Post (11/20, B01, Rich, Smith) reports, "Shoppers returned to Westfield Shoppingtown Annapolis in droves yesterday, undeterred by a gun battle that wounded three in the mall's food court the night before and sent scores of others racing for exits or diving under tables." The Post continues, "An 18-year-old Annapolis resident who was shot twice in the abdomen remained in a hospital under police guard, authorities said, and an off-duty U.S. Secret Service agent with whom he allegedly traded fire was recovering from a single gunshot wound. .. .The injuries to each man -- as well as to Tahzay L. Brown, a 16-year-old male struck in the crossfire -- were not considered life-threatening." The Post adds, "The violence began at 7:15 Saturday evening when the agent intervened after spotting as many as eight young men assaulting another young man, according to a preliminary police account. .. .The 18-year-old drew a handgun and fired, hitting the agent once in the leg, police said. The agent then drew his weapon, fired seven times and struck the 18-year-old twice in the abdomen, police said. The agent was with a family member, who was not injured. … Georgia Goslee, an attorney authorized to speak on behalf of Brown's family, described the Annapolis High School student as a victim drawn into the violence merely because the person who was being assaulted is his friend. She said the confrontation between the friend and the larger group was 'spillover from an earlier incident that happened at the school . . . back in September.'"

NYTimes Columnist Decries Sexual Abuse Of Children. In a column for the New York Times (11/20), Bob Herbert writes, "When (Atlanta) Mayor Shirley Franklin recently announced that the city would be cracking down on the pimps and johns who prey on under-age prostitutes, she also disclosed publicly for the first time that she had been molested when she was a young girl. … Speaking at a gathering of reporters, local officials and civic leaders, the mayor spoke frankly about the incident, in which she was abused at the age of 10 by the father of a girlfriend. She then asked how many of the women in attendance had endured similar experiences. Several women in the room raised their hands." Herbert continues, "One of the most tightly kept secrets in the U.S. is the extent to which children are sexually exploited, not just by child pornographers and compulsive pedophiles, but by men who are viewed by their relatives, friends and neighbors as quintessentially solid citizens. … In an interview on Friday, Ms. Franklin told me: 'It seemed appropriate to reveal my story in that setting, because what we were trying to do is demonstrate that this can happen to anyone. Not only can it happen; it does happen to a lot of children.'" Herbert adds, "Atlanta has become a major hub of commercial sex in the U.S. It's a full-fledged sex-tourism destination, with thousands of strippers, prostitutes and other sex workers accommodating an endless stream of johns from around the country. Under-age girls (some as young as 10 and 11) are a significant part of that trade. Many of them were already carrying the scars of sexual molestation when they got into prostitution."

DOJ_NMG_0096378

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Riot Retrospective Seeks To Increase Understanding Of Civil Rights Struggle. USA Today (11/20, Jones) reports from Newark, NJ, "In the first major exhibit documenting the 1967 Newark riots, the New Jersey Historical Society is assembling a retrospective that is scheduled to open by next summer, the 40th anniversary of the unrest. … Tentatively titled 'What's Going On,' the exhibit will use oral histories, text and artifacts to examine the six days of rioting in Newark. It also will look at the violence that engulfed Detroit 11 days later and the 1965 riots in Los Angeles' Watts district." USA adds, "These and other riots in scores of cities in the late 1960s — many triggered by incidents involving police — focused attention on the lack of economic opportunity in predominantly poor, black neighborhoods. A presidential commission studying the causes concluded in 1968 that the nation was moving toward 'two societies, one black, one white, separate and unequal.' … 'We want to move beyond Newark and show the parallels between what happened in those summers of the 1960s,' says Max Herman, an assistant professor of sociology at Rutgers University in New Jersey who has conducted many of the interviews for the project. 'The frustration was building for several decades." … The exhibit will stay in Newark for nearly a year. Organizers then plan to take it to Los Angeles and Detroit, where they will work with local museums. The University of Baltimore also is planning a 40th anniversary exhibit on the 1968 riots in that city that followed the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. Sociologists say such exhibits are critical in helping the nation understand the legacy of that turbulent time."

Airline Employee's Treatment Of Nursing Mother Sparks National Protest. The USA Today/AP (11/20) reports, "A national 'nurse-in' will be held Tuesday to protest the treatment of a passenger who was kicked off a plane for refusing to cover herself while breast-feeding her baby." The AP continues, "A similar protest, in which mothers sat on the floor near the Delta Airlines counter, breast-fed their babies and held signs, took place at the Burlington International Airport last week." The AP adds, "Chelsea Clark, 31, of Fairfax, said she is using Web message boards to organize a national protest at Delta counters across the country. What happened to Emily Gillette, 27, of Santa Fe, N.M., has prompted an 'out-swell of outrage,' Clark said. … 'This is for all of the nursing mothers in the country who felt that way,' Clark said. 'This is our opportunity to make a statement.' … Freedom Airlines, a regional airline for Delta, said it has disciplined the flight attendant who ordered Gillette off the plane when she declined to cover up with a blanket. Spokesman Paul Skellon said the attendant did not meet company expectations when Gillette was told to leave the plane. … A spokesman for the airline said the pilot apologized and asked Gillette and her family to get back on the plane, but Gillette said that never happened. … On Oct. 13 Gillette was sitting aboard a plane, which was three hours late in taking off, when she began to breast-feed her 22-month-old daughter. She says a flight attendant handed her a blanket and told her to cover up, which Gillette declined to do. … The attendant said Gillette was offending her and she was removed from the plane. … Gillette filed a complaint with the Vermont Human Rights Commission because breast-feeding in a public place is protected under state law."

McCain Says Supreme Court Should Overturn Roe. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports Sen. John McCain, "who supports a ban on abortion except in cases of rape, incest and to save a mother's life, said he doubted a constitutional amendment could pass but that one would not be needed because 'it's very likely or possible that the Supreme Court should — could — overturn Roe v. Wade.'" McCain said, "I'm a federalist. Just as I believe that the issue of gay marriage should be decided by the states, so do I believe that we would be better off by having Roe v. Wade return to the states. And I don't believe the Supreme Court should be legislating in the way that they did on Roe v. Wade."

McCain Not Opposed To Civil Unions For Gay Couples. Asked on ABC's This Week (11/19, Stephanopoulos) if he would describe himself as "pro-gay rights," McCain responded, "In the respect that I believe that the don't ask, don't tell policy is working in the military. … I believe in the sanctity and unique role of marriage between man and woman, but I certainly don't believe in discriminating against any American." Asked if he is "against civil unions for gay couples," McCain said, "No, I am not. … I do not believe gay marriage should be legal, but I do believe that people ought to be able to enter into contracts, exchange powers of attorney…"

DOJ_NMG_0096379

Romney Makes Effort To Place Gay Marriage Ban Onto Ballot. The New York Times/AP (11/20) reports Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts "said on Sunday that he would ask the state's highest court to order a question banning same-sex marriage onto the ballot if legislators did not address the issue." Romney said he "would file a request this week for a justice of the Supreme Judicial Court to direct the secretary of state to place the question on the ballot if lawmakers do not vote on the issue on Jan. 2, the final day of the session." Romney "made his announcement to the cheers of same-sex-marriage opponents at a rally on the Statehouse steps. Supporters of same-sex marriage staged a protest across the street." The Washington Post (11/20, 690K) also ran the AP story.

Advocates See Chance For Revival Of Gays In Military Debate. Newsweek (11/27, 3.12M) reports, "With the Democrats in control of Congress, some activists are hoping they'll add a controversial issue to their to-do list: revisiting the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy on gays in the military." Supporters "hope they might make some progress at a time when the military can't afford to turn away the willing and able."

ANTITRUST:

Freeport To Buy Phelps In Copper Merger. The Financial Times (11/20, Politi) reports, "Freeport-McMoRan on Sunday night agreed to buy Phelps Dodge for $25.9bn (£13.7bn) in cash and stock to become the world's largest publicly traded copper company with mines stretching from Indonesia to Chile." The Times continues, "The takeover is the latest in a wave of consolidation that has swept through the global mining industry as commodity prices soared because of high demand, particularly from China." The Times adds, "Amid the boom, both Freeport and Phelps were faced with key strategic challenges that they decided to address by combining the two companies. Freeport has been seeking ways to diversify away from its main Grasberg mine, which is based in a remote part of Indonesian Papua and has been criticised for containing too much political risk. … Phelps, on the other hand, has been a takeover target since its twin bid for Canadian mining groups Inco and Falconbridge fell apart in September. .. .Under the terms of the deal, Phelps shareholders will receive $126.46 per share – or a 33 per cent premium to the company's market value on Friday. About 70 per cent of the transaction value, or $18bn, will be in cash, with the rest in shares, meaning Phelps investors will end up owning 38 per cent of the combined group."

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A3, Heinzl, Gold) reports, "reeport said it pursued the deal to gain the scale it needs to compete among other miners for equipment and prospects amid increased Chinese demand for commodities and high prices. But the deal comes after copper has fallen from loftier levels, leading to some industry concerns of a potential cyclical downturn." The Journal adds, "The combination -- resulting in what would be North America's largest copper producer -- continues the recent streak of big-ticket mining deals, as the industry scrambles to secure new production and mine developments."

The New York Times (11/20, Sorkin, Austen) reports, "The transaction, if approved by shareholders, would create the world's largest copper producer and the largest mining company based in North America. It is the latest move in a series of mining and metals mergers. Like companies involved in other mining mergers, Freeport-McMoRan promoted the idea that increased size has become an important competitive factor." The Times adds, "Freeport-McMoRan, which has a market capitalization of $11.3 billion compared with Phelps Dodge's value of $19.4 billion, will finance the transactions by borrowing about $17.5 billion. Freeport said it expected the deal would be accretive to the combined company's earnings per share and cash flow immediately. … To a considerable extent, Phelps-Dodge now finds itself being acquired because of its failure earlier this year to bulk up with an acquisition of Inco, the large Toronto-based nickel miner. … Inco had approached Phelps Dodge in an attempt to help it with its bid for another Canadian nickel miner, Falconbridge. In exchange for financing for that transaction, Inco's board agreed to be acquired by Phelps Dodge in a deal cash and stock worth about $17 billion."

Bloomberg (11/20, Shankar, Ann) also reports on the proposed merger.

Blackstone Near Deal To Buy Equity Officer Properties. The Financial Times (11/20, Politi) reports, "Blackstone was on Sunday night in advanced discussions to seal the biggest private equity deal on record as the board of Equity Office Properties, the US commercial real estate company founded by Sam Zell, met to vote on a takeover worth $36bn including debt." The Times continues, "Although the outcome of the meeting remained unclear, the talks will highlight the growing audacity of cash-rich, buy-out firms, which are taking over some of the biggest US companies in a range of industries." The Times adds, "Last week Thomas H. Lee Partners, Bain Capital and a group of banks agreed to buy Clear Channel Communications, the biggest chain of US radio stations. Harrah's Entertainment, the US casino giant, has for weeks been in talks to be taken over by Apollo Management and Texas Pacific, although it remained unclear on Sunday night if that would result in an agreement. … In July, HCA, the biggest US hospital chain, agreed to be taken private by a consortium including Bain Capital, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, and Merrill Lynch for about $33bn. That agreement broke the record for the biggest private equity deal, sealed in 1989 when KKR bought RJR Nabisco, the food and tobacco conglomerate. … But the huge amounts of money flooding into private equity and the availability of cheap debt to finance acquisitions have led to expectations that the HCA deal size would soon be trumped."

DOJ_NMG_0096380

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, Berman) reports, "Joining an unprecedented rush to remove corporations from the public markets, the real estate arm of private-equity firm The Blackstone Group is set to announce a $20 billion takeover plan for Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. office-building owner and manager, people familiar with the matter said." The Journal adds, "If completed, the deal would become the largest such 'take private' deal in history -- and the largest real-estate deal in history -- when factoring in Equity Office's existing $16 billion in debt. It's a record that has already been broken this year, and could be broken again by year-end, as private-equity firms train hundreds of billions of dollars of capital on once untouchable names of the stock-market firmament."

The New York Times (11/20, Sorkin, Pristin) reports, "The deal marks the largest leveraged buyout in history, eclipsing the $33 billion paid earlier this year for H.C.A., the hospital chain, and it illustrates how private equity firms continue to gobble up corporate America. Under the transaction, Equity Office will go from being a publicly held company to a private one. Blackstone will pay $20 billion and assume $16 billion in debt." The Times adds, "Matthew L. Ostrower, an analyst at Morgan Stanley, called the proposed deal 'a ground-breaking transaction for the real estate world in general and an earthquake for the REIT industry.' … Mr. Ostrower said that if a company the size of Equity Office chose not to remain public, 'now every public company out there is going to have to some degree examine their capitalization, whether being public makes sense.'"

Bloomberg (11/20, Cimilluca, Louis) reports, "Blackstone in July raised a $15.6 billion fund, to which it is adding. In June, it raised $5.25 billion for the largest-ever fund for high-return real estate investments, the majority of which has been spent already. … The company and other private equity firms, which finance the bulk of their takeovers using the target company's cash flow, have announced $600 billion of acquisitions so far this year, compared with $241 billion in 2005, according to data compiled by Bloomberg News."

US Airways Head Faces Daunting Management Challenge. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, B1, Trottman) reports, "It's hard enough post-Sept. 11 to manage one airline. Now, US Airways Group Inc. Chief Executive Doug Parker wants to run three." The Journal continues, "With his $8.67 billion hostile bid last week for Delta Air Lines, the CEO is proposing to add yet another company to the two he's already combining as a result of his America West Airlines acquiring US Airways late last year. He envisions that the new airline would fly under the Delta name." The Journal adds, "The 45-year-old, known for his financial expertise, is rolling the dice again in what would become the greatest management challenge of his career if a deal goes through. By merging with the much-larger Atlanta carrier Delta as it emerges from bankruptcy court, US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., would become the largest U.S. airline in terms of passenger traffic, a huge leap from its No. 6 ranking right now. … It would add an exponential level of complexity to an already daunting task. Though the earlier merger is considered a financial success so far, some of its customer-service rankings have been among industry lows in recent months as the airline has had rising problems with baggage handling and overall service complaints. Management is still blending the cultures of the two airlines, which were in many ways steeped in vastly different processes and procedures."

Final Putnam Bids Due Before Thanksgiving. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, C5, Mcdonald, Berman) reports, "The auction of Boston money manager Putnam Investments will move into its latter stages this week with final offers due from three bidders before the Thanksgiving holiday, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "Prior to the Thursday holiday, bids are expected from three suitors: Amvescap PLC of the United Kingdom, Unicredito Italiano SpA of Italy and Power Corp. of Canada, according to one of these people." The Journal adds, "It could be weeks before any decision is made by Putnam's parent, Marsh & McLennan Cos., of New York. Marsh President and Chief Executive Michael Cherkasky has called the auction 'a market check,' and the company may decide to hang onto Putnam, which manages $187 billion of assets, if it can't get a price its board considers fair. .. . A final sale price could be affected by the inclusion of 'earn out' clauses. These agreements might allow for a lower payment up front but also additional payments if Putnam meets specific financial goals. … The Putnam auction is seen as an important step in Marsh's recovery from a tangle with New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. Mr. Cherkasky took the company's reins in October 2004 when an industry-wide bid-rigging inquiry put the firm and its Marsh Inc. insurance brokerage in crisis. Marsh Inc. and other large insurance brokers reached civil settlements with state authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0096381

Philadelphia Exchange Chief Urges Close Scrutiny Of CME-CBOT Merger. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (11/20, A17), Meyer S. Frucher, chairman and CEO of the Philadelphia Stock Exchange, writes, "The announcement of the proposed merger between the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade has sparked applause from the shareholders who will benefit. But for the marketplace, the growing derivatives trading community, and the American consumer, the merger of two already powerful monopolies into a single pre-eminent force in the risk markets may be the perfect illustration of why monopolies are a bad thing. For regulators, therefore, the proposed merger represents an urgent challenge and an opportunity to ensure the competitiveness of these essential markets." Frucher continues, "Historically, both the CME and the CBOT have operated as effective monopolies as futures contracts were typically traded exclusively at a particular marketplace. Yet to the idea that there is a downside to two discrete but not overlapping monopolies merging into one, many in the financial markets have responded: So what? After all, contracts traded at both exchanges are cleared by a single entity today. So long as the products are distinct from one another and the transaction does not result in incremental concentration of the marketplace for futures clearing, then there is no incremental concentration of market share either." Frucher adds, "So how does this merger affect the average trader or public investor? As more and more people use derivatives to manage their own portfolio risk or speculate on the direction of interest rates or commodities, it is a certainty that their transaction costs will be higher if CME and CBOT merge. Since both went public, they have raised their transaction and clearing fees, and can certainly continue to do so unilaterally as a merged organization. … What can the CFTC and the Department of Justice do to ensure that a merger benefits the markets? First, the CTFC should insist on fungibility of products so that if another futures market offers a Eurodollar future, any firm can take or unwind a position on different marketplaces. That will encourage competition. Second, DOJ can insist that CME 'universalize' its clearing services by separating the clearinghouse from its common ownership with the exchanges, or by allowing other clearinghouses the benefits of cross-margining." Frucher concludes, "Exchanges that have gone public -- especially futures exchanges -- have commanded the attention of the capital markets and enjoyed the benefits of investment. That is a good thing. A CME/CBOT merger, however, holds the potential to cast a disproportionate shadow over the risk markets -- with adverse impact on the markets themselves and certainly on the public."

ENVIRONMENT:

NYTimes Warns Deforestation Will Cause Climate Problems. The New York Times (11/20, 1.16M) editorializes, "A new study published by the National Academy of Sciences and based on a recent international assessment of forests confirms that reforestation has become a widespread pattern in well-off countries and also in a few that are not so well off." Reforestation is "obviously good news," but in "some parts of the world, deforestation is only expanding, with dire consequences for biodiversity and the climate." Even if forests will be recovered," some of the "most biologically diverse forests are being logged or burned without ceasing," therefore "destroying irreplaceable habitat and extinguishing species one by one."

WPost Calls Responsible Fisheries Management Crucial. The Washington Post (11/20, 690K) editorializes, "A new paper by a team of respected scientists estimates that unless policymakers take substantial steps to preserve marine biodiversity, the world will face 'the global collapse of all taxa currently fished by the mid-21st century.'" The challenge domestically is to "get other regions to follow Alaska's lead and internationally to get countries bent on destructive fishing practices to adopt more sustainable models," and Congress "needs to reauthorize and improve the law that governs fisheries management." The ban on "unregulated bottom trawling on the high seas" that the Bush Administration is pushing, would "be a significant coup environmentally and would burnish the record of oceanic protection" that Bush "established this year with his creation of a mammoth marine protected area in the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands." Responsible fisheries management is "one of the most pressing ecological concerns of our time." If policymakers "fail to address it seriously," the oceans will become "giant dead zones, and seafood will be a thing of the past."

WPost Praises DC Bill Establishing "Green" Building Requirements. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/20, A16, 690K) writes, "The environmental benefits of better building requirements remain an insight overripe for policymakers to exploit. That's why we welcome a bill the D.C. Council unanimously supported in its first reading last week." If the legislation "passes, government structures built three years after the legislation takes effect will have to meet a high standard of environmental friendliness. Five years on, private construction projects will also have to fulfill building requirements aimed at lessening environmental impact." The Post concludes, "After years of presidential neglect on global climate change, states and localities have had to pioneer their own approaches to reducing the atmospheric pollution they produce. Smart building requirements are a promising new tool for American cities to do just that. More jurisdictions should follow the District's example."

DOJ_NMG_0096382

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Investigation Of Online Prescription Drug Operation. In the first part of a series on a DEA investigation of online prescription drug sales, the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/19, Shiffman) highlights Akhil Bansal's "family business" and writes, "The Bansals were the guys who supplied the guys who sent that relentless spam, luring American consumers with cheap Viagra, no-prescription Ambien, next-day codeine. Akhil oversaw the family's North American operations, shipping roughly 75,000 pills a day via UPS." According to the Inquirer, since his arrival in Philadelphia in 2003, Akhil "had at age 26 blossomed into a global businessman. … To take down the network, agents were using a number of weapons - surveillance, undercover buys, cell-tower pings, trash pulls, e-mail wiretaps, bank subpoenas, immigration reports, even provisions of the Patriot Act." According to the Inquirer, Congress "was pressuring [Karen] Tandy to do something about illegal online pharmacies. She recognized the emerging public health threat. After all, any kid with a credit card and Internet access could order highly addictive drugs from the safety of home. … Tandy was counting on the Bansal case to make a splash." However, the Inquirer notes that at the time, laws were "vague, outdated, inconsistent. Technology - new medicines and ways to deliver them - was outpacing regulation."

In "online extras" the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/19) has posted on its Web site a recorded interview with Karen Tandy in which she "discusses why it is important for law enforcement agencies to focus on the distribution of prescription drugs over the Internet."

In a sidebar titled, "The Bansal Pill Network," the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/19) outlines the operation.

In today's story titled "Origins," the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/20) writes, "Hours before DEA agents are to arrest Internet drug dealers in a worldwide sweep, Temple grad student Akhil Bansal races from his Roxborough apartment to flee home to India. Today's installment takes us back to the day the case began. It is February 2004." The Inquirer continues, "Akhil's father had put [people] in touch with an Indian couple living in Queens, N.Y., David and Elizabeth Armstrong. From now on, the Armstrongs would handle the shipping. Under the improved scheme, bulk quantities - pills by the tens of thousands - would be shipped from India to a Queens rowhouse. In the basement, newly arrived Indian immigrants would earn $6 an hour repackaging and labeling pills."

27 Indicted, $15.7 Million Worth Of Drugs Seized In Mississippi Investigation. The Hattiesburg (MS) American (11/18) reports, "The indictments of 27 people - including five Hattiesburg men - as well as the seizure of $15.7 million worth of drugs and $2.9 million in cash and property resulted from breaking up one of the largest and most sophisticated drug-trafficking operations in Mississippi history, officials said Friday. … 'This is really the big, top-tier guys,' Stephen Luzinski, assistant special agent in charge of Mississippi Drug Enforcement Administration, said of the 27 suspects. 'It was especially significant in that agents were able to successfully trace the movement of both drugs and money from the hands of high-level Mississippi traffickers into the hands of some of Mexico's most powerful drug traffickers.'" Mississippi's Jackson Clarion Ledger also published this story.

NFL To Keep Drug Program Agents Until End Of Season. The New York Daily News (11/19, Quinn) reports, "As more of the NFL's Drug Program Agents join a potential lawsuit for tens of millions of dollars over back payroll tax and benefits, the league has changed its plan to replace them in midseason. After the IRS ruled over the summer that the DPAs, the men who collect urine samples from players, were employees, not independent contractors, the NFL told the 80DPAs that they would be replaced by an outside company called Comprehensive Drug Testing (CDT) in mid-November. … In a memo sent to DPAs last week, however, DPA supervisor Warren Welsh wrote, 'It has become apparent that ongoing discussions between the Management Council and CDT make the original date unrealistic....it seems, more likely than not, that the change will not take place until the end of the season.'"

Opium Poppy Crop Destroyed In Colombia, Elimination Of Industrial Plantations Declared. The Los Angeles Times (11/20) reports, "With the destruction of a 12-acre opium poppy crop in southern Narino state on Sunday, the Colombian government declared it had rid its territory of all 'industrial' plantations of the flower used to make heroin. Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos made the declaration during a media trip to a mountainside poppy field 375 miles southwest of Bogota near the Ecuadorean border, minutes before dozens of troops destroyed the crop with machetes. It was perhaps no coincidence the assertion came as the U.S. Congress was considering extending Plan Colombia, the $600-million anti-drug and terrorism aid package whose effectiveness has been called into question." However, even critics of Plan Colombia "say strides have been made. Poppy cultivation fell to less than 4,500 acres last year, or 10% of what was farmed in the early 1990s, according to Colombian statistics."

DOJ_NMG_0096383

IMMIGRATION:

NYTimes Says Urges Attention To Immigration Reform. The New York Times (11/20, 1.16M) editorializes that immigration "remains a high-voltage issue that Congress may be too timid or distracted to touch," but it is "crucial" that Democrats "find their voice," and attempt to "revive immigration reform in the Senate." The McCain-Kennedy bill is a "decent bill" except for the other "tough-posing amendments" added by other senators that made it "fundamentally unworkable and unjust." The Senate should "strip those away."

TAX:

IRS Advisory Committee Seeks Tax Payments From Online Auctioneers. USA Today (11/20, McCoy) reports, "Attention online auction sellers: An IRS advisory committee wants you — to pay federal income taxes on your profits." USA continues, "Anyone who sells goods online should first be required by law to submit a federal tax identification number, a change that would enable the IRS to track the transactions and seek any taxes owed, the committee recommended in a new report to the federal tax-collection agency. The recommendation is similar to an enforcement option raised in August by the staff of the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation." USA adds, "The IRS advisory panel of tax specialists, citing the rapid growth of Americans selling via eBay, uBid and other online sites, said it's likely that 'a significant number of those users either choose to ignore income reporting requirements or are unaware of their obligations.' … 'We're trying to help close the tax gap' between what Americans actually earn and what they report to the IRS, said committee member Rachel Paliotti, corporate tax manager for Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island." USA notes, "The non-government panel's report cited IRS data that estimated non-farm sole proprietors under-report 57% of their annual income. The committee also highlighted a 2005 eBay-commissioned report by ACNielsen International Research that said more than 724,000 Americans described the top online auction site as their primary or secondary source of income. … Although the IRS has no estimate of under-reporting specifically by online sellers, the agency estimated that unreported capital gains by all businesses totaled $11 billion for the 2001 federal tax year."

LATimes Calls For Overhaul Of Federal Tax Code. The Los Angeles Times (11/20, 850K) says in an editorial, "Twenty years have passed since President Reagan signed the landmark Tax Reform Act of 1986, a bipartisan effort to simplify the egregiously complex federal tax code. Since then, Washington has taken about 15,000 steps backward — enacting an average of 750 new or modified exemptions, deductions and other wrinkles to tax law every year. The code not only grew more burdensome, it became less efficient, more likely to distort markets and more prone to evasion. The latter is a huge problem, as seen in the estimated $350-billion tax gap — the difference between what taxpayers should be paying the feds each year and what the Internal Revenue Service collects." It is "time for Congress to take another stab at a major rewrite of the tax code that eliminates most of the preferences and loopholes. By broadening the tax base — in other words, requiring more corporate and personal income to be taxed — lawmakers can lower rates without reducing the total amount collected by the IRS."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Levin Undecided On Gates Confirmation. Sen. Carl Levin was asked on CNN's Late Edition (11/19, Blitzer) if he plans to vote to confirm Robert Gates as the next defense secretary. Levin answered, "Depends on…how he answers questions, whether he's forthright or not at hearings. And those hopefully can take place this year so we can vote on his confirmation. I voted against him last time because I didn't think he was forthright relative to his role in Iran-Contra. I hope he is forthright. I hope he's independent and objective relative to Iraq. I hope he'll speak truth to power unlike too many other people in this Administration. So it all depends on how he does at the hearings."

Webb Wants Gates Confirmation Delayed Until Next Congress. Senator-elect James Webb, appearing on NBC's Meet the Press (11/19, Russert), was asked if he would like Defense Secretary nominee Robert Gates' confirmation hearings to be held next year when the Democrats take control of the Senate, Webb answered, "I would, and that has been misinterpreted by some. I heard there was a column by Robert Novak saying that I have some personal animus toward Mr. Gates. I don't even know Mr. Gates. But if this is an individual that I'm going to be working with for the next two years, I would like to be able to ask my own questions and to examine…his qualifications."

DOJ_NMG_0096384

Cheney Praises Olson For Bush v. Gore Performance. The Washington Times (11/20, McCaslin, 88K) "Inside The Beltway" column reports under the sub-headline "Thanks For My Job" that Vice President Cheney, "heaping praise" on ex-Solicitor General Ted Olson at the Federalist Society national convention, said, "To this day, I'm still impressed with his effective performance in a case called Bush v. Gore."

Hoyer Seeks Assurance From Pelosi That Backers Won't Face Retaliation. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports Rep. Steny Hoyer "acknowledged Sunday he was seeking assurances from incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi that she would not retaliate against his supporters after he won the No. 2 House leadership post." Hoyer "insisted there was 'no bad blood' with Pelosi after she publicly supported Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania for the job of majority leader. Hoyer said he was confident Pelosi would not punish House colleagues who voted 149-86 last week to make Hoyer the majority leader." Hoyer said, "One of the reasons it's going to not happen is that there are a lot of them. It's one thing ... if you have a margin of one or two or five or even 10, but when you have a margin as decisively as the caucus made a decision, then it's time to move on." The AP adds former GOP Speaker Newt Gingrich "called Pelosi's decision to support Murtha a 'mistake' but said Republicans should not underestimate her."

Roll Call (11/20, Yachnin) reports the "newly elected House Democratic leaders vowed to quickly reunify their Caucus in the wake of a bitter leadership contest last week, but offered few details and left some rank-and-file Members questioning how the party will mend its divisions as it prepares to take control of the chamber in the 110th Congress." But at least "a few Democratic lawmakers remained angry Thursday over allegedly heavy-handed tactics employed by Murtha supporters in the contest, and others publicly suggested that House leaders could have a difficult time alleviating any lingering bruises." Rep. Allen Boyd (Fla.), "who will be a co-chairman of the Democratic Blue Dog Coalition in the 110th Congress," said, "I think the Caucus is fractured." Boyd added Pelosi's "biggest challenge is figuring out how to wrap her arms around all the Caucus." Roll Call adds, "Several Members, however, asserted that with the election completed Democrats will focus on readying their legislative agenda, rather than dwell on differences."

Majority Leader "Gang War" Raises Doubts About Pelosi. Time (11/27, Tumulty, Bacon, 4.03M) writes, "There's only one thing dumber in politics than picking a fight when you don't have to; it's picking one when you can't win. That's why pretty much everyone in Washington is mystified by Nancy Pelosi," who "decided to step on her own coronation by turning what would otherwise have been an all-but-ignored secret ballot for majority leader into a gang war. … All that raised a lot of new questions about Pelosi herself--about her judgment, her political instincts and her real ideology," and whether she is "really up to the job" of leading House Democrats.

In his Newsweek (11/27, 3.12M) column, Howard Fineman writes that as Pelosi tries to bring her caucus together, the "tectonic plates move in dangerous ways when the topics are taxes, trade, torts and terrorism," and some of the effects were seen in the majority leader vote, an "embarrassing strategic debut for the Speaker-to-be. Not an earthquake, to be sure, but a tremor that may be worth remembering."

House GOP Sticks With Leadership Team Of Boehner, Blunt. Roll Call (11/20, Davis) reports that despite "efforts by a small band of House Republicans last week to convince their colleagues that a change in leadership was important, if not critical, to winning back a majority in 2008, the House Republican Conference overwhelmingly sided with the status quo Friday and handed landslide victories to Minority Leader-elect John Boehner (Ohio) and Minority Whip-elect Roy Blunt (Mo.)." Both leaders "recast themselves in their campaigns and argued they would be agents for change in the 110th Congress, committing to return the Republican Party to its roots of fiscal conservatism and reform and to battle the new Democratic majority tooth and nail." Boehner said, "We are going to work as a team and we are going to earn our way back into our majority." Boehner "defeated Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, in a landslide 168-27 vote." Roll Call adds Friday's elections "were a significant defeat for prominent conservatives Pence and Shadegg."

Gingrich Encourages House GOP To Operate Independently Of The White House. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, on Fox News Sunday (11/19, Wallace), said House Majority Leader John Boehner has "got to decide, is he going to focus on regaining control of the House, or is he going to focus on being the White House's floor leader? They are very different jobs. And my hope is that Boehner is going to decide that he wants to be the leader who helps the party get back into majority status." Asked if he thinks "the White House and President Bush have gone off-track," Gingrich replied, "The president…has a legacy concern. 'What do I do in the next two years?' I hope he'll decide that that legacy is in a bipartisan coalition that helps also, by the way, elect a Republican president in '08. The House Republicans have a different institutional challenge. How do they reach out in very closely contested districts, recruit the candidates, build the record, create the excitement and the energy to regain a majority? They're not automatically identical."

DOJ_NMG_0096385

House GOP Said To Be Ignoring Lessons Of Midterm Elections. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "House Democrats and Republicans elected their leaders for the next Congress last week, and the results suggest there's a reason Democrats will have the majority. They seem to have absorbed the election's lessons better than the GOP." Republicans "easily re-elected their top two leaders in the face of challenges from younger conservatives." House Republicans are "talking a good game of recovering their small-government principles, but their leadership choices suggest they think their defeat had little to do with their own image or performance. Instead -- and we also hear these whispers privately -- they blame everything on President Bush and Iraq. Mr. Blunt is said to have impressed the Members with a plan to defeat freshman Democrats in 2008; so much for self-reflection and new ideas."

"Liberated" Lott Makes Return To Senate Leadership. A Time (11/27, Calabresi, 4.03M) piece called "The Revival Of Trent Lott" begins, "'Hello, Mr. President. This is Lazarus speaking.' That is how Trent Lott answered a phone call last week" from President Bush, "the man who helped force him out of the Senate's top job in 2002." Lott won the Senate minority whip race "because he spent the past four years quietly making himself as useful as possible to his colleagues. He lent his old strengths as a backroom dealmaker and a master of arcane Senate rules to sometimes thankless tasks. He not only won back allies that way, but he also sharpened the exact skills that his party will need for the next two years." And "smooth relations with the Bush White House aren't the priority they used to be. … As he was campaigning for the whip job, Lott says, he told his colleagues that when it came to White House pressure, 'there's nothing they can do to me or for me that they haven't already done. I'm not mad, but I am a little bit of a liberated guy these days.'"

Remains Of "Gang Of 14" May Play Role In 110th Congress. Roll Call (11/20, Pierce, Billings) reports, "Having successfully averted what could have been an explosive partisan showdown over judges in the Senate last year, Senators in the 'Gang of 14' believe they have attained a relevancy that will allow them to play an even more prominent role in the 110th Congress — not just on judicial nominations but on other issues as well." Though their "original mission vanishes at the end of this year," Sen. Mary Landrieu said she "expects that a broader role for the holdover gang members, and perhaps other like-minded Senators, likely will develop in the coming weeks." Landrieu said, "The 12 of us still remaining [in the Senate] will have that discussion sometime soon to see what the mood is. There have been many individual and group meetings about how to advance a civil and productive agenda." Roll Call adds that on the Republican side, "the Louisiana Democrat said, Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) is helping lead efforts to engage the gang's GOP Senators and other moderates." This "possible re-emergence of the gang comes even though the group saw two key GOP players -- Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R.I.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) -- go down in defeat on Nov. 7."

In Face Of "Rumors," Lindsey Warns Bush Against Tax Increase Deal. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/20, A16), Lawrence B. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group and formerly President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002, says, "During the recent off-year elections, the president repeatedly pointed to the booming economy and noted that his tax cuts were responsible. With growth strong and unemployment low despite the ending of the stock-market bubble, terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq, he had every reason to be proud. Moreover, both economic theory and the actual timing of the economic revival support his claims regarding the tax cuts." That is why "it is so odd that rumors swarm around Washington that the president may be willing to raise taxes as part of a 'deal' on entitlement reform. In particular, the rumors suggest the president might be willing to get rid of the provision that caps the income level used to compute Social Security taxes and benefits. These rumors aren't without substance; last year the president would not rule out raising the cap when asked." Should the President "do this, he doubtless would be thinking that saving Social Security would be worth the price. He would be wrong. In practice this idea would both destroy the basis on which Social Security was started and fail to produce the expected revenue that supposedly would save the system."

Rangel Denies Democrats Intend To Raise Taxes. Rep. Charles Rangel, on CBS's Face the Nation (11/19, Schieffer), said, "The truth of the matter is that raising taxes that have already been put into effect is poor tax policy and bad politics. … Nobody talking about an increase in taxes. … I'm assuming that the President and the Vice President will put an end to the rhetoric that Democrats just want to raise your taxes and they just want to raise spending."

Reid Says Prospect Of Cheney Presidency Means No Bush Impeachment. US News and World Report (11/27, Bedard) reports in "Washington Whispers" that the "degree to which the new Democratic leadership on Capitol Hill despises Vice President Dick Cheney is a big plus for President Bush. Consider why incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid scrapped an idea to impeach Bush: 'Two words: Dick Cheney,' he says."

DOJ_NMG_0096386

Paulson To Deliver Address On US Capital Market Competitiveness. The Financial Times (11/20, Guha, Grant) reports US Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson today will "say what the US needs to do to ensure that its markets remain globally competitive in a landmark speech on capital market regulation." The "move comes amid growing concern in the US that New York is losing out to emerging financial centres in Asia and to London, with its lighter-touch, principles-based regulatory regime." It is "also a sign that the concerns on Wall Street about the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate compliance and controls laws have moved higher up the agenda in Washington since the arrival at the Treasury three months ago of the former Goldman Sachs chief executive. Senior figures, including Dick Cheney, the vice-president, have said that Sarbox may have gone too far."

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, Solomon, 2.04M) reports Paulson, "in a speech scheduled for delivery to the Economic Club of New York today, will press the case for a re-examination of government rules and laws he believes are putting US financial markets at a disadvantage amid competition from abroad." Paulson, "in his first major public comments since Democrats won control of Congress, is expected to stress the need for 'regulatory balance' and to outline challenges regulators and policy makers face as they try to juggle the need for regulation with the imperative to make U.S. markets competitive." Paulson is not "expected to call for any new laws or for repeal of any rules" but will "emphasize the impact of existing regulations, the legal environment, and the complexity of dealing with multiple, overlapping regulators. He likely will call on federal regulators to tweak a provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, known as Section 404, that requires companies to assess internal controls to ensure financial reporting is accurate and reliable."

Official's Role In Bush Effort To Promote Marriage Examined. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A1, Meckler, 2.04M) reports in a front page story about the "notion that government can help children escape poverty by promoting marriage for their parents was once considered a fringe idea from right field. It is now federal policy." The Journal adds that in "very large part, that's due to Wade Horn, a child psychologist turned bureaucrat who has put marriage atop the Bush administration's limited antipoverty agenda." As "head of the federal Administration for Children and Families, Dr. Horn has employed the zeal of an ideologue and the discipline of an academic to inject marriage promotion into a host of government programs under his purview, even before Congress authorized an official marriage program. Today, more than 200 programs are at work across the country, seeking to change public attitudes surrounding marriage, persuade teenagers to aspire to matrimony and teach relationship skills to young couples." Horn has "co-opted critics, fine-tuned his rhetoric, and persuaded Congress to insert his marriage agenda into this year's welfare legislation, winning $500 million over five years." Six years "into the Bush administration, Dr. Horn is one of the few remaining political appointees interested in 'compassionate conservatism,' the slogan from the President's first campaign."

Florida 13th CD Race Could End Up Before House Administration Committee. Roll Call (11/20, McArdle, Murray) reports with "five House races around the country still unresolved as of Friday, election watchers on Capitol Hill believe it is increasingly likely that the contest for the open Florida 13th district seat could end up before the House Administration Committee, which has oversight over federal elections." In the race to fill the seat of outgoing Rep. Katherine Harris, Democrat Christine Jennings faced Republican Vern Buchanan, and it "remains the only district where both Democratic and Republican House Administration Committee staff continue to have observers on the ground." But "just as the election itself is under dispute — Buchanan was leading Jennings by 401 votes as of Friday at press time — the process for determining who decides on the winner also could be controversial, with the House about to switch hands from the Republicans to the Democrats." Florida state election officials "are slated to certify the election results Monday morning. But the contest has been marred by allegations of voting irregularities in Sarasota County." Democrats "claim electronic voting machines are to blame for almost 19,000 missing votes in the Jennings-Buchanan contest." Ed Patru, a "spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, concedes that there was a high number of 'undervotes' in the Jennings-Buchanan race," but he added "there is no evidence to suggest that anyone in district 13 who wanted to vote was unable to do so." Because the Democrats "do not take control of the House until Jan. 3, it is likely that any investigation by House Administration would be launched while Republicans are still in charge -- meaning the GOP will have the 2-1 majority on the investigating committee. But by the time the full House would be asked to seat the new Member, the Democrats would be in the majority." Meanwhile, the races "have not been called in North Carolina's 8th district, New Mexico's 1st district, and Ohio's 2nd and 15th districts. Republican incumbents are leading narrowly in all four races. Two House races -- one in Texas, the other in Louisiana -- will be decided in December runoffs."

Novak Says Senate Dissenters Block Pork. In his column in the Washington Post (11/20, 690K), Robert Novak says, "While House Republicans reacted to stinging rejection from America's voters by refusing to change leadership, their Senate counterparts have tried to use their closing weeks in power to enact a last burst of pork-barrel spending. But that effort was stalled last week by independent-minded Republican senators, spearheaded by two abrasive freshmen and one longtime hair shirt. Before Congress recessed Friday for Thanksgiving, the GOP leadership appeared to capitulate." The freshmen, "Tom Coburn and Jim DeMint, campaigning in 2004 in Oklahoma and South Carolina, promised not to fall in line with GOP leaders. Fulfilling that pledge allied them with the long-termer John McCain. They have been backed by Jeff Sessions of Alabama and another freshman, John E. Sununu of New Hampshire. In the lame-duck session's first week, they played Horatio at the Bridge by combining to block a pork-filled omnibus spending bill." That would "place responsibility for spending excesses on the new Democratic majority taking office next year. It is highly unlikely that Sen. Robert C. Byrd, a legendary king of pork returning as Appropriations Committee chairman, will reverse the habits of a lifetime and listen to ordinary voters' revulsion over excessive federal spending."

DOJ_NMG_0096387

Public Gets First Glimpses Of New Justices. The Washington Post (11/20, A15, Barnes, 690K) reports the "two newest Supreme Court justices took off the robes and took to the stump last week, providing glimpses of the fresh personalities that will reshape a court that had remained constant for more than a decade." The settings "could not have been more different. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was interviewed before a crowd of 3,000 last Monday night at the University of Miami, and his telegenic message of moderation was then broadcast to the nation on ABC's 'Nightline.'" Meanwhile, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. "spoke to his fellow members of the Federalist Society, a coalition of conservative lawyers and legal scholars who have gone from rebel outsiders to Washington insiders -- the group drew 1,500 people to its annual banquet and warranted appearances by administration leaders from Vice President Cheney on down." Roberts "provided a little something for everyone. For the feature pages, he had a cute explanation of how his jiggling son Jack almost stole the show with his hammy performance before the cameras when President Bush introduced Roberts and his family to the nation last year: 'People think Jack was dancing. He was not dancing. He was being Spiderman. He was shooting the webs off.'" Alito, "too, drew laughs with his speech Thursday night to the Federalist Society, but there was a scratchier tone to his address. He still seems a little sore about his confirmation hearings, which were tougher than what Roberts faced." Members "loved his comment that when he gets near the Hart Senate Office Building, where he spent days last November paying courtesy calls to senators, 'invariably without thinking . . . I cross to the other side of the street.'"

DISA Leads Federal Government In Embracing Telecommuting. The Washington Post (11/20, D1, Barr, 690K) reports the Defense Information Systems Agency "describes itself as providing 'global net-centric solutions' for the White House, the Pentagon and the armed forces." Most of the "engineers, computer scientists, telecommunication experts and technology wizards who work for DISA live in Northern Virginia and work in offices scattered through Arlington and Falls Church. Many are less than thrilled with the idea that by 2011 their jobs will be moved to Fort Meade, Md., as part of Defense Department base closures and realignments." To "keep from losing experienced employees, DISA has embraced telecommuting -- a way of working that the government has been slower to accept than the private sector. Of the about 2,000 DISA jobs that have been identified as suitable for telecommuting, more than 500 employees have been cleared to work from home."

Gerberding "Under Attack" Over CDC's Difficulties. Time (11/27, Gorman, 4.03M) reports Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Director Julie Gerberding is "under attack. The massive reorganization she ordered -- combined with painful budget cuts in key divisions -- seems to be tearing" the CDC apart, and "the agency has been targeted by three different congressional probes. … Nobody is claiming that the CDC has become another governmental basket case like FEMA -- at least not yet." But the "bad publicity" comes as 2007 and 2008 budgets are being drawn up, and "if lawmakers believe that Gerberding is floundering, her institution's budget will suffer."

Mint To Unveil Presidential Dollar Coin Series. USA Today (11/20, 1B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "The US Mint today is unveiling designs for its newest additions: dollar coins that will feature deceased presidents on a rotating basis, similar to the popular state quarters." More "use of dollar coins instead of bills would save the government hundreds of millions of dollars each year, even though the coins are more expensive to produce, because coins last for about 30 years, more than 16 times longer than dollar bills." In 1995, the Federal Reserve estimated that "replacing dollar bills with coins would save $500 million a year," and the savings would "likely be much bigger today, because the number of $1 bills in circulation has risen 40% in the past decade." In a USA TODAY/Gallup survey conducted Oct. 20-22, "more than half" said the presidential dollar coins was a "good idea." However, on replacing dollar bills entirely, "79% said they would oppose such a move. Even when told that replacing bills with coins would save the government $500 million a year, 69% said they still opposed making such a change." The New York Times (11/20, Healey, 1.16M) also reports the story.

DOJ_NMG_0096388

WSJournal Says FDA's Approval Of Breast Implants Is Good News. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, 2.04M) editorializes, "It took 14 years, but science finally trumped politics Friday, with the Food and Drug Administration's lifting of its longstanding ban on silicone-gel breast implants," which is "especially welcome news for mastectomy patients." One of the "ugliest aspects of the breast-implant controversy" has been "the irresponsibility of the feminist movement, whose championship of a woman's right to "choose" doesn't extend to breast implants." However, it is unlikely that the FDA's moves "closes the chapter on this nasty episode," because Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women, called Friday's announcement a "'reckless decision' and promises to seek reversal 'when the new Congress takes office.'" It's "worth remembering the enormous price that has been paid: to the credibility of the legal system, in jobs lost, and in public health," and it's worth asking "what is more toxic: the silicone implants preferred by thousands of women, or the trial bar that purports to 'protect' them."

Chances Of Congressional Reform Already Said To Be Fading. US News and World Report (11/27, Brush) writes, "Americans had ethics on their mind when they took control of Congress away from Republicans," and "both the winners and the losers promised to heed the message." But as the post-election week "wore on, and both parties turned to the business of electing new leaders, the lofty rhetoric seemed in the view of many to be giving way to the same old thing. … By week's end, reform -- substantive or otherwise -- was looking like a mighty tall order."

OTHER NEWS:

Incomes Rising At Highest Pace Since 1990s. The Christian Science Monitor (11/20, Trumbull, 59K) reports American workers' paychecks "are rising again at a pace not seen since the 1990s. The pay increase amounts to 4 percent on average over the past 12 months, and it comes at a very helpful time for millions of households." While 4 percent "may not sound like much, but you have to look back to 1997 to find a calendar year with a gain that big. Equally significant, tamer energy prices mean that the 'real' wage gains, after inflation, are above 3 percent for the past 12 months. That, too, hasn't happened since the 1990s, even though the economy has been expanding over the past five years."

Drug Industry Begins Courting Democrats. The Financial Times (11/19, Kirchgaessner) reports, "The pharmaceutical industry was in the enviable position two years ago of having the right friends in the right places in Washington." The "industry's mirrored that of other big companies and trade associations that had strengthened their ties with the Republican majority by hiring only Republican lobbyists for top positions – a practice championed by" Senator Rick Santorum (R) "that was known as the 'K Street project'." Now, "the prospects of the industry's giants have taken a turn." The industry, however, "has already" began recruiting "high-profile Democrat[s] to help it make inroads with the incoming majority party." But "for all the emphasis some lobbyists pin on hopes of making new friends in the Democratic caucus, others privately admit that the Democrats' narrow victory in the Senate means the industry is not in dire straits."

McCain Leads Early Odds For 2008 GOP Nomination. Time (11/27, 4.03M) notes the early line on the 2008 GOP nomination from betting site Tradesport.com. Sen. John McCain is at 10 to 11 (52% chance of being the nominee), followed by Rudy Giuliani at 47 to 1, Tommy Thompson at 124 to 1, and Duncan Hunter at 142 to 1.

Kerry Says "Botched" Iraq Joke Won't Affect Presidential Run. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports Sen. John Kerry "insisted on Sunday his 'botched joke' about President Bush's Iraq policy would not undermine a possible White House campaign in 2008." Asked if the "furor over his comment had caused him to reconsider a 2008 race," Kerry said, "Not in the least. The parlor game of who's up, who's down, today or tomorrow, if I listened to that stuff, I would never have won the nomination."

Kerry Claims GOP Response To His "Botched Joke" Boosted Democrats. Kerry was asked on Fox News Sunday (11/19, Wallace) if his Democratic colleagues asked him to remain out of the spotlight after the uproar over his "botched joke" regarding US troops in Iraq, Kerry answered, "First of all, obviously, it was a bad joke, and I apologized for it. And we moved on, and we should move on. You know, we had an historic election, absolutely historic. The American people spoke. And I worked very, very hard for those two years to help us elect a Democratic majority. It was clear to me that if people wanted to make that joke a distraction, I didn't want it to be. I wanted to win. … I had a discussion with a number of leaders, including my colleague Ted Kennedy and others, in order to make a judgment about what was best to accomplish the goal that I had been working for. And since you had some very close races, I thought it was important. I made the decision. It was my decision to make certain that I didn't distract. And the results are what speak for themselves. In fact, the Republicans made a terrible mistake, because they shifted the topic back to Iraq. The polls showed that we went up. They didn't want to talk about Iraq, and within two days, they tried to shift back to taxes."

DOJ_NMG_0096389

Gingrich Won't Make Decision On 2008 Until September. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports, "One of the GOP politicians mentioned in a crowded field for the White House, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, said he would not make a decision until September — a relatively late date in the campaign cycle — to focus in the private sector on trade policies." Gingrich said, "We have lots of time for personal ambition. And I think an awful lot of this early energy is wasted, and we ought to be focusing on, you know, how are you going to compete with China and India, how are you going to solve the problem in Iraq?"

Obama Seen As Main Impediment To Clinton Presidential Nomination. Newsweek (11/27, Alter, 3.12M) examines "Bill And Hillary Clinton's War Plan," saying that "unless personal concerns surface soon, the odds strongly favor" Sen. Hillary Clinton entering the presidential race "early next year. If she does, it will not be because her party is clamoring for her to do so. While her celebrity and command of issues always draw friendly crowds, they cannot be fairly described as tumultuous. While Bill is a virtuoso at weaving together seemingly unrelated threads, Hillary is still too often what one of her biographers, Michael Tomasky, calls the 'Laundry Lady,' reciting a laundry list of worthy ideas that don't yet add up to a compelling vision." While "one conventional take" says she could easily win the Democratic nomination but not a general election, "the reverse may be closer to the truth. … The last four Democratic nominees have all received more than 250 electoral votes." The "bigger problem for her would be getting past Barack Obama, who now seems poised to run." And the "primary schedule favors Obama. Hillary Clinton has no Rove-like master strategist yet (other than her husband), but the logic of her front-runner game plan suggests building a firewall in the South to recover if she's upset in Iowa or New Hampshire." But that plan "doesn't account for Obama, who would likely crush her among black voters."

Edwards Says Obama Should Run In 2008. The AP (11/20, Yen) reports former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, "the 2004 Democratic nominee for vice president, said Illinois Sen. Barack Obama should get into the race." Edwards said, "I hope he runs. I think he should run. This is such an important job that I would urge anybody who can make a serious contribution to the campaign and the dialogue — either in our party or the other party — to run." The AP adds Edwards "isn't yet willing to commit to another run for president."

Dean Addresses Gay Leadership Conference. The Washington Times (11/20, Pierce, 88K) "Inside Politics" column reports DNC Chairman Howard Dean said his party "needs to look beyond getting homosexuals and minorities a place at the table and instead work toward getting them on the ballot." Addressing the International Gay & Lesbian Leadership Conference in Houston this weekend, Dean said, "We've got to share power, not just responsibility, from now on." Dean "said little about issues such as same-sex 'marriage' or discrimination laws, and instead addressed broader Democratic agendas, such as raising the minimum wage."

Dean Models DNC Leadership On Ron Brown. US News and World Report (11/27, Bedard) reports in "Washington Whispers" that DNC Chairman Howard Dean has taken to saying his model for the job is late ex-chairman Ron Brown. Both "entered the job as outsiders under fire from moderates who worried that they were too liberal. Both surprised the establishment by raising tons of money. Both took a shattered party and built a national organization geared to winning a presidential election." And both "focused on the key Democratic demographic -- blacks. Brown brought African-Americans to the table," and Dean wants to put "more blacks on the ballot. 'It's going to be about opportunities and a place on the ticket,' says Dean. 'Ron Brown was really the beginning of that.'"

Christian Leaders Said To Risk Losing Credibility Over Homosexuality. In a USA Today op-ed (11/20), Baptist minister Oliver "Buzz" Thomas says, "What if Christian leaders are wrong about homosexuality? I suppose, much as a newspaper maintains its credibility by setting the record straight, church leaders would need to do the same: Correction: Despite what you might have read, heard or been taught throughout your churchgoing life, homosexuality is, in fact, determined at birth and is not to be condemned by God's followers." Religion's "only real commodity, after all, is its moral authority. Lose that, and we lose our credibility. Lose credibility, and we might as well close up shop." Christianity "is in danger of squandering its moral authority by continuing its pattern of discrimination against gays and lesbians in the face of mounting scientific evidence that sexual orientation has little or nothing to do with choice. To the contrary, whether sexual orientation arises as a result of the mother's hormones or the child's brain structure or DNA, it is almost certainly an accident of birth. The point is this: Without choice, there can be no moral culpability."

Defeat Of Arizona Gay Marriage Ban Examined. The Washington Post (11/20, A3, Geis, 690K) reports retirees Al Breznay, 79, and Maxine Piatt, 75, "were pivotal in defeating an Arizona initiative that defined marriage as the union of one man and one woman -- the only one of 28 such state measures ever to fail." Breznay, "a retired mechanic who still does odd jobs to bring in extra cash, and Piatt, a former bank teller, are at the forefront of a strategy to defeat a tide of same-sex marriage bans by talking about straight people." Of those "28 state marriage initiatives, 17 have included language outlawing domestic partnerships. Gay rights advocates see this as an opening to highlight for heterosexual voters the impact such initiatives may have on them, and in Arizona, activists kept the spotlight on couples such as Breznay and Piatt, registered domestic partners whose faces appeared on fliers and television ads." The campaign "against the Arizona measure, Proposition 107, avoided almost any mention of gay marriage, except in small liberal pockets of the state. Instead, the message was about the section of the measure that would have banned government agencies from recognizing civil unions or domestic partnerships." That "apparently struck home in the state's sizable senior-citizen enclaves, where many older couples do not marry because their retirement income would be affected. The initiative was defeated, 52 percent to 48 percent."

DOJ_NMG_0096390

Foley Ends Stay At Rehabilitation Facility. Roll Call (11/20, Akers) reports ex-Rep. Mark Foley "ended his stay at a rehab facility in Arizona that treats alcohol addiction as well as sexual addiction and compulsion before he headed back to Florida to attend the funeral of his father." Foley "faces a Florida criminal investigation into his sexually explicit Internet messages."

Four Defeated GOP Lawmakers Live On Same D Street Block. In his Washington Post (11/20, A15, 690K) "Inside The Loop" column, Al Kamen writes, "Incoming Democrats: Alert! Do not, repeat, not, buy a home on the 100 block of D Street SE on Capitol Hill. It may be jinxed." The block is home to GOP Reps. Chris Chocola, Clay Shaw, Jim Ryun, and Nancy Johnson, who all lost their seats this month. Another resident: ex-Rep. Mark Foley.

Food Banks Falling Behind Demand For Holiday Assistance. USA Today (11/20, Koch, 2.27M) reports the nation's "food banks are scrambling to serve a growing demand for help during the holidays at a time when government food donations and private cash contributions have fallen." More people are "asking for food even as the amount of government commodities available — milk, cheese, canned goods and other staples — is down 55% from 2005, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. A second USDA program of emergency food aid has stayed about the same. Together, they supply about one-fourth of what food banks give away." USDA "buys fewer commodities when it has less need to boost farm prices. It gives 80% of purchases to America's Second Harvest, a network of more than 200 food banks."

NYTimes Criticizes Government Decision To Not Use Word "Hunger." The New York Times (11/20, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "First the good news: the government's annual hunger report shows a slight decline last year in the number of citizens in need of food. Now the bad news: the annual hunger report has dropped the word 'hunger.' Instead, there were 35 million Americans last year suffering from 'low food security,' meaning they chronically lacked the resources to be able to eat enough food." To the "extent that more public empathy is needed to prod a stronger attack on low food security, we opt for 'hunger' as a most stirring word."

Studies Find Minority Test Performance Gap Persists. The New York Times (11/20, Dillon, 1.16M) reports that when President Bush "signed his sweeping education law a year into his presidency, it set 2014 as the deadline by which schools were to close the test-score gaps between minority and white students that have persisted since standardized testing began." Now, as Congress "prepares to consider reauthorizing the law next year, researchers and a half-dozen recent studies, including three issued last week, are reporting little progress toward that goal. Slight gains have been seen for some grade levels." Despite "concerted efforts by educators, the test-score gaps are so large that, on average, African-American and Hispanic students in high school can read and do arithmetic at only the average level of whites in junior high school."

States Struggle To Fund Transportation Needs. USA Today (11/20, Copeland, 2.27M) reports on the "many local efforts around the country to bridge the gap between the federal, state and local funds available for transportation and what's needed." Nationwide, the "gap tops $100 billion a year, says Gary Maring of the transportation consulting firm Cambridge Systematics, which studied the issue last year for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce." The "potentially most far-reaching financing initiative is a pilot program in Oregon that is testing the feasibility of a 'virtual tollway' system that would replace the state gas tax with a road-user fee." Volunteers "driving vehicles equipped with state-installed Global Positioning System (GPS) devices pull into gas stations where a transmitter in their car 'tells' the pump how many miles they have driven. They then pay for their gas and 1.2 cents for every mile they've driven since their last fill-up; they don't have to pay the 24-cent-per-gallon state gas tax."

Allen's "Macaca" Gaffe Seen As Worst Self-Inflicted Wound Of 2006. In his Roll Call column (11/20), Stuart Rothenberg discusses the "Worst Self-Inflicted Wound Of 2006." The "nominees" are Reps. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.), Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Sens. George Allen (R-Va.) and John Kerry (D-Mass.), and Reps. John Sweeney (R-N.Y.) and Mark Foley (R-Fla.). Rothenberg picks Allen for his "'macaca' comment," which "not only brought about his own defeat and destroyed his once considerable chances of winning the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 but he also realigned the nation's entire governing balance for the next two years. Because of that jaw-dropping achievement, the award for worst self-inflicted wound must go to Allen. But it was a very close contest."

DOJ_NMG_0096391

MSNBC Gives Greater Emphasis To Politics, Opinion. In the Washington Post's "Media Notes" column (11/20, C1), Howard Kurtz says, "MSNBC has seen the future, and it is politics. Delivered with plenty of opinion. Preferably with lots of cameo appearances by big-name news stars from the mothership." The "perennial third-place cable news channel enjoyed a nice bump in the ratings during the midterm campaign, in part because the likes of Brian Williams, Tim Russert, David Gregory and Campbell Brown broke away from their NBC duties to help out." MSNBC General Manager Dan Abrams "doesn't plan to put on 'all politics all the time until 2008,' Abrams says he wants to continue 'branding' MSNBC as a haven for political junkies." Kurtz adds MSNBC "has done well in other campaigns, only to have the gains vanish after Election Day. All of cable news tends to get big spikes during major stories -- war, scandal, missing white women -- that fade when the news cycle moves on."

WSJournal Says AHI Can Improve. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A16, 2.04M) editorializes that it's "encouraging that America's private health insurers are thinking about ways to preserve a competitive market for health services," but America's Health Insurance Plans (AHI)" should do "more to promote a genuine free market in health care." It's "one really good idea is the creation of something called a Universal Health Account, which would end the tax bias that lets employers deduct health care expenditures but doesn't let individuals do the same." The 2003 Medicare bill's Health Savings Accounts (HAS) would not just "go a long way toward making insurance more affordable for those who don't get it from their employers," but would also "provide incentives to move beyond the employer-based insurance system." The "biggest disappointment" is that the insurers "aren't calling for a national market in health insurance -- which is essential if their Universal Health Accounts are to work as well as they should."

NYTimes Urges New York Officials To Use Public Transportation. The New York Times (11/20, 1.16M) editorializes, "The answer to one question raised by the scandal involving State Comptroller Alan Hevesi should be easy: public officials could take public transportation as a matter of public policy." The issue of public officials unrestricted access to cars and drivers would not be a problem if the state "would follow Mayor Michael Bloomberg's lead," but using the subway. Even though there are "no subways in Albany, and the bus and taxi services are meager, there is "something to be said for anything that reminds public officials that they are no different from other citizens who struggle with traffic jams and subway doors and the ordinary hazards of moving about."

APEC Statement On North Korea Seen As Falling Short Of US Goal. The Financial Times (11/20, Daniel, Beattie, Kazmin) reports that APEC members Sunday "presented a united front to North Korea, urging it to start dismantling its nuclear weapons program." However, the Times says US officials "had wanted a formal published statement to show the combined resolve of countries in the region surrounding North Korea. But they could manage only an oral statement." NSC spokesman David McCormick said the statement was "very firm in the need for full implementation" of the UNSCR 1695 and 1718" and stressed that "what was important was the leaders of APEC coming together in a common statement." Meanwhile, Secretary Rice cited Vietnam as an example, saying, "If the leaders of Burma and North Korea were to follow the example of Vietnam, if they made the strategic choice and took the necessary steps to join the international community, then it would open a new path to peace and prosperity."

The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports that "un a separate discussion, McCormick said, Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao had agreed 'on the path ahead' in dealing with North Korea. McCormick and White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush and Hu had not set specific conditions to present to Pyongyang." The Korean situation also "formed a backdrop to a meeting between Bush and President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia."

ABC World News (11/19, lead story, 2:50, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported Bush "pushed leaders to push North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons program. The results were not as tough as the US had hoped." Similarly, in an analysis of this weekend's summit, AFP (11/20, Harmsen) says the "closed-doors diplomacy…came nowhere nearer to resolving the crisis over North Korea's nuclear dream, analysts say -- and may even have made matters worse." According to AFP, "Some analysts saw the general absence here of results on North Korea as a failure of US leadership, following the Republican Party's defeat in mid-term elections earlier this month."

The AP (11/20, Alexander) notes that although "they would not put it in writing," the APEC members "joined together Sunday to say they worry about North Korea's nuclear weapons program and to urge the reclusive country to resume disarmament negotiations." The AP says the "method of delivery provided a curious culmination to the issue that overshadowed" the summit.

Under the headline "US Stance On North Korea Hits Hurdles At Summit," the Wall Street Journal (11/20, A5, Dreazen, Ramstad, 2.04M) says the Bush administration's "efforts to raise international pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear program hit a series of roadblocks" at the summit. Among them, the US was "unable to persuade the other 20 APEC member states to issue a written statement about North Korea's nuclear program." Instead, the administration "settled for Vietnamese President Nguyen Minh Triet taking the unusual step of delivering a statement to reporters in Hanoi expressing concern about North Korea." Meanwhile, White House officials said Bush "used at least one of his private meetings with other leaders to detail the incentives the US was prepared to give North Korea if it gave up its nuclear program." The Washington Post (11/20, Fletcher, 690K) runs a similar report, titled "Pacific Rim Statement On N. Korea Falls Short Of What Bush Sought,"

DOJ_NMG_0096392

Bush Touts Trade As Conducive To Political Freedom. USA Today (11/20, Jackson, 2.27M) reports "global trade issues dominated the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum President Bush attended this weekend in Hanoi. He sought to expand the US business presence in Vietnam and other parts of Asia." The President "met with leaders from Vietnam, China, Russia, Japan, Australia and South Korea, urging an expansion of free trade. However, Bush headed to Vietnam without congressional approval to widen Vietnam trade more quickly." Today, Bush "plans to underscore US commercial ties by visiting Vietnam's stock market before he heads to Indonesia, where crowds Sunday protested Bush's visit. … Economic expansion helps political freedom, Bush said last week, adding that 'by opening up to trade, countries build wealth and empower their citizens.'"

The New York Times (11/20, Sanger, Cooper, 1.16M) reports on Bush's visit to Ho Chi Minh City, a "booming, wildly capitalist commercial center of an ostensibly Communist Vietnam," where he stopped by "the stock exchange to talk with local business leaders before preparing for a quick visit to Indonesia. … As he has throughout his trip, Mr. Bush has avoided dwelling on America's past with Vietnam, though it is difficult in a city like this one, filled with so much potent symbolism of American defeat."

The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A5, Hookway, 2.04M) reports "the US and other Pacific Rim countries said they were prepared to cut farm subsidies and tariffs to revive stalled world trade talks, putting pressure on other economic powers such as the European Union, Brazil and India to follow suit. Leaders at the summit of the 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum also said they would consider a free-trade area of their own if the global talks fail." The Journal adds, "The initiative may not break the deadlock over politically sensitive farm subsidies that stalled the so-called Doha Round of talks, which began in 2001 under the auspices of the World Trade Organization. Some trade officials attending the summit say global trade talks could remain on hold despite the offer. … The idea of an APEC free-trade area was introduced in 2004. It was quickly dropped, largely because hopes were still high the WTO negotiations could provide a more direct route to freer trade."

Russia, US Sign Trade Pact. The AP (11/20, Nicholson) reports, "Russia and the United States signed a key trade agreement Sunday, removing the last major obstacle in Moscow's 13-year journey to join the World Trade Organization. The deal, inked on the sidelines of a gathering of Pacific Rim economies, is a powerful vote of confidence in Russia -- the largest economy still outside the 149-member WTO -- and signals its integration into the global trading system." It also "marks a bright spot in the two countries' relations that have been marred by disagreements over Iran's controversial nuclear program and Washington's fears of a roll back of democratic freedoms under Russian President Vladimir Putin."

China, South Korea To Discuss Trade Agreement. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, 2.04M) reports, "China and South Korea will start talks next year on the feasibility of a free-trade agreement, China's official Xinhua news agency reported." Xinhua "said an agreement on the talks was reached at a meeting late Friday between Chinese Commerce Minister Bo Xilai and South Korean Trade Minister Kim Hyun Chong."

Bush Urged To Mount Domestic Campaign In Support Of Free Trade. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (11/20), "Having failed to convince fellow Republicans of the merits of comprehensive immigration reform…Bush now faces the even more difficult task of defending free trade against protectionist Democrats. A tide of populism, protectionism, nationalism and xenophobia is washing over the country, fueled by right-wing radio talk show hosts, CNN firebrand Lou Dobbs -- and legitimate concerns that US workers are falling behind in the global struggle for jobs and good wages. … Even though his influence is at its all-time lowest ebb, Bush somehow needs to mount a campaign to convince Americans that their continued prosperity depends on an open world trading system."

In his Washington Post column (11/20), Sebastian Mallaby says the partisan split on trade is "is undermining the U.S. ability to play its traditional postwar role in driving global trade liberalization. And if anti-trade Democrats can win elections when unemployment stands at 4.4 percent, they may do even better next time." To "forge a bipartisan consensus, we need a different approach. Here is a three-part formula." Democrats "need to be honest about development in the poor world," because "the real key to raising living standards is economic growth. And growth, in turn, is highly correlated with trade openness." Instead, Democrats "should be frank about their real reason for ambivalence on trade, which is that some Americans suffer from it." Republicans "need to get serious about the fact that, since 1980 or so, real incomes for the majority of Americans have stagnated." And "both parties should cooperate on overhauling the nation's farm program, which comes up for renewal next year."

DOJ_NMG_0096393

Bush Defends Religious Freedom In Visit To Vietnamese Church. The AP (11/20, Loven) reports, "Though no sermon was delivered Sunday in the church where President Bush took a 'moment to converse with God,' he offered his own precept outside. 'A whole society is a society which welcomes basic freedoms,' Bush said, adding that there's none more basic than 'the freedom to worship as you see fit.'" The President and First Lady Laura Bush "visited Cua Bac Church, a Catholic basilica on a tree-lined street in the diplomatic district, to show support for Vietnam's faithful, who live under a government that tightly controls religious institutions." Said Bush, "It's our way of expressing our personal faith and at the same time urging societies to feel comfortable with and confident in saying to their people, 'If you feel like praising God, you're allowed to do so in any way you see fit.'" The AP adds "just this month, the United States removed Vietnam from a list of the world's worst violators of religious freedom."

Massive Protests Await Bush In Indonesia. The AP (11/20, Hunt) reports, "Warmly greeted by world leaders in Vietnam, President Bush drew a different reaction Sunday at his upcoming stop in Indonesia, where thousands angrily protested America's policy in the Middle East and wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The White House said it was confident about security precautions for Bush's visit Monday despite police warnings of an increased threat of attack by al-Qaida-linked groups." Bush "was to spend just six hours in Indonesia, most of it at Bogor Palace, a presidential retreat outside the capital of Jakarta and far from the scene of protests Sunday where Bush was denounced as a 'war criminal' and 'terrorist.'"

ABC World News (11/19, lead story, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) reported on the "massive street protest and mounting terror threats that await…Bush as he heads to Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim country. It's the next stop on his week-long Asia trip, a visit deemed so dangerous, the President won't even spend the night." ABC (Raddatz) added, "The demonstrations have been widespread and personal. Wanted, George Bush, dead or alive, for crimes against humanity and the planet. With tens of thousands more protesters chanting 'America, America, terrorist, terrorist.' … In recent days, warnings for an Al Qaeda-linked attack have increased dramatically, which security officials are taking deadly seriously, given the hundreds who have already been killed in attacks there."

The Washington Times (11/20, Curl, 88K) reports, "Despite the protests in Jakarta, the United States is viewed positively by many Indonesians for its swift response to the tsunami that struck the islands nearly two years ago, killing 100,000. Almost 60 percent of Indonesians surveyed nationwide said that American assistance made them favorable to the United States, according to Terror Free Tomorrow, a nonpartisan group that includes Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, as an adviser."

More Commentary. Author Sadanand Dhurme writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/20, A16, 2.04M) that when Bush "arrives in Indonesia today, he'll find perhaps the most dramatic reversal of fortunes in recent times," because today, Indonesia "is viewed as a sort of Southeast Asian Bangladesh: a cesspool of corruption, buffeted alternately by terrorist violence and natural disasters." Yet Indonesia "also presents an exceptional opportunity," as it is the "only major Muslim country where modernity stands a fighting chance, or to put it starkly, where the options are not between bad and worse, but between good and bad." Indonesia "boasts advantages that others lack: an innate tolerance bequeathed to its people by nearly a millennium and a half of Hindu-Buddhism." It "won't be easy," with "homegrown Islamists and their wealthy Arab patrons," but "simple certitudes of Islamism…deeply appeal to many," and add to "this the peculiar subculture of Western academia and NGOs, whose efforts to inoculate themselves against that mysterious new ailment, Islamophobia."

IAEA Meets To Considers Iran Request For Nuclear Aid. As the IAEA prepares to meet Monday in Vienna, the AP (11/20, Jahn) reports that a "Western push to deny Iran technical help in building a plutonium-producing reactor has gathered enough support to be approved," diplomats said Sunday. However, "differences both within the Western camp and more broadly among different factions…on how harshly to punish Iran for its nuclear defiance persisted on the eve of the opening meeting Monday, said the diplomats." The AP notes that "normally, the United States takes the lead in demanding tough action against Tehran…But with council agreement on sanctions mired down because of Russian and Chinese efforts to block tough punishment, diplomats said the Americans have taken a back seat to France."

In a front page article, the New York Times (11/20, A1, Broad, 1.16M) reports that Iran is seeking "technical aid" to assist with its building of "a heavy-water nuclear reactor" in Arak that Tehran says will produce "radioactive isotopes for medical treatments. As an unavoidable byproduct, it will also make plutonium." The Times notes that although assistance is "routinely granted," the US and its allies "say the agency should deny Iran's request. Helping make Arak's operations safe, they say, would only speed the reactor's completion -- and Iran's emergence as a nuclear power. But some developing nations say that a rebuff to the Iranians would set a bad precedent that could threaten their own peaceful atomic pursuits."

DOJ_NMG_0096394

State Department Opens Office In Dubai To Monitor Iran. Under the headline "US Sets Up A Perch In Dubai To Keep An Eye On Iran," the New York Times (11/20, A3, Fattah, 1.16M) reports that "a group of State Department officials has been setting up offices" in Dubai "as part of an ambitious effort by the United States to better monitor Iran and encourage political change there." The Times notes that the State Dept. announced early this year that it would open the office in Dubai and set up an Iran desk in Washington "to make contact with Iranians and improve its institutional knowledge of the country at a time when tensions over Iran's nuclear ambitions are high." Dubai was selected due to its "large community of Iranian businesspeople" and because the UAE has "become a nexus of political activity concerning Iran, as numerous governments and groups have seized on the country's location and its longstanding ties with Tehran to get a better understanding of Iran and its people." On Friday, Undersecretary Burns "said the Dubai office was created in the spirit of the Riga station in Latvia, which became a critical source of knowledge about the Soviet Union at a time when the United States did not have diplomatic relations with Moscow." Burns noted that when Secretary Rice joined the department last year "it had only two people working on Iran issues," and "today eight are assigned to the Iran desk in Washington and six in the Dubai office, which is within the American consulate."

"Hard-Line Cleric" Leading Candidate To Become Top Ayatollah. The Washington Times (11/20, Freeman, 88K) reports, "A hard-line cleric who opposes all dialogue with the West is a leading contender to become Iran's next supreme spiritual leader." In "a move that would push the country even further into the diplomatic wilderness," Ayatollah Mohammad Taghi Mesbah-Yazdi," who publicly backs the use of suicide bombers against Israel, is campaigning to succeed Grand Ayatollah Ali Khameini, 67, as the head of the Islamic state." The Times adds, "Considered an extremist even by fellow mullahs, he was a fringe figure in Iran's theocracy until last year's election of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a fellow fundamentalist who views him as his ideological mentor. He is known to many Iranians as 'Professor Crocodile' because of a notorious cartoon that depicted him weeping false tears over the imprisoning of a reformist journalist."

Palestinians Form Human Shields To Prevent Israeli Air Strikes. ABC World News (11/19, story 5, 2:00, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Hundreds of civilians risk their lives today in the Palestinian territories. They were trying out a new tactic, acting as human shields in the face of threatened Israeli air strikes. Israeli warplanes have destroyed 15 homes of suspected militants in the Gaza Strip over the last 3 days. But as ABC's Wilf Dinnick reports, today, they were forced to hold off." ABC (Dinnick) added, "They came to the house by the dozens, filling the rooms and crowing the roof. Creating a human shield to protect the home of this man, Mahmoud Baroud, who is part of a militant group known to fire rockets at Israel. Last night Baroud got a call from the Israeli army, a 30-minute warning before an air strike would destroy his home. He ran to his roof, called for help and hundreds came." Although "Israeli army officials will not say whether" the shields "have forced them to change their tactics," they do "admit it is a worrisome development."

The New York Times (11/20, A8, Fisher, 1.16M) reports "Palestinians celebrated" the tactic "as a possibly potent new defense against air raids that Israel might find difficult to counter." Prime Minister Ismail Haniya said Sunday, "We are so proud of this national stand. It's the first step toward protecting our homes, the homes of our children." The AP (11/20, El Deeb) says the shields also "forced Israel to…re-evaluate a mainstay of its aerial campaign in Gaza." The Los Angeles Times (11/20, Boudreaux, Alouf, 850K) reports Israel said that "it had called off a planned aerial bombardment of a Palestinian militant's home after about 200 of his supporters, in a new defensive tactic, rushed to form a human shield around the residence. The mass mobilization in the Gaza Strip is believed to be the first employed by Palestinians to prevent an Israeli air strike." The AP (11/20, El Deeb) and Washington Times (11/20, El Deeb, 88K) also report the story.

Olmert Criticizes UN Resolution On Gaza Air Strike. AFP (11/20) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Sunday criticized a UN General Assembly resolution passed Friday calling for a fact-finding mission to probe an Israeli artillery strike that killed 19 Palestinians this month. During his weekly cabinet meeting, Olmert said, "We have no doubt that it is the State of Israel which must respond to attacks on civilians. We have expressed our deepest regret over this. But those who preach morality and roll their eyes have yet to see fit to initiate a resolution in condemnation of those who are shooting with the goal of hitting civilians as a long-range, systematic policy."

Nasrallah Calls For Protests Against Beirut. The New York Times (11/20, A8, Bakri, Slackman, 1.16M) reports Hezbollah leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, "pressed his case for bringing down Lebanon's government in a message broadcast Sunday, once again calling for peaceful demonstrations to topple what he described as an 'illegitimate and unconstitutional' government controlled by Washington." According to the Times, Nasrallah used his appearance on Al Manar television "to try to win political support by playing to the deep resentment many Lebanese harbor against the United States for having refused to press for an early end to Israel's war with Hezbollah." Sheik Nasrallah sought to characterize his goals in purely domestic terms, insisting that Hezbollah was not doing the bidding of Iran or Syria — as his opponents have charged." The AP (11/20, Dakroub) also reports the story.

DOJ_NMG_0096395

India Test-Fires Missile. The New York Times/AP (11/20, Press) reports that on Sunday, India "successfully test-fired a medium-range missile capable of carrying nuclear warheads days after its rival, Pakistan, had launched a similar missile." The Indian missile, "called the Prithvi," was "fired into the Bay of Bengal from a test range in Chandipur in the eastern state of Orissa." The missile test Sunday was "routine" and "part of the country's air defense exercises," and a Pakistan Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, said Sunday that India "had informed Pakistan ahead of time, as is its standard procedure."

Blair, Musharraf Meet, Strengthen Ties. The New York Times (11/20, Masood, 1.16M) reports, "Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan agreed Sunday to strengthen their nations' cooperation on counterterrorism and other fields, and they stressed the need for political and economic measures along with the use of military force to bring peace in Afghanistan." Blair said relations between Pakistan and Britain were at "their highest point." General Musharraf "brushed off criticism from Afghanistan and the West that Pakistan was not doing enough to curb cross-border infiltration by fighters linked to the Taliban, Afghanistan's ousted rulers," while Blair said "more work needed to be done." Blair's visit included an "assistance package intended to revamp the country's religious schools," a "long-term partnership arrangement to reduce poverty and help Pakistan achieve United Nations goals for development, and both "agreed to increase cooperation between their intelligence services to combat terrorism, illegal immigration and transnational organized crime." Britain also "plans to deliver two MI-17 helicopters in April to the Pakistani antinarcotics force for their antismuggling operation along the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan." During his visit, Blair also "met with Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz and with moderate Islamic religious leaders and went to the Faisal Mosque."

Somali Ambush Kills Six Ethiopians. The New York Times/AP (11/20, Press) reports, "Islamic fighters ambushed an Ethiopian military convoy on Sunday, killing six Ethiopian soldiers and wounding 20 others, witnesses said, in the first known fight between the rival forces maneuvering for control in Somalia." Land mines destroyed two Ethiopian trucks before Islamic fighters "opened fire on the convoy…made up of more than 80 vehicles and headed for Baidoa," which is the headquarters of the so-called transitional government. Sheik Abdirahim Ali Mudey, a spokesman for the Islamic Courts Union, which controls Mogadishu, and most of southern Somalia, said "four Ethiopian trucks were destroyed and some soldiers were killed, but he denied that his group was responsible," and said the fighting was "'a popular uprising' by villagers opposed to Ethiopian troops in Somalia."

Somalia A Rising Hotbed Of Islamic Extremism. Time (11/27, Dealey, 4.03M) runs a story on Somalia called "Terror's Playground," saying that now that the Islamic Courts Union militias "have consolidated their claim to Mogadishu and expanded their control to include most of Somalia," the fear is that the country, "with nearly 9 million Muslims and one that the U.S. has long suspected is a haven for al-Qaeda, may fall further into the hands of Islamic fundamentalists sympathetic to terrorist organizations."

Pope Has Become Unexpected Critic Of Islamic Violence. Time (11/27, Van Biema, Israely, 4.03M) runs a 3,500-word cover story on Pope Benedict XVI and Islam, saying that when the Pope travels to Turkey next week, he will arrive carrying the reputation "of a hard-knuckle intellect with a taste for blunt talk and interreligious confrontation. Just 19 months into his tenure, the Pope has become as much a moral lightning rod as a theologian; suddenly, when he speaks, the whole world listens. And so what takes place over four days in three Turkish cities has the potential to define his papacy -- and a good deal more. Few people saw this coming." He "was expected to sustain John Paul's conservative line," but "this year he has emerged as a far more compelling and complex figure than anyone had imagined. And much of that has to do with his willingness to confront what some people feel is today's equivalent of the communist scourge -- the threat of Islamic violence." Also in Time, First Things editor Father Richard John Neuhaus writes about "What The Pope Gets Right" on Islam, while Oxford's Tariq Ramadan considers "Where He's Still In The Dark."

Sudanese Military Attacks North Darfur. The AP (11/20, De Montesquiou) reports, "A large force of Sudanese soldiers backed by allied janjaweed militiamen is sweeping through North Darfur, killing civilians and looting and burning villages in violation of a cease-fire agreement, international observers and rebels said Sunday." At least four civilians "were killed near the northern town of Birmaza on Sunday," and "200 pro-government janjaweed fighters riding camels had moved into the zone, backed by mobile army units and the Sudanese air force." The African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur said "it had received reports that the Sudanese air force twice bombed Birmaza this week," and the attacks were a "flagrant violation" of the Darfur Peace Agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0096396

Earlier this week, the army "denied it was conducting an offensive in North Darfur, and categorically denied it was using the janjaweed to attack civilians." On Saturday, UN chief of humanitarian affairs Jan Egeland said "he had been barred by Sudanese authorities from visiting several of the areas where fighting is now reported." Sudan's government has rejected the UN Security Council resolution, but this week "appeared to accept a compromise in which a mixed U.N.-AU force would take over."

Nicaragua's Anti-Abortion Law Becomes Stricter. The New York Times (11/20, McKinley, 1.16M) reports, "Hopes among women's groups in Nicaragua that President Enrique Bolaños would stop one of the most restrictive abortion laws in Latin America from taking effect have been dashed, as the president signed it into law late Friday." The new law "strikes out a clause that made it possible for a woman to obtain an abortion legally when three doctors certified that unless she did, her own life would be in danger." It was the "the fruit of the recent presidential election, as conservatives saw a chance to gain its passage in Parliament during the election season." For months, the proposed law "has drawn fierce criticism from several local women's groups, the country's association of gynecologists, the United Nations, the World Health Organization and Human Rights Watch, among others."

Exiled KGB Operative Poisoned In Britain. The New York Times (11/20, Cowell, 1.16M) reports that on Sunday, the British police said "they were investigating the suspected poisoning of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a Russian former K.G.B. operative living in exile in Britain who had been inquiring into the killing of a journalist in Moscow last month." The Sunday Times of London said "the former agent had met Nov. 1 with an Italian contact identified only as Mario in a central London sushi bar," and last week, Litvinenko "told reporters he began to feel sick within hours of the meeting with Mario." John Henry, a clinical toxicologist who has been treating Litvinenko, told the BBC, "He's got a prospect of recovering. He's a got a prospect of dying." He also identified the poison as "thallium, a toxic metal used in rat poison and insecticides." Friend Alex Goldfarb, said Litvinenko is "one of the top public enemies of the Russian F.S.B. and of Putin, particularly because of his book," and that he belonged to "the so-called London émigré circle, which was branded by Russia as a terrorist cell on British soil." Russian authorities had "no immediate comment on suggestions in news reports that the Russian secret service had poisoned Mr. Litvinenko, who is hospitalized and seriously ill, because he had criticized former colleagues and President Vladimir V. Putin."

The Washington Post (11/20, Jordan, 690K) reports that British police "have placed him under protective guard at a London hospital." Goldfarb said that "precious time was wasted because even though Litvinenko thought he had been poisoned immediately after the lunch meeting, doctors did not become alarmed until nearly two weeks later, when his hair started falling out as his condition worsened." He added, "What happened here is an assassination attempt perpetuated by Russian agents. I thought he would be safe here on British soil."

ABC World News (11/19, story 6, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "ABC correspondent Mike Lee added that Goldfarb said, "He looks terrible. He looks like a ghost, actually. He lost all his hair. He hasn't eaten for 18 days." Lee: "He has accused his former bosses in Russia's intelligence service of murder. His friends say this is payback. One question leads to another. Why use a slow-acting poison that would give your target time to get medical help? Why not just stab him with your umbrella and dump him in the river like proper spies used to do? And who might have approved of his death? That's where it gets really intriguing."

G-20 Membership Divided On Energy Policy. The Wall Street Journal (11/20, A6, Brown, 2.04M) reports, "A two-day annual meeting of the Group of 20 finance ministers and central bankers accepted that rising global demand for energy and minerals will threaten to spark higher inflation. Underscoring the challenges faced by policy makers, an International Energy Agency paper presented to the meeting projected energy demand will grow 50% in the next 25 years." But "[t]he issues of carbon taxes and greenhouse-gas emissions bedeviled attempts to reach a strategy for reining in demand and stabilizing prices. A push by some countries such as Russia, France and India to embrace nuclear power as a way to diversify energy consumption and reduce climate-changing emissions was another topic that split the G-20 membership." The Journal adds, "U.S. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt said that in the wake of higher prices, oil-producing countries needed to avoid supply disruptions and adopt investment codes that reflect best practices around the world."

Mexican Economic Policies Said To Cripple Energy Industry. The Washington Times (11/20, Mihailescu, 88K) reports, "Mexico, the No. 2 U.S. supplier of oil, is unable to produce enough to meet the demands of its customers, especially its neighbor to the north, because of outdated national economic policies that have hamstrung its oil and gas exploration and production, analysts say. ... Although Mexico has the potential to be an energy powerhouse, the country's national oil company, Pemex, lacks the investment funds to improve production in mature fields." The Times adds, "Although Canada plans to boost production, it cannot make up for the shortfall caused by Mexico's export decline. The shortfall will force the United States to seek alternative suppliers, which will likely increase prices, according to analysts."

DOJ_NMG_0096397

Ban Starts UN Administration Hiring Process. The Washington Times (11/20, Pisik, 88K) reports, "The jockeying for top jobs in a new U.N. administration has begun in earnest with the arrival in New York of incoming Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon," as "senior management in some departments will be replaced for the first time in a decade or more, forcing longtime staffers out of their sinecures" and giving Ban "an opportunity to remake the organization to his liking." Ban arrived at the United Nations on Thursday, and is "is expected to spend most of the next six weeks in New York, except for brief trips back to Seoul and at least one visit to Washington." He is also "expected to announce his senior staff appointments -- including a chief of staff and deputy secretary-general -- shortly after he is sworn in as the eighth U.N. secretary-general on Dec. 14. He takes full charge of the organization on Jan. 1." Departing Secretary-General Kofi Annan has "refused to approve long-term contracts for most senior management," leaving Ban "a free hand to select his own heads of major departments."

Prime Minister Calls For Kosovar Independence. In the Wall Street Journal (11/20, 2.04M) Kosovo's Prime Minister Agim Ceku writes in an op-ed that Kosovo is "ready for independence, and now is not the time to stop the clock." There are "two things we must do in Kosovo to succeed as a progressive and a modern independent state. First, we should further improve our institutions to achieve more transparency and a functioning legal system. Second, we need a broad political commitment to development and modernization." Independence "is only the first step and, in itself, is insufficient to provide for Kosovo's future." Kosovo could survive as Ceku's government "has adopted a proactive '3E' plan for Kosovo based on energy, economy and education." Kosovo "can in a few years become a net electricity exporter, with large deposits of coal." Also, "with the right technology we can even do this with an environmental face." Now is not the time to "lose sight" of the EU's "strategic goal" which is "a Europe whole and free."

WPost Says Japan Should Worry About Decreasing Population. The Washington Post (11/20, A17, Fred Hiatt, 690K) writes in an op-ed column, "Japan has embarked on a path no developed nation has ever followed -- of sustained and inexorable population decline." Japan "shrank by about 21,000 last year, and "is in the forefront, and so everyone else will be watching." Hitoshi Suzuki, "a cheerful senior researcher" at Daiwa Institute of Research, "pronounces himself 'not so worried' and last year, he wrote "Population Decline is Not Something We Need to Fear." For a population "to hold steady, every woman must give birth on average to 2.1 children," and Japan clocked in at 1.25 last year. As a result, Japan's population, "now about 128 million, is expected to fall to about 100 million by mid-century," but "in truth," Japan "doesn't seem to want to change as it would have to in order to increase the birthrate."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Army Gives Rumsfeld Doctrine A Rewrite."
"Oases In Navajo Desert Contained 'A Witch's brew'."
"Single-Sex Classes On A Forward Course."
"9/11 Prisoner Abuse Suit Could Be Landmark."
"Tension Among South Korea's Masseurs."
"Exiting Under A Cloud, With $175 Million."

USA Today:
"Food Banks Have Less To Work With As They Try To Meet Holiday Demand."
"Young People Struggle To Deal With Kiss Of Debt."
"Motorists Face New Costs For Highways."

New York Times:
"Schools Slow In Closing Gaps Between Races."
"Cycle Of Revenge Fuels A Pattern Of Iraqi Killings."
"As Iran Seeks Aid, Atom Agency Faces Quandary."
"A New Strategy To Discourage Driving Drunk."
"Evicted From A Blighted Street, Newark's Mayor Finds Another."
"The Kid With All The News About The TV News."

Washington Post:
"The Meaning Of Work."
"Democrats To Push Pocketbook Issues."
"Embittered Insiders Turn Against Bush."
"Kremlin Inc. Widening Control Over Industry."
"In Competitive Marketplace, Asian Egg Donors in Demand."
"Padilla Case Raises Questions About Tactics."
"For McLean Chamber Group, Tysons Tunnel Dream Endures."

Washington Times:
"Marshals Kept Off Plane At Reagan."
"Rebuilding in Iraq Tops 4,000 Projects."
"U.N. Job Seekers get Chance To Impress."
"Bush Protesters Gather In Jakarta."
"For Web Sites, A Reason To give Thanks."

Detroit Free Press:
"Fans Flock To Church To Bid U-M's Bo Farewell."
"Ex-Convict Is Charged In 5 Shootings."
"Aggressive Cuts Take Fight To Big Rivals Wal-Mart Swings Low."

DOJ_NMG_0096398

"Strapped Schools Give Proposal 5 Wistful Look."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Aquarium Pumps Up Bottom Lines."
"Scores On Test A Bonus For Hall."
"Their Siblings' Keepers."
"Syria Offers To Help Build Stability In Iraq."

Houston Chronicle:
"Leftist Makes High-Stakes Bet In Mexico."
"Sectarian Violence Kills 715 In 8 Days."
"Newspaper Operators To Team Up With Yahoo."
"Foiling The Copper Crooks."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush Protest-Indonesia; Iraq War-Analysis; Hostage Situation-Iraq; The Contractor-Iraq; Human Shields-Gaza Strip; Former Russian Spy Poisoned-London; Young People's Debt; Millionaire Secret Santa.
CBS: Preempted By Football.
NBC: Preempted By Football.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Indonesia-Bush Protestors; Air Force One-Tire Problem; Iraq-Troop Levels Debate; College Presidents-Salaries; Romney-Gay Marriage; German Chancellor-Meeting With Silent German Intelligence Agents; Weekend Box Office.
CBS: Indonesia-Bush Protestors; Air Force One-Tire Problem; Iraq- Kissinger; Syria's Foreign Minister-Iraq; Iraq-McCain; Iraq-Webb; Rangel-Draft Renewal; Congress-Democratic Agenda; London-Former KGB Operative Poisoned; Weekend Box Office.
NPR: Indonesia-Bush Protestors; Bush-APEC Summit; Meeting Of Canada's South Korean Ambassador With North Koreans; Iraq-Kissinger; Iraq-McCain; Iraq-Levin; Blair-Afghanistan, Pakistan Visits; Rangel-Draft Renewal; Colon Cancer-Initiating Cell Discovery; Merger-Copper Companies.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Tours the Ho Chi Minh City Securities Trading Center; participates in a roundtable discussion with business leaders, Ho Chi Minh City Trading Center; tours the Pasteur Institute and briefing on HIV-AIDS and Avian flu, Pasteur Institute, Ho Chi Minh City; visits the Ho Chi Minh City History Museum; meets with the President of Indonesia. Bogor, Indonesia; participates in an education event, Bogor Palace; holds joint media availability with the President of Indonesia, Bogor Palace; participates in roundtable with civic leaders, Bogor Palace; attends dinner with the President of Indonesia. Bogor Palace.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: AMERICAN ACADEMY OF RELIGION _ The American Academy of Religion holds its 2006 annual meeting. Highlights: 11:30 a.m. Plenary Address, ``An Interview with Madeleine Albright," former Secretary of State. Location: Washington Convention Center.

HOLOCAUST MUSEUM-DARFUR _ The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum will project building-sized images of the genocide in Darfur onto the Museums exterior walls to make a dramatic statement about the need for action in Darfur. Highlights: 6:30 a.m. U.S. Special Envoy to Sudan, Andrew Natsios, will speak about the crisis. Other speakers include a Darfurian refugee, a survivor of the Rwandan genocide and a Holocaust survivor. Location: United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 100 Raoul Wallenberg Place SW.

DARFUR _ 10 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Brookings-Bern Project on Internal Displacement hosts two senior officials, Jean-Marie Guehenno, under secretary-general for Peacekeeping at the United Nations; and Andrew Natsios, U.S. presidential special envoy for Sudan, for a discussion on new initiatives being pursued to address the deteriorating situation in Darfur. Carlos Pascual, vice president and director of Foreign Policy Studies, will moderate the discussion, and Roberta Cohen, senior fellow and adviser to the Brookings-Bern Project on Internal Displacement, will give introductory remarks. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

POST-ELECTION POLICIES _ 10 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a panel of AEI experts, who will discuss, ``What Lies Beneath? U.S. Foreign and Domestic Policy after the 2006 Elections." Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12t Floor, AEI 1150 17th St, NW.

MILITARY TRAINING _ 11 a.m. Dr. Paul Mayberry, Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Readiness will brief on Department of Defense training transformation. He will be joined via DVIDS by MG Jason Kamiya and BG Joe Votel from Ft Bragg, N.C. They will provide information on a Mission Readiness Exercise to train U.S., Afghan and International Security Assistance Forces (ISAF) rotating into Afghanistan in January 2007. MG Kamiya was the former commander of coalition forces in Afghanistan until spring 2006 and is currently the Director, Joint Training and commander of the Joint Warfighting Center. BG Votel is the Deputy Commanding General 82nd Airborne Division. Location: DOD Breifing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

DOJ_NMG_0096399

RUSSIA-ENERGY _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institutes Center for Global Liberty and Prosperity hosts a policy forum, ``Russian Energy Policy and the New Russian State.'' Participants are: Robert Amsterdam, attorney for Mikhail Khodorkovsky, and Andrei Illarionov, former economic adviser to President Putin and Senior Fellow, Center for Global Liberty and Prosperity, Cato Institute. Location: Cato Institute, 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

MIDEAST-DEMOCRACY? _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Hudson Institute hosts a panel of Middle-East experts who will discuss whether conditions in the contemporary Middle East are suitable for establishing Western-style political democracies. They also will assess whether the United States should make democracy promotion a core goal of its policy in the region or instead pursue more modest reforms to expand peoples' civil rights even under largely authoritarian governments. Location: Hudson Institute, Betsy and Walter Stern Conference Center, 1015 15th St. NW, sixth floor.

HEALTH REFORM _ 12:15 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Commonwealth Fund and the Alliance for Health Reform sponsor a luncheon briefing to discuss how many states have moved forward to reduce the rising number of uninsured. This briefing will focus particularly on such efforts in three states Massachusetts, Vermont and Utah. Panelists are: Amy Lischko from the Massachusetts Executive Office of Health and Human Services; Jim Leddy, a Vermont state senator; Norm Thurston, policy analyst with the Utah Department of Public Health; and Alice Burton of AcademyHealths State Coverage Initiatives. Ed Howard of the Alliance and Anne Gauthier of Commonwealth will moderate. Location: Columbus Club, Union Station.

BOLIVIA _ 12:30 p.m. George Washington University sponsors a lecture with Bolivian Ambassador Gustavo Guzman on his nation's cultural and democratic revolution. Location: Room 602, 1957 E. St. NW.

ARMSTRONG-ISLAM _ 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. Karen Armstrong, author, speaker, teacher and media commentator on religious affairs in the U.S. and England, will launch the Mosaic Foundation's new lecture series ``Re- Discovering the Arab World.'' Her lecture is titled ``Islam: The Misunderstood Religion.'' Location: National Press Club, Ballroom.

GOVERNANCE INDICATORS _ 12:30 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. The Center for International Private Enterprise sponsors a roundtable discussion on ``Uses and Abuses of Governance Indicators,'' with Dr. Charles Oman, senior economist, OECD Development Centre. Location: Center for International Private Enterprise, Suite 700, Madison Building, 1155 15th St. NW.

SMITH-ABORTION _ 2 p.m. Congressman Chris Smith, R-NJ, holds a news conference to call on Amnesty International to resist pressure to support the pro-abortion position. With Deidre McQuade, director, Planning and Information, Pro-Life Secretariat of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops; and Kristen Day, executive director, Democrats for Life. Location: Room 2216, Rayburn.

COMMERCE-PRATT & WHITNEY _ 4 p.m. The Secretary of Commerce delivers brief remarks at the Pratt Whitney Engines signing ceremony. Location: Department of Commerce.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

Block, Jonathan

From: Block, Jonathan
Sent: Monday, November 20, 2006 8:45 AM
To: Block, Jonathan; 'Ed.Cogswell@ic.fbi.gov'; 'William.Carter@ic.fbi.gov'; Sampson, Kyle; Elwood, Courtney; McNulty, Paul J; Goodling, Monica; Moschella, William; Brand, Rachel; Courtney, Garrison K.; Jezierski, Crystal; Gorsuch, Neil M; 'Michael.Kortan@ic.fbi.gov'; 'Richard.Kolko@ic.fbi.gov'; 'John.Miller@ic.fbi.gov'; 'K.Hoffman@ic.fbi.gov'; Macklin, Kristi R; Mercer, William W; Knocke, William (DHS); Bergman, Cynthia (DHS); DeZulovich, Mavis (USMS); Hines, Don (USMS); Marianos, Richard W.; Mixell, Sheree L.; Payne, Lawrence R.; Truman, Michael; Billingsley, Traci L; Cooper, Mary Irene; Seidel, Rebecca; Hertling, Richard; Clinger, James H; Beck, Michael (OAG); 'Paul.Bresson@ic.fbi.gov'
Subject: Sunday Show Transcripts 11/19/06
Attachments: SUNDAY SHOW TRANSCRIPTS 11 12.doc
Importance: Low

Attached, please find the Sunday Show Transcripts from November 19, 2006.

SUNDAY SHOW TRANSCRIPTS
11/19/06

NBC – MEET THE PRESS

MR. TIM RUSSERT: Our issues this Sunday: on election night, there were two Senate races too close to call. The next day, Democrats Jim Webb of Virginia and Jon Tester of Montana were declared winners, giving Democrats control of the U.S. Senate. How will these two independent-minded and outspoken senators shape the debate on Iraq, the economy, and congressional prerogative? With us, Senator-elect Jim Webb and Senator-elect Jon Tester, together only on MEET THE PRESS.

Then...

(Videotape):

PRES. GEORGE W. BUSH: If Iran has a nuclear weapon, it'll be incredibly destabilizing.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Iran continues its nuclear ambition. Can there be a diplomatic solution? Our guests: Ted Koppel of the Discovery Channel, whose two-hour documentary, "Iran-The Most Dangerous Nation," debuts tonight; and Robin Wright, author and diplomatic correspondent for The Washington Post.

And in our MEET THE PRESS MINUTE, Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman died this week at the age of 94. He appeared here almost 25 years ago, and was asked to forecast our economic future.

But first, two of the newest Democratic members of the U.S. Senate: Jon Tester of Montana, Jim Webb of Virginia.

Gentlemen, welcome both.

SEN.-ELECT JIM WEBB (D-VA): Good to be here. Thank you.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Webb, let me start with you. The election, held 12 days ago. Looking back now, what were the voters saying?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: Well, I think—you know, I can't, I can't comment for the whole country. I think that there's a lot of concern everywhere I went about Iraq, and a lot of concern about the, the issues of economic fairness in this country, and thirdly, accountability. Those were the third theme—the three themes that I ran on during the campaign, and that's what we were hearing.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator-Elect Tester, what did the voters say 12 days ago in Montana?

SEN.-ELECT JON TESTER (D-MT): Well, I think it revolves around many of the same issues that Jim talked about. I think fiscal responsibility I'd also add to that mix. But health care, energy, what's going on in foreign policy, and, and what's going on ethically back in Washington, D.C., were definitely issues that I heard about.

MR. RUSSERT: Jim Webb, let me show you and our viewers what you said during the campaign about Iraq. "If we want a new direction in Iraq, we need a new team in Congress. A Democratic Congress will demand from day one that the President find a real way forward in Iraq." What's "a real way forward"?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: Well, first of all, I, I was saying even before we went in that there were three major issues in the Middle East that had to be addressed. One was the Israeli/Arab situation, the other was terrorism, and the third was, was Iraq, and that if we lumped them together that we risked in—having a problem with all three of them. That has happened.

So in the—in looking at Iraq, you need a larger scope than simply what's going on with—with the government, with the troops inside, which people keep talking about. And I'm looking forward to hearing what the Baker commission comes forward with, the Iraq Study Group. But what we need—and I've been saying this for more than two years—is a diplomatic approach that will bring the countries in the region to the table so that we can have ownership, some ownership, diplomatic ownership from the countries that have long-term cultural and historical ties with Iraq. And from that umbrella, then we can address the issue of moving our combat troops out and still affecting the war against international terrorism. I think that's doable. It's a leadership question rather than simply an issues question, and that's what I'm looking forward to trying to bring to the table.

MR. RUSSERT: You're talking about Iran and Syria.

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: We need to talk to Iran and Syria. I think it was a great mistake not to as this moves forward, and that's one thing that I've been encouraged to hear from former Secretary of State Baker that, you know, you need to talk to your, your enemies as well as your friends. You don't have to give up anything in terms of, you know, national concerns to be talking to them, but it's impossible to resolve the situation now without talking to them.

MR. RUSSERT: Jon Tester, during the campaign this is what your Web site said: "An open-ended occupation is not in the best interest of the United States, the Iraqi people, or the Middle East. The time has come to support our troops by laying out a plan to bring them home." Realistically, what kind of plan would you lay out to bring the troops home?

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Well, I think many of the things that, that Senator-elect Webb talked about would be part of the plan. But I will tell you, we, we need to work with our allies within—in the region. We also need to talk to our enemies and put diplomatic pressure on them. But we also need to visit with our allies around the world to, to develop a plan to, to make, to make this war come to some sort of conclusion and get our troops home. Right now, as it was—been for, you know, since I got into this race in May of '05, there is no plan, and, and there's no end in sight to this. And, and we really need to focus on, on the war on terror and national security issues. And I think that this war has taken our focus off of that.

That being said, we're there. And as some folks told me on the campaign route, there's really no easy solution here. Getting out tomorrow isn't, isn't probably the right thing to do; staying and getting out later's probably not the right thing to do, and that's why we do need to have a plan. The president as commander in chief needs to provide leadership in this, and in the process we all need to work together and get something that really works for this country and works for the Middle East also.

MR. RUSSERT: Jon Tester, is it fair to say that neither the Democrats nor President Bush at this time really have a plan?

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Well, I mean, possibly. I mean, I think, I think ultimately what, what's really fair to say is that what's been going on there hasn't been working. And, and we need to come up with, with some, with some focus on, on the war in Iraq. And we need to all understand that, you know, what's going on there hasn't been successful. We're losing lives, it's costing money, I think we're losing stature in the world. And so it's important that we, we, we broaden the scope of, of who we're working with, and, and, and come up to some sort of solution that works for this country, and really focus on Osama bin Laden and al-Qaeda and those kind of things that, that we were focused on, you know, four years ago.

MR. RUSSERT: Jim Webb, John Abizaid, the military commander for the Middle East, came to Congress, and this is what he testified to on Wednesday, "that to begin a significant troop withdrawal from Iraq over the next six months would lead to an increase in sectarian killings and hamper efforts to persuade the Iraqi government to make the difficult decisions needed to secure the country." Your reaction?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: Well, I can, I can understand why the military people would have concerns about the notion of beginning this process with the announcement of troop withdrawals. It's, it's almost backwards from the way that we should be solving it. There's a tremendous amount of sectarian violence either way and there's, and there's going to be. There are limits to what our military can do. And what I've been proposing and which—something I think that General Abizaid might, might have a different feeling about if he were testifying, I would think, is that we need a diplomatic approach that creates some stability, some agreement among the players in the region. They all have long-term interests, obviously, in, in the stability of, of Iraq, and from that approach then you begin troop withdrawals and—of combat troops, and still be able to affect the issue of international terrorism. That is a workable formula, I think, and it goes a long way toward addressing the situation that he was talking about.

MR. RUSSERT: What happens if the situation deteriorates and it becomes a whole widespread civil war, total chaos? What do we do then?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: Well, again, there are limits to what the United States military can do in that region. And, in fact, when the United States is operating unilaterally, it creates further potential for the kind of thing that you're talking about because of the resentments of having the, the, the United States there alone.

So the, the key, to me, for years has been getting these countries that are tangential and other countries that have long-term interests in the stability of Iraq to take some diplomatic ownership. And we did this in, in '01 after we went into Afghanistan when, when we were putting the formula together that resulted in the Karzai government, we got the countries tangential to Afghanistan and others, including Iran, by the way, Iran, India, Pakistan, to become a part of the, the process that created the, the, the solution, the governmental solution. And that's what you need in Iraq, in, in my view. You need these countries to have—to—with, with—some of them with compatible ethnic populations and this sort of thing to, to be participating so that there is some accountability in the region other than the United States for a solution.

MR. RUSSERT: You are a highly-decorated veteran; back in 1985, you were on MEET THE PRESS as second—assistant secretary of defense, reflecting on Vietnam. And let me show you what you said then and come back and talk about it.

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: OK.

(Videotape, April 28, 1985):

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: If I had one lesson that stands out in my mind, it is that you cannot fight a war and debate it at the same time.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: That's what we're doing right now, aren't we?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: In a, in a way. I mean, any time you have these, these situations that go on for a long period of time, you have to be able to, to answer questions now. And I, you know, I'm one of these people who—there, there aren't many of us—who can still justify for you the reasons that we went into Vietnam, however screwed up the strategy got, whereas I don't think there were legitimate reasons for us to have taken this move into Iraq, again, with the situations that come—the other situations in the region that were a lot more...

MR. RUSSERT: You opposed it publicly two years before we went in.

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: I did. And, and on strategic grounds that the—if, if you're going to work in this region, the Arab-Israeli situation should be first order priority. We need to find Dennis Ross or, or someone of, of, of that stature to come in and, and really aggressively attempt to bring a resolution to that situation. We need to address international terrorism. We created what I was calling at the time a strategic mouse trap by going into Iraq when we did. We have to fix that, that's the reality that we're dealing with. But, again, the way to fix it is to work from the diplomatic into the military rather than the other way around.

MR. RUSSERT: Your son, Jimmy, 24, is a Marine in Iraq, you wore his combat boots throughout the entire campaign. Is it hard talking about this war knowing that your own son is over there?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: I have, you know, feelings as a father that I have, you know, I have to separate from the policy issues, because there are a lot of people who have loved ones there and, you know, so I, I think in terms of policy issues I can separate that. Very difficult personally, I have to admit.

MR. RUSSERT: Jon Tester, let me show you what Major General J.D. Thurman, the senior commander of American forces in Baghdad, said. "Part of our problem is that we want this more than they do," talking about the Iraqis. That's a very powerful statement.

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Well, I mean, I—the—you know, if you go back to what, what Senator-Elect Webb said about diplomatic pressures, you know, I think that is, is just so right on the mark. It, it really is critically important that we visit with our allies to develop, to develop a plan for the region, and also keep our enemies close on this thing. Because I think it's in everybody's best interests to try to find some sort of resolution here. And I don't know if it's wanting it more than they. I think it's, it's knowing what we accomplish when we're done. That, that's part, that's part of what is, is mysterious to me when I look at what's going on in Iraq right now.

MR. RUSSERT: One of the things that happened the day after the election, Jim Webb, was that President Bush announced the Donald Rumsfeld was leaving; that Robert Gates was going to replace him as secretary of defense. And there's a photograph of Mr. Gates meeting with John Warner, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. Would you like to be able to vote on Mr. Gates' confirmation, rather than have him confirmed before you're sworn in?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: I would, and that has been misinterpreted by, by some. I heard there was a column by Robert Novak saying that I have some personal animus toward Mr. Gates. I don't even know Mr. Gates. But if this is an individual that I'm going to be working with for the next two years, I would like to be able to ask my own questions, and to examine, you know, his, his qualifications. And I, I think that's sort of logical. If it doesn't happen, it doesn't happen, but certainly I would like to be able to, to sit down in his confirmation hearing and take a vote.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to the issue of congressional corruption. Jon Tester, here's a campaign ad that ran all across the state of Montana. Let's watch, and come back and talk about it.

(Videotape, Jon Tester campaign ad):

AD ANNOUNCER: Look around Montana, and you'll see, Jon Tester is catching on. (Several people shown getting haircuts similar to Jon Tester) He'll put an end to Senator Burns' kind of corruption and make the U.S. Senate look a little more like Montana.

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: I'm Jon Tester, and I approved this message. I approve the haircut, too.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Take away the haircut, let's talk about corruption. You talked about Senator Burns' kind of corruption. Right now there are proposals before the incoming U.S. Senate, senator-elect, which will talk about free meals and airplane rides, and so forth. Two of the areas that some in the Senate, some Democrats, don't want to go near are establishing an Office of Public Integrity, and also full disclosure for the so-called "earmarks," money that Senators target for their home states. Are you in favor of a comprehensive reform package that would include the creation of an Office of Public Integrity, and deal with earmarks?

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: I, I, I'm, I'm not—I will tell you that, that building a bureaucracy in Washington, D.C., is not something that I'm crazy about, so developing another office is something I'd take a hard look at before we did it. I do think that we need to get a hold of the earmark situation, and make sure that they're, they're transparent, make sure that the people who are offering the earmarks, we know who they are.

But, but really transparency in government is the key here, Tim. When you talk about influence that the K Street lobbyists have on the process, I think we can limit that. But ultimately, in the end, we—you need to have people in Washington, D.C., who are honest, who, who can't be bought. And, and we will come up with an ethics plan, we talked to Senator Reid about that, that, that will take care of some of the, the free meals and travel and all that stuff. I also hope that we, we get something as far as, as posting who the senators meet with, to the best of their ability. And I know that's, that's tough when it comes to staff in offices this size, but, but the fact is, is the people back home need to know who we're meeting with, so that they have the opportunity to put their two bits in, in, too.

When you talk about a representative government, it should be for everybody not just the moneyed interests. And, and when we have a situation like's been back there the last couple of years with, with—and you know the names, I don't have to bring them up again—that, that have had the dealings with, with, with lobbyists and, and, and money transactions. I just don't, don't think it speaks well for public service at the local level, state level, and especially at the federal level. And we've got a lot of good people back there that do a lot of work, sacrificing family and a lot of other things, and we need to make sure that, that ethics and honesty is a, is a foundation quality for our government.

MR. RUSSERT: One of the issues in your campaign was Senator Burns saying, "I may have said some outrageous things, but I bring home the goods, I bring home the pork for Montana." And Senator Harry Reid, the Democrat, said, "If you vote for Jon Tester, we're going to put him on the Appropriations Committee as soon as possible." That's where the pork is, that's where the earmarks are, but you didn't get on that committee. What happened?

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Well, I think that Senator Reid did the best he could do, and, and I think that—I don't think any of the freshmen got on that committee. I hope that I will get on it as soon as possible. I've talked to Senator Reid about that, and I think it will happen. I'm very happy with the committees I got—I've, I've received in the Senate. And, and, you know, I've, I've been in the process in state government for eight years. I can, I can deal with, with issues of importance to Montanans through the amendment process on the floor and, and will do that.

But I think part of what will enable me to do exactly what I talked about with amendments is transparency in government. You can't affect the process unless you know what's transpiring on the floor at the time. So there has to be transparency and opportunity for debate.

MR. RUSSERT: So if you got on the Appropriations Committee, you would want complete transparency for that committee?

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Absolutely. I think, I think it's very important to be able to offer a debate. What happens—offer to—be able to debate the issue. What happens when earmarks are done until late at night and there's not opportunity for total transparency is you get a lot of projects funded that are truly pork projects that shouldn't be funded, taking money away from good projects that should be.

MR. RUSSERT: I want to ask you both about the economy. Jim Webb, when you were running, you said, "I'm not just running about Iraq, I'm running about what I see happening to the economy in this country, the divisions between rich and poor, as a Jacksonian Democrat." And let me show you an op-ed piece that you wrote on Wednesday for The Wall Street Journal, and have both you and Jon Tester talk about it.

"The most important ... issue in politics today is our society's steady drift toward a class-based system, the likes of which we have not seen since the 19th century. America's top tier has grown infinitely richer and more removed over the past 25 years. It is not unfair to say that they are literally living in a different country. Few among them send their children to public schools; fewer still send their loved ones to fight our wars. They own most of our stocks. ... The top 1 percent now takes in an astounding 16 percent of national income. ...

"This ever-widening divide is too often ignored or downplayed by its beneficiaries. A sense of entitlement has set in among elites, bordering on hubris. When I raised this issue with corporate leaders during the recent political campaign, I was met repeatedly with denials and, from some, an overt lack of concern for those who are falling behind. A troubling arrogance is in the air among the nation's most fortunate. ...

"With this new Congress ... American workers have a chance to be heard in ways that have eluded them for more than a decade. Nothing is more important for the health of our society than to grant them the validity of their concerns. And our government leaders have no greater duty than to confront the growing unfairness in this age of globalization."

Very strong words. What do we do? Roll back tax cuts? Roll back trade agreements? What do we do?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: No, and I, I strongly believe that, that it's the most important country—issue facing our country. We have corporate profits at an all-time high, wages salary—and salaries at an all-time low as a percentage of our national wealth. And it's sort of a three-tiered problem, a very difficult problem; it's going to take years, years to break it down.

The first is, what is fair trade in the, in the age of globalization? We can talk about free trade agreements, but when are, when are they not fair? China's the best example of that, where we have a situation now rather similar to what we were seeing with Japan 20 years ago, but much more dangerous in terms of its size and our—and the issues of national security, where you have a devalued currency that is enabling them to bring goods into this country at a very low price. And at the same time, they're using that money to help finance our national debt. We're becoming dependent on them.

The second is, what has happened to the American workers in, in this environment. Because when you look at the movement from GATT toward the WTO, the American workers, the workers around the world, were not addressed as an, as an issue in terms of fairness. So we have situations here, a different type of, of economic and governmental system, where does—where do you pay health benefits? Where do you pay retirement benefits in the different countries? What's equality of condition on a workplace that all goes to the worker?

And then the third is, who is benefitting from the bene—you know, from the, from the larger benefits of globalization? It's not getting down to, to the workers. And that can be addressed, in my view, as a—at a starting point through corporate tax loopholes, there're many of them; through how the tax code is structured that—in a, in a way that benefits the, the, the top 1 percent.

But this is an issue, it's not just rich and poor anymore. It's an issue of what is happening to workers worldwide and how the American worker fits into it. And that is my number one priority as a senator.

MR. RUSSERT: Jon Tester, do you share that concern? And would you be willing to roll back the 1--tax cut of the Bush administration on the top 1 percent and look at trade agreements?

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Well, I, I think we do need to look at trade agreements for some of the reasons that Jim Webb just talked about. You know, as I go around the state of Montana, you see more and more people working more and more jobs, trying to make ends meet, and I've got story after story about folks who are really having trouble making their, their, their budget balance. And, and it ends up, you know, where we have a society where there's no middle class, and, and the working poor aren't being addressed.

And I think we do need to address, I think we do need to address it in the tax code, make sure we have a tax code that works for the middle class, small business, working families, family farms and ranches, and make sure that those people are empowered to move our economy forward. Those are the folks, really, that, that brought us here, was a vibrant middle class, and they've been forgotten about over the last many years, and it's time to show them some attention.

And when you look at, look at the tax cuts from the Bush administration, let's look at it from the middle class. Let's look at those tax cuts that empower the middle class and move forward. And

I can't agree more with what Jim said about the, the trade, free trade vs. fair trade, devalued dollars and workers' rights in other countries. We've got to make sure these trade agreements work for us and other countries so we're not continually pushing jobs out of this country.

MR. RUSSERT: It's been quite interesting watching both your campaigns and reading about your backgrounds. Here's the cover of The Weekly Standard magazine, Jon Tester, where you're in front of a truck with a shovel and considerable girth, which doesn't make you a bad guy, I know the feeling. Are you a new kind of Democrat? Are you different than some of the national Democrats the country's heard from over the last decade?

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Well, I don't—you know, I don't know. My, my focus really is on what I talked about, the middle class, and, and, and the people who have really built this country. I think Democrats have been focused on that in the past, but it really is a priority of, of mine. You know, as I look out my window here in Big Sandy, I see more farms than aren't lived in than what are lived in. We really need to have some policies that, that, that move forward, that work for production agriculture. We've got to have some policies that work for the middle class. One of the reasons I am a Democrat is because I think the Democrats have focused on the middle class, and I hope they put more of a priority on it into the future, and, and it's one of the things that I feel very, very strongly about. It's, it's where I come from.

MR. RUSSERT: You said when you walked into the Senate—in the Senate chamber for the first time, it was like walking into your barn. There was no other place in the world quite like it.

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Well, it's—I mean that from a very positive standpoint. The barn was built by my grandad nearly a hundred years ago and it's a very, it's a very special place for me, as was the Capitol, very, very impressive, and it's a place where I hope to be able to do some really good work, working on both sides of the aisle, finding the common ground to help move this country forward and the state of Montana forward, both domestically and in a, in a—from a foreign affairs standpoint. So, it's, it's a marvelous place, you know that, Tim, and I really look forward to the challenges that are presented to me over the next six years.

MR. RUSSERT: Jim Webb, you had this comment in The Washington Post which caught my attention. "Webb said he will model himself after former New York senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D), whom he described as someone 'who had government experience that was shaped by the intellectual world.'" A man I knew well, described as independent, maverick, iconoclastic. Do you see yourself along those lines?

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: You know, when this campaign started and people were saying I didn't know how to do soundbites and debates and this sort of thing. And I sat down one day and I said, "Well, who is my prototype here?" And it would be Daniel Patrick Moynihan. Someone who had government experience, but who was shaped through the intellectual world and who cared about where you measure society, which is at the base, rather than at the top. Where is the health of society. And yeah, very much look forward to, in many ways, following in his footsteps.

MR. RUSSERT: And sometimes got in trouble for his writings.

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: And I, you know, it's—I—I'm really looking forward to, to trying to do the—some of the same things that he did in terms of putting, putting my experience in the intellectual world onto the problems, the practical problems of today.

MR. RUSSERT: Jim Webb and Jon Tester, congratulations to both and we look forward to covering your tenures in the Senate.

SEN.-ELECT WEBB: Thank you. Appreciate being here.

SEN.-ELECT TESTER: Thank you. Thank you, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: Coming next, insights and analysis on the war in Iraq and the relationship with Iran from Ted Koppel, who just spent three weeks reporting from the region. His new Discovery Channel documentary airs tonight. And author and Washington Post columnist Robin Wright will be here as well, coming up right here on MEET THE PRESS.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: Iraq and Iran. Insights and analysis from Robin Wright and Ted Koppel after this station break.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we are back. Robin Wright, Ted Koppel, welcome both.

Ted Koppel, tonight, Discovery Channel, 9 p.m. to 11, two-hour documentary on Iran. You just got back. Let me show you as you visited the former U.S. Embassy in Iraq—in Iran. Let's watch.

(Videotape, "Koppel On Discovery: Iran-The Most Dangerous Nation"):

MR. TED KOPPEL: This, of course, is what used to be the U.S. Embassy, until a bunch of radical students back in November of 1979 seized it, and took all the Americans inside hostage. There are other reasons why the U.S. government considers Iran to be dangerous these days, but if you want to talk about the roots of American resentment toward this country, what happened inside the U.S. Embassy here is a pretty good starting point.

But raise that with almost any Iranian, and he or she will respond by saying "Ah, yes, but look at what you guys did back in 1953, when the CIA conspired with British intelligence to overthrow the freely-elected prime minister Mohammed Mossadeq, replacing him with the shah."

And that's essentially the way you can define U.S./Iranian relations these days. Tit-for-tat, grievance for grievance. When a group of Iranian journalists were denied entry to the United States, trying to accompany President Ahmadinejad to the general assembly at the United Nations, the Iranians immediately responded by saying, "Well, when Koppel and that Discovery group leave, that's it, we will be issuing visas to no more American journalists."

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: That's incredible. Here we are, concerned about Iran becoming a nuclear power, with the war in bordering Iraq, and we're still dealing with tit-for-tat on journalist visas.

MR. KOPPEL: I'll give you another example. When I arrived in Tehran, I was taken in to be fingerprinted. It took about an hour, because they don't fingerprint anybody else. They only fingerprint Americans. And the only reason they fingerprint Americans is because we do retinal scans on people who come from the Middle East, and they don't have a retinal scan machine. I asked someone later, "What do they do with the fingerprints?" Because the guy who fingerprinted me had never done it before, and he got so much ink on that you couldn't even read the fingerprint. He said, "They, they just throw it away. They're just doing it to be"...

MR. RUSSERT: Harassment.

MR. KOPPEL: Yeah. Well, it's tit-for-tat.

MR. RUSSERT: What's the sense of the country? What did you find there, Ted?

MR. KOPPEL: It's not—look, all of us have been to totalitarian countries, and, in its own way, Iran is a totalitarian country. But there is a different feel. In some countries, you sort of feel as though all the air has been sucked out of the atmosphere as soon as you walk in. That's not the way it is with Iranians. Iranians are eager to talk, they will criticize their president, some of them just as savagely and with the same kind of sarcasm that people at—in Georgetown salons in this town criticize President Bush. In fact, frequently they will draw that kind of analogy between their own president and President Bush. That surprised me a little bit.

Having said that, if you cross some of these invisible red lines that they have, you can be jailed for the most innocuous things. And you can be brutalized for the most innocuous things. It's not an easy place to live.

MR. RUSSERT: Robin Wright, 27 years ago, when the embassy was taken over, it's an eternity, when you think of the population of Iran, a country of 69 million people. Seventy percent are under the age of 30. They don't remember that event from their own memories.

MS. ROBIN WRIGHT: No. And, in fact, they are, in many ways, the most dynamic force for change in the region. We focus so much on the ayatollahs and hard-line president, when in fact, the real future of the country is likely to be decided by this enormous body of people who really do understand a global era. They are connected through the Internet. There are, as Ted's documentary points out, tens of thousands of blogs. Everyone's connected. There is a real engagement. They will—many of the people I know in Iran have seen American movies before I see them. They are, they are very savvy about us, just as savvy about us as we are ignorant about them. And that's what, in many ways, is the fe—the hope for us. I've often argued that the solution to U.S./Iran relations is really in bridging the gap, particularly with that age group, rather than dealing with, you know, bombs or a military solution.

MR. RUSSERT: And yet, Ted Koppel, you captured what many young people in Iran are exposed to at an very early age. Let's just watch more from your documentary.

(Videotape, "Koppel On Discovery: Iran-The Most Dangerous Nation"):

MR. KOPPEL: Still, Khomeini, the religious leader, the revolutionary, the severe, forbidding anti-Western, anti-American presence, remains a force. And the displays of public anger against America that he first inspired more than 25 years ago echo to this day during Friday prayers at the University of Tehran...

(Man shown leading prayer service, congregation shouts in response)

MR. KOPPEL: ...in the streets after prayers...

(Men shown walking through street, shouting in Arabic)

MR. KOPPEL: ...and in the indoctrination of the very youngest. The newest generation of Iranians on their first day of school:

(Children shown standing in formation. Man addresses children over public address system, children shout in response)

MR. KOPPEL: "Death to America! Death to America!" Without much passion, without much emphasis, without any real understanding, they carry the flowers given to them on this, their very first day of school, and they begin their indoctrination against what their leaders tell them is the most dangerous nation: America.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: One universal truth of all school kids in the morning: they yawn.

MR. KOPPEL: They yawn.

MR. RUSSERT: Thank God.

MR. KOPPEL: And don't know what they—and, and really—but it's not just the kids, Tim. The amazing thing to me was that, for the most part, and we were witness to, and sometimes sort of involved in some of these demonstrations, surrounded by them, there's no passion to it whatsoever.

MR. RUSSERT: It was robotic.

MR. KOPPEL: It's robotic. People are going through it. In fact, people were coming out of Friday prayers when we were there in Isfahan. And, you know, sort of giving us the 'V for victory sign,' and all of a sudden somebody there spotted the camera and realized that here was an opportunity, and all of a sudden he started whipping out the "Death to America" slogans. And people go through the motions, but you didn't get the feeling, certainly with the people, that there was any real enthusiasm.

MR. RUSSERT: Because here's the other side of Iran. And here we have people who are enjoying life in a very Western way. Rock music, videos, cafes, Internet cafes, pool tables. I mean, Robin Wright, how do we tap into the fact that young Iranians love Western culture, and yet, those same young Iranians, even if they are "reformers," also think that their country should have a nuclear bomb as a, as a sign of stature in the world?

MS. WRIGHT: Ah, let's be very careful about that. They all believe they should have nuclear energy because that is the key to development and being a modern country. When it comes to a bomb, that's a very different issue and I'm not sure that—no—there are no public opinion polls in Iran, so we don't know—but there's a very strong feeling that the outside world is trying to block them from having energy because they want to keep it as a kind of third world country that is submissive and dependent.

You know, Iran also has gone through this long war with, with Iraq itself. It was isolated by the outside world. The United States actually provided, again, as Ted's documentary points out, provided intelligence to the Iraqis. Much—some of which was used in—using chemical weapons against Iranian troops. There is a paranoia. So there are those, obviously, who feel very vulnerable, and there are strong indications that they are looking at developing a bomb. But when it comes to the average Iranian, it's the nuclear energy issue that's important to them.

MR. RUSSERT: You encountered a farmer, in terms of...

MR. KOPPEL: It blew, it blew me away. We went for a drive outside Isfahan and I was so tired of being manipulated that I said, "OK, we're going to drive out of town." When I say manipulated, you've got government minders with you most of the time and they let you do this and don't let you do that. I said, "Let's go for a drive." And they said, "OK." I said, "All right. Go straight here and make a right here and make a left there."

We'd gone about 20 miles outside Isfahan and I see a bunch of guys spreading fertilizer in the field. I say, "OK, stop there. I want to talk to these guys." No way they could've set it up. Talking to the guys in the field, all of a sudden this tall dude comes along, he's the owner, 10 acres. Right? Small land owner. We start talking about the bomb, and even in Farsi I can hear he's saying, "NPT," non-proliferation treaty. He's invoking the non-proliferation treaty and saying, "We have a right. Why can't we, you know, the Pakistanis have it, and the Israelis have it and the Indians have it. Why shouldn't we have it?"

And Robin's exactly right, he was talking about nuclear energy, not the bomb. But I would go a step further than, than Robin. I think Iranians are sort of secretly and sometimes not so secretly pleased that Ahmadinejad is tweaking the United States and making us so upset about this.

MR. RUSSERT: Is there any realistic way we can stop Iran from getting a nuclear bomb?

MR. KOPPEL: Boy, I don't think so. I don't think so. I mean, if they want it, the only thing we have to hope is that their, their, their technology is not all that advanced. And unless they buy the technology somewhere else, I'm not at all sure they would get it for at least a few more years.

But having said that, can we stop it? We had no—I had a senior U.S. State Department official tell me we've had more diplomatic contact with North Korea than we have had with Iran. No diplomatic contact. The economic and trade sanctions have been in place for over a quarter of a century, really aren't working. And the military option? Boy, I don't think that's—I don't think that's an option.

MS. WRIGHT: Well, I will add one thing to that. There is this illusion that we can go in and strike a few targets and eliminate their program. But the reality is with all the troops we have on the ground, any military operation against Iran would end up having to strike at their defensive positions. Whether it's along borders, their tank corps, their artillery corps. It would be far more—to be effective, would be far more extensive than anyone envisions at this stage. At least in terms of the public debate about a military option. Much more complicated and costly.

MR. RUSSERT: On the—Thursday in the Financial Times, there was in interesting article written which I'd like to read to you and for our viewers and come back and talk about it because it brings into the equation Iraq.

"Analysts say that as the U.S. scrambles to find an honorable exit from Iraq, opening a new channel to Iran is very much under consideration. Bringing Iran and Syria into the equation is expected to form one of the main proposals of the Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of state James Baker and former Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton. ...

"Trita Parsi, an analyst who advocates engagement, says the U.S. cannot conceal its weakness but has limited alternatives. He says that for Iran to be drawn into a dialogue it needs a clear indication that the U.S. is looking to discuss all issues and address a strategic transformation of the relationship, not just a tactical quick fix of the Iraq crisis. ...

"[At] a three-hour meeting last month between Mr. Baker and Javad Zarif, Iranian envoy to the U.N., ... Mr. Baker was told that Iran would consider helping the U.S. in Iraq if 'Washington first changed its attitude toward Iran.' ...

"Iran is wary of its last experience of cooperating with the U.S., when it helped oust the Taliban from Afghanistan in 2001 ... only to be denounced by Mr. Bush weeks later as a member of the 'axis of evil.'"

The grand compromise.

MR. KOPPEL: Well, focus on that last line. Because I think most Americans are not aware of the fact that Iran really was extremely helpful in getting rid of the Taliban in Afghanistan. And I had one political scientist, who's a childhood friend of Ahmadinejad, tell me, "You know, we're not without resources. We helped you guys in Afghanistan, but we can also hurt you guys in Afghanistan."

I had several people make the point to me that Iran today is more influential inside Iraq than the United States, for all that we have 130,000 troops in there. And that if they wanted to make life even more difficult for us in Iraq, boy, could they do it.

MR. RUSSERT: Richard Engel, our correspondent from NBC News in Iraq, says if you want a hotel reservation in southern Iraq, you order the room in Farsi, the Iranian language. The Iranians have built an airport and a train station in Iraq for their pilgrims to come over to. In order to deal with our crisis in Iraq, must we bring in the Iranians, and have a grand compromise on nuclear power and Iraq?

MS. WRIGHT: Clearly we need to deal, and include in some way, the Iranians and the Syrians. But I think we have to also understand, not have any illusions about what they can accomplish. Remember, Iran is a Shiite country, predominantly Shiite, led by Shiites. Syria is led by a Shiite offshoot minority. They can have influence when it comes to the Shiite militias in, in Iraq. But the insurgency is predominantly Sunni, and the foreign fighters are predominantly Sunni. What influence they can have is still in question. They can certainly, when it comes to the issue of civil war, perhaps, whether it comes to the issue of arms, intelligence, funds, it can try to hold them back.

MR. RUSSERT: But Iran could probably help with the militias and the death gangs.

MS. WRIGHT: The militias and the death squads, yes. But the big question, of course, is are we about to see a full-scale civil war? And on that front, the Iranians may be less of an influence. Syria could help to a certain extent, because the insurgents often go through Syria. But reining them in, that's a different issue as well.

MR. KOPPEL: Robin makes a really important point, that there's another half to that equation. As she correctly points out, who's going to help with the Sunnis? And the Saudis, for example, could be of enormous assistance with the Sunnis, and to date have not been. So it's not just a function of bringing the Iranians into the equation, and bringing the Syrians into the equation, you really have to bring everyone in the region into the equation. And let me say that one dirty word that no one in politics says these days: oil. It's about oil. Not about the Iraqi oil, but about Persian Gulf oil that supplies 25 percent of all the oil that is consumed every day in the entire world. And if Iraq blows up, and if that spills over into the region, you could have an economic instability throughout the world that we haven't even begun to consider.

MR. RUSSERT: Less than a year ago, last December, you were on this program, and we talked about Iraq. And you were rather prescient, talking about the elections, and the tone of the debate, and what would happen after that as Democrats would have to deal with real power. Let's listen.

(Videotape, December 15, 2005):

MR. KOPPEL: The mousetrap that is waiting for the Democrats is if they do not publicly acknowledge that U.S. national interest is, is just fundamentally involved in a stable Iraq and a stable Persian Gulf; if they simply come after the Republicans and take the cheap shots on the war and say you got to bring the troops home at all costs, they might even win the election. But if they win the election, they're going to find themselves confronting the same issues of national interest that the Republicans are facing right now. The simple fact of the matter is, it is in America's national interest that there be stability in the Persian Gulf. And if we precipitously pull the troops out of that area now, there'll be hell to pay.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: That's the debate.

MR. KOPPEL: That's the debate. And, you know, the problem now is, now the Democrats have influence, and they're going to have to deal with it. And I was at least reassured to hear the two senators-elect this morning in effect make that—especially Senator-Elect Webb, who obviously has had more opportunity, I think, to deal with foreign policy issues than Senator-Elect Tester. But the fact of the matter is, you can't just pull the U.S. troops out of there in the next four to six months. Could you, for the sake of symbolism, begin to, to draw a few of them out? Yes. But that symbolism is going to have effect not only here in the United States, it's also going to have effect over there in the Persian Gulf.

MR. RUSSERT: Robin Wright, you cover this government, the State Department. You're watching very closely Jim Baker, Lee Hamilton, the study group. Robert Gates replacing Donald Rumsfeld. Back in Bush 41, who reported to Robert Gates in the National Security Council? Condoleezza Rice, the current secretary of state. Do you believe that what the Baker group recommends will be adopted by this administration, and what do you think they might recommend?

MS. WRIGHT: Oh, I don't think necessarily they will be adopted. I think one of the most interesting things to happen over the past week is that the Bush administration on Tuesday launched its own debate—own review. It pulled together the secretary of state, the Defense Department, the CIA, and under Stephen Hadley are organizing a very fast review, trying to come out at the same time that the Iraq Study Group comes out with its recommendations for the very reason that it doesn't want to feel that this is the only plan on the table. It wants to be able to say—to pick and choose, basically, to say, "Well, there's some good ideas here; we'd like to blend it with our own thinking," because, because of the very discussion we've had: What do you do about Iran and Syria? The administration argues they've tried that route. They've been open to discussions, and that they haven't found either the Iranians or the Syrians willing to come to the table on reasonable terms, as they see it. And so this is a way of skirting that issue and, and taking a much more narrow focus.

I think the Iraq Study Group is looking at, as you called it, the bigger game, whether it includes the Arab/Israeli conflict, is uncertain, but it clearly is looking at the neighbors and the regional component of it, whereas the Bush administration's really trying to fine-tune its program.

MR. RUSSERT: The candidates for president in '08, Democrat and Republican, overseeing an exit strategy from Iraq?

MR. KOPPEL: Clearly going to be trying to do that. Whether in fact we will have withdrawn most or all of our troops from Iraq by the time 2008 rolls around, I don't know.

One quick point I do want to make, and that is very few people seem to recall that Bush 41, the elder President Bush, and Colin Powell, who was then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, kept U.S. troops from going all the way up to Baghdad, kept U.S. forces from overthrowing Saddam Hussein, during Operation: Desert Storm for one principal reason: to keep Iran in check. We've done the Iranians a huge favor.

MR. RUSSERT: And the secretary of defense back then was Dick Cheney.

MR. KOPPEL: Yeah.

MR. RUSSERT: Robin Wright, thank you. We'll keep reading you in The Washington Post. Ted Koppel, tonight, Discovery Channel, 9 to 11. Thank you for this good work, and come back whenever you have something like this. It makes us all proud.

MR. KOPPEL: Thank you. Thanks very much.

MR. RUSSERT: Coming next, our MEET THE PRESS MINUTE with noted economist Dr.Milton Friedman. Is it possible to forecast an economic turnaround? Right after this.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: Deficits, tax cuts, inflation, interest rates, unemployment—all on the minds of Americans in the midst of a recession in the spring of 1982.

(Videotape, March 21, 1982):

MR. BILL MONROE: Our guest today on MEET THE PRESS is economist Milton Friedman, Nobel Prize winner, senior research fellow at the Hoover Institution, Stanford University, and a member of President Reagan's Economic Policy Advisory Board.

MR. MARVIN KALB: Dr. Friedman, you are speaking with a great deal of confidence and you are clearly a world-renowned economist. With that in mind, could you please tell us when there will be a turnaround in the economy in this country?

DR. MILTON FRIEDMAN: If you were—if I were to say to you, "You are a world-renowned meteorologist. Would you tell me when there's going to be a rain in the next two days," would you think that that was a contradiction to the statement? The forecasting of short-run changes in economic activity is by no means a science. It's not something in which we are a really able to make very good predictions. I think there's a fair chance that when the historians of business cycles come to look at this period, they will say that the bottom was already reached in January. But that may be wrong. It's not the kind of statement in which I would want to have a great deal of confidence.

MR. KALB: So what you're really telling us is that, deep down, you don't know right now when this is going to turn around?

DR. FRIEDMAN: Nobody knows. Nobody knows. knows.

MR. KALB: Nobody knows.

DR. FRIEDMAN: Nobody knows.

MR. KALB: Not even the president and his people when they say...

DR. FRIEDMAN: Nobody knows exactly when it's going to turn around.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Economists, meteorologists, political pundits, do they ever get it right? The economy did slowly start to turn around at the end of that year, and for the next 92 months, the U.S. enjoyed one of the longest sustained peace-time economic growth periods in history. Milton Friedman, one of our most well-known economists of all time, died this week at the age of 94.

And we'll be right back.

TEXT: Milton Friedman 1912-2006

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: Check out the MEET THE PRESS Web site where you can now download both audio and video of the entire program to your computer or MP3 player. The MEET THE PRESS netcast and new video podcast all at mtp.msnbc.com.

That's all for today. We'll be back next week. Have a great Thanksgiving.

If it's Sunday, it's MEET THE PRESS.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: Thanks for joining us.

This week, it's official. John McCain files the papers for his presidential bid with a challenge to his party.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: We lost our principles and our majority. And there is no way to recover our majority without recovering our principles first.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And defying their new speaker, House Democrats pick a leader.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HOYER: I am proud to have been selected by my colleagues as the majority leader.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our exclusive headliners this morning, Senator John McCain and Congressman Steny Hoyer.

Then, what's next for Iraq?

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Hope is not a strategy.

GEN. JOHN ABIZAID, CENTCOM COMMANDER: Senator, I agree with you, and I would also say that despair is not a method.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: George Will, Fareed Zakaria and Robert Reich debate that and the rest of the week's politics on our roundtable. Plus, NASCAR's Jimmie Johnson.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JOHNSON: Giving blood can save someone's life. It opens up the world of possibilities for these people in need.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And as always, the Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JAY LENO, HOST, THE TONIGHT SHOW : Last night, President Bush landed in Vietnam, but he's running a little bit behind. As you know, he was supposed to be there in 1968.

(LAUGHTER) (END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone. Proving that it's never too early for presidential politics, both Rudy Giuliani and John McCain set up exploratory campaigns this week. And we're joined this morning here in the studio by Senator McCain. Welcome back.

MCCAIN: Thanks, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So, you're in South Carolina or Michigan talking to a county chairman. When he asks, why should I support you over Rudy Giuliani, what do you say?

MCCAIN: My record. My record of being a conservative Republican, of knowledge on national security and defense issues. My advocacy for less government is the best government, and I think people should be judged on their record, but also their vision for the future of the country.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Mayor Giuliani describes himself as both pro- choice and pro-gay rights. Do you think someone with those positions can get the Republican nomination and effectively lead the Republican Party?

MCCAIN: I don't know. I know that he's an American hero. I know that Americans will never forget the magnificent job he did following 9/11, and I think he would be very favorably looked on by a lot of Americans.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I know you're not pro-choice. You're pro-life. Are you pro-gay rights?

MCCAIN: In the respect that I believe that the don't ask, don't tell policy is working in the military. I don't know how you view that. I do not believe that marriage between -- I believe in the sanctity and unique role of marriage between man and woman, but I certainly don't believe in discriminating against any American.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But on that don't ask, don't tell policy, the military now classifies homosexuals -- they classify homosexuality as a defect. Do you agree with that?

MCCAIN: No, I don't think they do that. I'd have to...

STEPHANOPOULOS: It actually is. Yes, they do right now.

MCCAIN: I don't think it's a, quote, defect, but I do believe the don't ask, don't tell policy has been very effective. We've got the best military we've ever had in our all-volunteer force, so I think the policy is working.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You say you believe marriage should be reserved for between a man and woman. You voted for an initiative in Arizona that went beyond that and actually denied any government benefits to civil unions or domestic partnerships. Are you against civil unions for gay couples? MCCAIN: No, I am not. But that initiative, I think, was misinterpreted. I think that initiative did allow for people to join in legal agreements such as power of attorney and others. I think that there was a difference of opinion on the interpretation of that constitutional amendment in Arizona.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you're for civil unions?

MCCAIN: No, I am for ability of two people -- I do not believe gay marriage should be legal. I do not believe gay marriage should be legal, but I do believe that people ought to be able to enter into contracts, exchange powers of attorney, other ways that people who have relationship can enter into.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You threw your support behind Trent Lott to be Republican whip. He has said that homosexuality is a sin. Is that what you think?

MCCAIN: I've never heard Trent Lott state that, but, no, that's not what I...

STEPHANOPOULOS: That's not your position?

MCCAIN: No.

STEPHANOPOULOS: One final question on abortion. You're for...

MCCAIN: I just want to point out again, I believe that gay marriage should not be legal, OK, but I don't believe that we should discriminate against any American, because that's not the nature of America, OK?

STEPHANOPOULOS: Does that extend then that you should -- do you believe then that there should be a law that bans discrimination against gays and lesbians in the workplace?

MCCAIN: I don't believe we should discriminate against anyone in the workplace, but I don't think we need specific laws that would apply necessarily to people who are gay.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me ask one question about abortion. Then I want to turn to Iraq. You're for a constitutional amendment banning abortion, with some exceptions for life and rape and incest.

MCCAIN: Rape, incest and the life of the mother. Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So is President Bush, yet that hasn't advanced in the six years he's been in office. What are you going to do to advance a constitutional amendment that President Bush hasn't done?

MCCAIN: I don't think a constitutional amendment is probably going to take place, but I do believe that it's very likely or possible that the Supreme Court should -- could overturn Roe v. Wade, which would then return these decisions to the states, which I support.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And you'd be for that?

MCCAIN: Yes, because I'm a federalist. Just as I believe that the issue of gay marriage should be decided by the states, so do I believe that we would be better off by having Roe v. Wade return to the states. And I don't believe the Supreme Court should be legislating in the way that they did on Roe v. Wade.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me ask you about Iraq. President Bush is in Vietnam this week, and he says the lesson for Iraq from Vietnam is we'll succeed unless we quit. Is that the lesson you draw from Vietnam?

MCCAIN: The lesson I learned from Vietnam is applicable today. If you're going to do what's necessary to succeed, i.e., the Powell doctrine, then go ahead and do it. But if you're not willing to, then don't.

And right now, from the beginning, as was acknowledged by General Abizaid last week, we didn't have enough troops on the ground at the beginning. Things continued to deteriorate, and we're faced with very, very tough decisions in Iraq today.

And I believe the consequences of failure are catastrophic. It will spread to the region. You will see Iran more emboldened. Eventually, you could see Iran pose a greater threat to the state of Israel.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You said very clearly in your speech at GOPAC this week that unless we increase the number of troops, we will not win.

MCCAIN: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And you went farther than that, though...

MCCAIN: But I've been saying that for three and a half years.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You have. You also said that you could send soldiers and Marines back to battle if we were willing to make that commitment. But you went on to say this. Let me show our viewers.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: What I cannot do is ask him to return to Iraq to risk life and limb so that we might delay our defeat for a few months or a year. It would not be in the interests of the country, and it surely would be an intolerable sacrifice for so poor an accomplishment. It would be immoral, and I could not do it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: General Abizaid told you in the Senate Armed Services Committee this week that he does not believe more troops are necessary. President Bush has said he doesn't want to send more troops now.

So by your own standards, isn't it currently immoral to keep Marines and soldiers, other service people, in Iraq?

MCCAIN: Yes, it is. And we've got to ask yourself some questions. One, are we winning? And I think the answer is no. The other is, what are the consequences of defeat? I just pointed out -- a widening war, greater chaos in the region, other countries drawn in, emboldening and strengthening of Iraq.

Can we still win? Yes, I believe we can. It'll be tough, but we need to do it. And what we need to do is we've got to control the strongholds in Anbar. We've got to hold them with Iraqi and U.S. forces and provide sufficient security. We've got to arrest the momentum of the death squads. We've got to continue training the Iraqi army and American presence in Iraqi units, and put Americans into the police force.

Do we have enough troops to do all that? No, we do not.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And, sir...

MCCAIN: And so -- so we have to have additional forces, or we will be playing whack-a-mole, as I've described earlier.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You have been calling for this, as you said, for an awful long time. The president and the generals have been resisting it for an awful long time.

MCCAIN: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: At what point do you say, I'm not going to be complicit with an immoral policy?

MCCAIN: I think we've exhausted every possibility to do what is necessary to exceed, and not until then, because the consequences of failure are catastrophic.

You referred earlier to Vietnam. We left Vietnam. It was over. We just had to heal the wounds of war. We leave this place, chaos in the region, and they'll follow us home. So there's a great deal more at stake here in this conflict, in my view, a lot more.

STEPHANOPOULOS: We've got the Pentagon review coming up in the next couple of weeks, the White House review. You've got Secretary Baker's commission likely to report in the month of December. If those reviews do not call for an increase in troops, as you've advocated, will you call for American troops to come home?

MCCAIN: I will if at the point I think that we have exhausted every option and that we are doomed to failure. I don't know if it'll be at that point or not.

I notice that several retired generals, General Zinni recently, General Batiste, many others have said the same thing that I've said. Many other observers are in agreement with me. Would it put a terrible strain on the Army and Marine Corps? Absolutely, it would be terrible. We're going to be asking people to go back again and again, maybe even extend their tours.

But there's only one thing worse, and that is defeat. I saw a broken army in 1973, and I don't want to see this Army and military...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Henry Kissinger said today he no longer thinks a military solution is possible in Iraq. As I said, you've been calling for this for a long time, but it seems like you continually move the goal posts as well.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You say, boy, if we don't increase the troops, then we're going to lose. Man, if we don't increase the troops, we're going to lose, yet you've...

MCCAIN: And we've been losing.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And we've been losing. But that's my point. I mean, you keep saying at some point, you're going to reach the determination that the policy has failed. It seems like you've reached that determination, but you're not willing to declare it.

MCCAIN: Well, I haven't reached that determination. As you said, there's the Baker commission. There's going to be other studies, internal Pentagon study, et cetera. And other things are happening.

Many Americans believe that we need to do what's necessary to win, or not. And Dr. Henry Kissinger and I are dear friends. I talk to him all the time. But in all due respect, you can't have a political solution unless you have a military solution. There's never been one in history.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The Baker commission is also looking at the possibility of engaging Syria and Iran in this diplomatic process. Would you be for that?

MCCAIN: I don't mind engaging them at all. I think we have to understand that we not only have the Iranian nuclear problem, but the Iranians are on the ascendancy if we fail. So it's going to be very difficult to find common interests.

Now, maybe long-term, it's in Iran's interests not to see chaos in the region. I don't know. But in the short term, both Iran and Syria do not share the same goals that the United States of America does. And we have to take that in consideration when we have discussions with them.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But to be clear, if the Baker commission does not call for more troops, if President Bush does not call for more troops by the State of the Union, will you be calling for American troops to come home?

MCCAIN: I don't know. I don't know the situation at the time. The consequences of failure are so severe that I will exhaust every possibility to try to fix this situation. Because it's not the end when American troops leave. The battleground shifts, and we'll be fighting them again.

You read Zarqawi, and you read bin Laden, you read them. It's not just Iraq that they're interested in. It's the region, and then us.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Until then, by your own admission, American men and women are dying for an immoral policy.

MCCAIN: Well, they're fighting and dying for a failed policy. I respect the views that others have, but I think the record is very clear that all these other options, for example, withdraw to enclaves and continue the training. What, while Al Jazeera broadcasts people being beheaded who were supporters of ours?

Go over the horizon. And how do you get back in? A military operation to get back in. Do you fly helicopters in? There's no good options here. There's no good options. But the consequences of failure are severe, and I believe that we must do what's necessary to prevail.

And I understand how terrible this is. The young men and women who are in the military today, and God bless them, they'll respond if called upon to.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me turn to the issue of taxes. I was talking to Vice President Cheney a couple of weeks ago. He had this to say about the Bush tax cuts.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DICK CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: The economy is going gangbusters. It's doing very, very well, primarily because of the tax cuts we put in place in 2001 and 2003. Democrats overwhelmingly opposed those.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: You opposed those, as well. Do you now believe the vice president is right when he says the economy is going gangbusters primarily because of the Bush tax cuts?

MCCAIN: I think we have a very strong economy, and the Bush administration and the Republican Congress deserves great credit for it. I was worried about two things when I voted against the tax cuts the first time. One, there was no restraint on spending, and that had to be. And the second time around, we were in a war. We've never cut taxes in time of war.

Do I think that they need to be extended? Absolutely, because if you don't, then it's a tax increase.

STEPHANOPOULOS: How is that consistent? If the tax cuts were the wrong idea, and right now, the debt is much higher than it was when you voted against them, why is it right to extend them now?

MCCAIN: Because you would then be increasing taxes on the American people, who have made their family planning based on the tax cuts today.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you now believe that the tax cuts did in fact fuel this economic growth?

MCCAIN: I think they helped fuel the economic growth. But I also think that it was vital that we increase -- that we put in spending restraints so that we didn't increase the debt as the way we have this time. We've laid a terrible burden on future generations of Americans in this huge debt, and also Social Security and Medicare. Huge debt.

And they're going to have to pay it. And that's a terrible thing to do to future generations.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you look to a presidential campaign, you've been a great advocate for campaign finance reform. If you choose to run, will you stay inside the public financing system or go around it?

MCCAIN: I don't think -- it depends, one, on what other candidates might do. But the problem is that we haven't updated the public financing on presidential campaigns -- you can go back to '74 laws, and that puts one at a very significant disadvantage. What we need to do is update the presidential financing system so that it's more in keeping with today's reality, where people raise $50, $100, $150 million.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, sir, you turned 70 in August. You'll be 72 on Election Day. What do you say to voters who are worried about your age?

MCCAIN: I say that I'm older than dirt and I have more scars than Frankenstein, but I've learned a few things on the way. And I'd like them to meet my 94-year-old mother who just returned from traveling in France.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You were ready with that answer.

Senator McCain, thank you very much.

MCCAIN: Thanks, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Up next, we have the first Sunday interview with the new House majority leader, Steny Hoyer.

And later, Jimmie Johnson's blood drive.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JOHNSON: For just a little pin prick -- you know, 12 minutes of your time, you can really impact someone's life and make a difference.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), HOUSE SPEAKER-ELECT: Steny came out a big winner today. It was a stunning victory for him. We've had our debates. We've had our disagreements in that room, and now that is over. As I said to my colleagues, let -- as we say in church, let there be peace on earth and let it begin with us. Let the healing begin.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: That is the incoming speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, talking about the new Democratic leader of the House, Steny Hoyer who joins us right now. Welcome.

HOYER: Glad to be with you, George. Thanks a lot. STEPHANOPOULOS: You heard Speaker-to-be Pelosi, there, saying, Let the healing begin. I talked to a lot of your supporters this week who said the ball's in her court.

For the healing to begin, she has to reach out to you and make you a full partner. Have she done that?

HOYER: I think -- yes, we're had a good talk, and I look forward to working with her closely, as we have over the last four years.

George, as you know, Nancy and I are working together. After we ran against one another for whip, or at least we both ran for whip -- I prefer to say it that way -- we've worked very closely together, created a very unified caucus, the most unified we've had in a half a century.

And I am convinced that Nancy and I, who have been friends for over 40 years, are going to be able to do that.

After all, the American public have just given us a big mandate for change and taken the country in a new direction. Nancy and I share that obligation together. We understand that. That's our objective and we're going to work very closely to accomplish that.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I was told that every single one of your nominators actually made the point that we've had a winning team; why break it up?

But after the vote, a lot of supporters of Congressman Murtha, of the speaker are saying they're going to retaliate against your supporters, deny them choice committee assignments.

Has the speaker-to-be promised you that that won't happen?

HOYER: Well, we're going to talk about that. But I'm sure that's not going to happen. One of the reasons it going to not happen is that there are a lot of them.

And it's one thing, as you well know because you've been through this, if you have a margin of one or two or five or even ten, that's one thing but when you have a margin as decisively as the caucus made a decision, then it's time to move on. I don't think there's going to be recrimination or retaliation.

How did Speaker Pelosi get the vote count so wrong? As you say, this wasn't even close.

HOYER: Well, I don't know that she was counting. Nancy Pelosi is a very loyal individual. I respect that quality in her. Jack Murtha had been her campaign chairman. He's her friend, and she supported him, and I understand that and respect her loyalty and even in the face of what she knew was going to be criticism about getting into it.

But because she's so loyal, she decided to do that, and the caucus made a determination. As you said, I really think the bottom- line determination was, they unanimously elected Nancy Pelosi as our nominee for speaker. They're enthusiastic about Nancy, who has set forth an agenda, worked extraordinarily hard to get us where we are. And she's going to be a great speaker, but they said we want to keep the team intact because you've done the job for us.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You said you all have been friends for 40 years, even though you ran against each other. But there seems to be something personal going on here. And some say it goes back to 1963 when you both interned for the same Maryland senator.

HOYER: Well, whoever says that has no idea of what they're talking about. Nancy and I had a great relationship then. I first met her husband then. They weren't married then. She was just a graduate of Trinity. I was at Georgetown law school.

And Nancy and I have had a very good relationship. In fact, George, you may recall, when I first ran for whip back in the early '90s, Nancy was one of my principal supporters.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So no bad blood?

HOYER: No bad blood.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's turn to Iraq. Speaker Pelosi has said that ending the war is her top priority. You just heard Senator McCain. He says unless we increase troops, we're going to lose. Do you agree?

HOYER: As a practical matter, there are no troops to increase with. I have been a severe critic since even before the war began, but since its inception in 2003, that we sent a vastly undermanned force to accomplish the objectives, not of beating the Republican Army, Saddam Hussein's army, but to stabilize the country in the short term. The failure to do that has led to the failed performance now. So our mission has not been accomplished.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But more troops now wouldn't help?

HOYER: I think it's -- I heard your earlier interview. I think Kissinger may well be right that we've passed the point now because of our failed implementation of this policy. It's been one of the worst implementations of a foreign policy I have seen in my lifetime.

As a result of failing to stabilize the country in the very short term, 30-, 60-day period after Saddam Hussein fell, the failure to get the economy moving, infrastructure up, electricity being delivered, public works online, the insurgency had an environment in which it could grow and recruit people. I think that what we have said as a united party in three letters to the president of the United States over the last three months, which were signed by Nancy, myself, Ike Skelton and Jack Murtha as well as John Larson and Jim Clyburn, members of the Democratic leadership on the House side, and the Senate leadership is, this is a failed policy, staying the course, Mr. President.

You need to change it. We need to have a transition. We need to reach out to the surrounding states. We need to have bilateral talks with the Syrians and the Iranians. I understand what John McCain just said, that their interests are not necessarily ours. But as Jim Baker has said, if you don't sit down and talk, there's not going to be progress.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Secretary Baker is also considering the option of temporarily increasing the number of troops as part of his plan. Could you go along with that?

HOYER: Well, we'll have to see what that plan is, but if that temporary increase is consistent with a plan to transition and to redeploy and to make it clear that the responsibility for Iraqi security and defense is the Iraqis. After all, our objective was to remove Saddam Hussein and create an environment in which a democracy could be established.

That has been done. Now, unfortunately, in my opinion the Maliki government is not doing what is necessary to remove the militias from the environment and to tamp -- to stop the sectarian violence and killing that's going on. In that context, we will not be able to obtain stability, but if you have a failed government, our continuing to prop up that failed government will not ultimately succeed.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You've got a restive minority in the Democratic caucus in the House who say the only way to stop this war is to cut off funding. I think about 22 House Democrats have signed a letter endorsing that policy. Are you for that? Would you schedule a vote on that?

HOYER: George, that's way premature to consider that, in my opinion. We met with the president. Nancy and I, as you know, were invited down to the White House, and we talked to the president. Nancy and I both made it very clear that we believe that he needed to leave the stay the course policy and get a policy for transition. I think in the next...

STEPHANOPOULOS: So it's premature but not off the table?

HOYER: I think we're not going to defund the troops in the field, period. We're going to support the troops in the field.

That's not an option, of not supporting our troops in the field and making sure they're as safe as we can make them.

Very frankly, their lack of numbers exposes them on a daily basis to danger and death, unfortunately. But clearly, we're going to have discussions going forward as to how we change this policy and change it in the short term, not the long term.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Speaker-to-be Pelosi has another big decision she's going to face, on who's going to be the chairman of the Intelligence Committee.

The Blue Dog conservative-moderate coalition has written her a letter supporting Jane Harman for the chair. The Black Caucus has written her a letter supporting Alcee Hastings for the chair of the Intelligence Committee.

Who's your candidate?

HOYER: I don't have a candidate. Nancy Pelosi is going to make that appointment. Nancy, as you know, served on the Intelligence Committee. She's very knowledgeable of the needs of the Intelligence Committee. It's a tough decision for her to make.

Those are two alternatives you talk about. Jane Harman, I think, has done an excellent job. I've served with Alcee Hastings. Those who have served with him think he's a very able, credible candidate.

She's going to have to make that determination. I'm convinced that Nancy Pelosi will make that decision in a timely fashion, consistent with the interests of the United States and the intelligence community.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Some have said, I think, in the New York Times, and other papers have editorialized, saying it's inappropriate for Congressman Hastings to be made the chairman because he was impeached, when he was a federal judge, by the Senate.

Is that disqualifying to you?

HOYER: I think Nancy's going to make that decision. And she'll have to determine that. And I'll discuss it with her.

STEPHANOPOULOS: What do you think?

HOYER: Well, I'll discuss it with her and I want to give her my advice in private.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Then I'm going to ask you one more question about it Jane Harman.

(LAUGHTER)

Members of the 9/11 families, of the 9/11 commission -- I want to show you what one of them wrote in the Baltimore Sun.

Ms. Harman's ouster goes against a key 9/11 Commission recommendation that advocates for allowing long-term membership and leadership of a committee that requires expertise and experience. Removing Ms. Harman, when we need strong intelligence supervision, is a slap in the face to the 9/11 Commission recommendations.

Does Carrie Lemack have a point?

HOYER: Let me say that I think that the recommendations of the commission are good. I think their focus on creating a long-term service on the Intelligence Committee so that people acquire the expertise and the experience and the knowledge of what has happened in the past makes them more effective in overseeing the intelligence community and making intelligence policy.

So I think that's a good recommendation. I think that, clearly, Nancy Pelosi will take that into consideration.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you're not going to make a public endorsement, but you are going to give her a private choice?

HOYER: I will certainly talk to Nancy about this choice.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me ask one more question. Speaker-to-be Pelosi has said that she wants this to be the most honest and ethical House in history. Democratic sources tell me that you all are considering a total ban on gifts from lobbyists, meals from lobbyists...

HOYER: Travel.

STEPHANOPOULOS: ... travel from lobbyists.

Will you be putting that front and center in January?

HOYER: Yes. I'm a co-sponsor of that legislation.

The American public were very concerned about the culture of corruption. We talked a lot about it. We had Duke Cunningham convicted for taking the biggest bribes in our history; $2.4 million, I think, was the total. He's now serving time in jail.

We need to give the American public the confidence that the business of the American people are being done in an honest, open, transparent fashion.

We need to make sure that they understand that we're not doing business because of the special interests, that our focus is on the general interests of the American public, American families. And we're going to do that. And we're going to adopt legislation that will make it very clear that the expectations of members' conduct is very, very high.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Congressman Hoyer, thanks very much.

HOYER: Terrific.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The roundtable is next with George Will, Fareed Zakaria and Robert Reich.

.(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(ROUNDTABLE)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our Voice this week, Jimmie Johnson. Later today, he'll race for the NASCAR championship, and he's also leading NASCAR's drive to help Americans suffering from leukemia and other blood diseases. For Johnson, it's personal.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

JOHNSON: Giving blood can save someone's life. It opens up the world of possibilities for these -- for people in need. That's why this cause is so important to motorsports and so important to myself. It has saved my team owner's life, and beyond being a team owner he's been a father figure and mentor to me.

Professionally and personally he's always been there for me, and I try to get involved and stay involved in things that are important to him. It's an important cause to myself, as well. There's -- if I'm not mistaken, an infinite type of marrow types, so it takes -- it's a long process, and it takes many, many potential donors to find a match for a recipient. So it's a complicated thing. It's not an easy thing to do.

NASCAR fan catches a caution at the right time, one of the long ones, they can be typed and donate the blood and be back on the couch and not miss any of the action. It's really just about getting it in front of the fans. This is a great start to that. You know, I think we had a very, very successful first year of blood drives. We did it at the different racetracks, and it's only going to get bigger and better.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: For more information on how you can donate blood and join the national bone marrow registry, go to This Week's website at abcnews.com.

And now, the Sunday Funnies.

(SUNDAY FUNNIES)

STEPHANOPOULOS: That's our show for today. Thanks for sharing part of your Sunday with us and have a blessed and safe Thanksgiving. We'll see you next week.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. President Bush keeps up the pressure on North Korea, next on Fox News Sunday.

It was the joke that almost derailed the Democrats' march to their majority...

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KERRY: ... make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: ... and led his party to ask him to sit out the rest of the campaign. Today, for the first time since the botched joke controversy, an exclusive interview with Senator John Kerry. We'll ask him why he didn't apologize right away and whether he's still a viable candidate for 2008.

Reigniting the Republican revolution: What will it take for the GOP to take back control of Congress? We'll talk with the architect of the sweeping Republican victory of 1994, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Plus, why is this woman laughing? The Democrats' new leader in the House suffers her first defeat. We'll hear from our Sunday regulars: Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams.

And our power player of the week, cooking at the White House for 10,000.

All right now on Fox News Sunday.

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. Here's a quick check of the latest headlines.

Wrapping up his visit to Vietnam, President Bush pressed the issue of ending North Korea's nuclear program, especially in a meeting with the president of China. A statement from Asian and Pacific nations calls for North Korea to return to talks and stop developing nuclear weapons.

The president travels next to Indonesia, and even before he arrives, thousands of protesters marched the streets of Jakarta, some calling Mr. Bush a war criminal.

And in Iraq, at least 22 people are dead after a suicide bombing in the southern city of Hillah. According to police, a man drove his minivan into a crowd, promising work, then blew up the truck. While the last few weeks have been a time of triumph for most Democrats, it's been a time of trial for Senator John Kerry, who disappeared from the campaign trail in the post-election victory lap after making a joke that went bad. Today, Senator Kerry is sitting down for his first interview since the controversy.

And, Senator, welcome back to Fox News Sunday.

KERRY: Glad to be with you. Thank you for having me.

WALLACE: Speaking to a former hockey player, have you been in the penalty box the last few weeks? Did Democratic leaders say to you that you were becoming a distraction in the final week before the election and that you should sit down?

KERRY: You know, I would differ a little with the characterization you gave. Look, first of all, obviously, it was a bad joke, and I apologized for it. And we moved on, and we should move on.

You know, we had an historic election, absolutely historic. The American people spoke. And I worked very, very hard for those two years to help us elect a Democratic majority.

It was clear to me that if people wanted to make that joke a distraction, I didn't want it to be. I wanted to win -- results. You know, campaigns are about winning and losing. We won.

Now we move on. You just had the news a moment ago, people are dead in Iraq. We have a terrible, unbelievable morass over there that's going to require enormous leadership. We Democrats are excited about what we've won, which is an opportunity to govern and help lead the country in the right direction. That's what I'm looking at.

WALLACE: Well, I must say -- and we told you before you came on that we were going to talk some about the joke. I agree there's things to talk about after, but there are questions people have, and I'm going to ask you about them, sir.

Didn't two senators, didn't Democratic leader Harry Reid and also the Democratic campaign chair, Chuck Schumer, didn't they call you up after the joke and say to you, This has become a distraction; sit down; get off the campaign trail ?

KERRY: Chris, let me again say to you -- I mean, let's be serious about this. This was a bad joke. And I own it. And I apologized for it.

But the full measure of the Republican attack machine knew exactly what I had said, and they set out to make it a distraction.

I had a discussion with a number of leaders, including my colleague Ted Kennedy and others, in order to make a judgment about what was best to accomplish the goal that I had been working for.

And since you had some very close races, I thought it was important. I made the decision. It was my decision to make certain that I didn't distract.

And the results are what speak for themselves. In fact, the Republicans made a terrible mistake, because they shifted the topic back to Iraq. The polls showed that we went up. They didn't want to talk about Iraq, and within two days, they tried to shift back to taxes.

This is over. This was a misstatement. All of us make them in life. You wish you could have it back, but you can't.

But what really is the measure is, what are you fighting for? This election was a moment of history where the people of our country said, We're tired of a corrupt Congress. We're tired of a Congress that's dysfunctional. We're tired of seeing the main issues that affect our lives not be attended to.

And we Democrats -- and I'm proud that I contributed to that. You know, last summer people didn't want to talk about Iraq. I brought that to the floor of the United States Senate, and I helped force that discussion with Russ Feingold, Ted Kennedy and others.

So I believe I offered leadership. And leadership is the real test. Do you lead? I believe I've laid out an agenda on energy independence. I think I've laid out an agenda on health care, an agenda on how we get out of Iraq, how we rebuild America's moral authority. And that's what I'm going to continue to do.

And I've offered -- you know, I called Condoleezza Rice, and I said, Look, let's find a way to work together, because the country needs us to move on. They don't want to talk about a joke that's old news.

WALLACE: But, Senator, in fairness...

KERRY: Only you do.

WALLACE: No, it's not just me. I've got to tell you, there are a lot of people who want to, because they think that it raises questions. Both Republicans and Democrats have said it raises questions about your political judgment.

I want to put up on the screen what it is that your office, your staff said was the joke that you meant to say.

Please put it up on the screen, if you will.

That you said, Do you know where you end up if you don't study, if you aren't smart, if you're intellectually lazy? You end up getting us stuck in a war in Iraq. Just ask President Bush.

Question: Do you think that -- that was the real joke; that's not the botched joke. Do you think that that's funny, to call the president of the United States dumb and lazy?

KERRY: I think they didn't do their homework, and I think Americans know they didn't do their homework. It was not a good joke. It was not well-stated. I own it; I apologized for it. And it's time to move on.

Let's look at this question of homework. Let's look at the question of the troops. Who really was insulted?

I'm a veteran. I have fought all my life to help take care of veterans and to honor what service means. Just this past week, in the United States Senate, I added $18 million in order to help for mental health problems that a lot of veterans are having because they come back with post-traumatic stress syndrome, and there are waiting lines, and we're not taking care of them.

You want to know what the insult to the troops is? The insult to the troops is sending them to war for false reasons. The insult to the troops is sending them to war without the equipment that they need, without the armor, without the armed Humvees. The insult was having the secretary of defense who, for month after month after month, refused to listen to the Congress and listen to his own advisers. The insult is having troops who have a strategy that has them mired without the diplomacy necessary to resolve what everyone has said cannot be resolved militarily.

Now, I'm going to continue to fight for that. That's what the American people voted for the other day, Chris. And, you know, this parlor game of who's up, who's down, today or tomorrow, if I listened to that stuff, I never would've won the nomination, I never would've gotten up in the morning. And I'm not going to be sidetracked by it now, and nor should you.

WALLACE: But, Senator, people are trying to take a measure, as they look ahead to 2008, of the various candidates, and are they...

KERRY: Well, then, you know what I say to them? Take a measure of the guy who mortgaged his house when I was at 30 points below and nobody said I could win. Take a measure of a guy who got up every morning and went to Iowa and said, I know how to win this. Take a measure of a guy who was 10 points down and won three debates against a sitting president of the United States and put on a convention that had a great message to America about where we're going.

I believe I learned a lot of lessons in that race. And one of the lessons is, when the full attack machine of the Republican Party is leveled at you, fight back. I fought back, for my honor, my integrity and for the rectitude of what I said.

WALLACE: But, Senator...

KERRY: And now we go forward. That's behind us.

WALLACE: But, Senator, wait, wait. The point that a lot of Democrats, not Republicans, Democrats are making at this point is, they're saying you learned the wrong lesson from 2004, that the lesson you -- and you were on the show about a month ago...

KERRY: Right.

WALLACE: ... and you said, I'm not going to get swiftboated again.

KERRY: Correct.

WALLACE: Some people say that's the wrong lesson; that the right lesson is to be politically agile, to be deft in handling whatever the situation is. Sometimes when it's fighting back and that's appropriate, fight back. When it's apologizing, that's appropriate.

I want to take you, if I may, sir, I want to take you back, because some people say what may have gotten you in as much as trouble as the joke is the way you responded to it. Both...

KERRY: But, Chris...

WALLACE: If I may, sir, both Republicans and Democrats were demanding an apology, but here is you at the news conference the next day. Let's take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KERRY: Let me make it crystal-clear, as crystal-clear as I know how: I apologize to no one for my criticism of the president and of his broken policy.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Senator...

KERRY: Yes, but why didn't you play the part where I said, It was a botched joke, and I never intended to insult anybody, especially not the troops ?

WALLACE: But why didn't...

KERRY: Because that was part of what I just said.

WALLACE: ... apologize. The question is...

KERRY: I apologized...

WALLACE: The question is, why not just stop the bleeding right away...

KERRY: Sure, Chris, I've apologized. And this is now clear to everybody, that it was a botched joke; I own it.

But I think the measure of an individual in public life and the measure of what I have done is much bigger than missing one word in a bad joke.

And, you know, that's a game everybody plays here in Washington. What people want to know is, what are we going to do about these major issues? America has lost its moral authority in the world. Does that matter, as we sit here today? Does that matter to people who play this parlor game in Washington? I've been leading the effort to try to restore how we have a foreign policy that makes us stronger. We need to have the ability to be able to talk directly to North Korea. We need to deal with Iran and Syria. I promise you the Baker Commission will come out and say that we should be doing things that some of us have been saying we should be doing for three years. That's leadership.

Energy independence: The United States of America could have jobs, better health, better environment, better security if we move toward real energy independence.

What the American people voted for the other day is to stop having an oil industry that writes an oil bill, a drug industry that writes the drug bill, a bank industry and credit card industry that writes a bankruptcy bill, and takes away from the American people their right to be in the people's house. The people's house once again belongs to the people.

Now, I think what's important for us to talk about is, how do we build a bipartisanship that lifts our government and seizes this moment of optimism and hope that's been expressed by the American people?

WALLACE: Well, Senator...

KERRY: That's what's important.

WALLACE: ... we keep talking past each other. I'm going to...

KERRY: Well, no, that's only because you want to focus on the picayune, not on the real issues that face the country.

WALLACE: I don't think this is picayune, sir. I mean, one of the points is that, on November 1st, when you finally issued your apology, you didn't even come out and say it yourself. You issued a statement. You issued a written piece of paper.

KERRY: I...

WALLACE: If I may, sir, just finish.

KERRY: Sure.

WALLACE: That same day, November 1st, a woman named Danna Swain Palmer sent you and every other senator a letter. Her son, Cory, left the computer engineering program at West Virginia University -- here he is up on the screen -- to join the Marines, sign up for the Marines. And this May, he and three of his comrades were killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq.

And here's what she wrote to you, Senator: These men, along with their peers, are superior in intellect. How dare you dishonor them by your careless words.

Mrs. Palmer, Senator, has yet to hear -- this was three weeks ago -- has yet to hear from your office. Here is your opportunity, on camera, in front of the country. What do you say to her and everyone else about those comments you made?

KERRY: I'm sorry. I apologize. Profusely, profoundly. And I have said that on any number of occasions, and I can't make it more clear.

But at the same time, Chris, let's be honest about this. I mean, let's be honest about it. The White House knew that I didn't set out to or intend to insult anybody. And people who read the full context of my remarks knew that I didn't set out to do it. And what those troops heard they heard because the White House attack machine took those comments and took them into what they want.

And what I learned in '04 is, if people are going to try to make you something that you're not, if people are going to try to manufacture who you are, you have to fight back for that.

Now, I am deeply sorry for that woman, for her. And I have asked my staff to find anybody that I can contact -- I've contacted people in the military, because I feel this so profoundly.

Even the joke itself wouldn't make sense for the simple reason that we do have a volunteer army and you have to be smart to get into it. So, even that runs counter to what they did.

Now, I've apologized, and we have to move on to the real issues that face this country. And those are the issues of, how are we going to govern? How are we going to lift this place up? People didn't vote -- you know, nothing that I said affected this race. We won all our races. That's what I wanted to do.

And I think I showed political acumen, in fact, to understand that. My instinct would've been, if I'd been on the ballot, to go out. My name wasn't on the ballot. So I went out and fought and did what I thought was right in order to help elect a majority.

You know, winning -- you know, Newt Gingrich is coming on. You know, campaigns are about winning and losing. We won. We won a majority in the Congress. We won the right to go forward. That's what I've been working for.

And now I'm excited, as Americans are. They don't want to sit here and rehash the past. That's a Washington game, that's an inside- politics game.

WALLACE: How much damage...

KERRY: The real test is whether or not we're going to do what they've elected us to do. Are they going to accept responsibility? Are we going to do health care for all Americans? Are we going to reform the ethics of the United States Congress so we can open it up and be accountable and transparent?

WALLACE: Senator, how much damage has this done to your possibly seeking the presidency in 2008?

KERRY: The voters will decide that in the future. I believe the voters want to see leadership. And I'm proud of the leadership that I've offered. As I said, I was the first person to run for president who actually advertised publicly about energy independence and dealt with climate change in a real way.

We are the only nation in the world that is the denier of the facts and science of climate change. That has to change. I've been leading on that. Leading on health care -- I have a health-care plan that I laid out that I think is still one that would make our businesses more competitive, one that would help our country to reduce the cost of doing business and provide health care that's affordable to all Americans. And I know that we can fight a more effective war on terror and make our country more secure.

That's the crux of...

WALLACE: I want to ask you about the war on terror in a second, but I just want to make clear on 2008: You have not given up the thought of running for president in 2008?

KERRY: Not in the least. I'm looking at it in the same way. The people that I have talked to across the country are -- my team is confident and strong. I don't know what I'll do.

WALLACE: Are you thinking of setting up -- because that seems to be the thing to do now -- are you thinking of setting up an exploratory committee?

KERRY: You know what we need to do right now? And I've said this all along. My decision would be somewhere around the turn of the year, beginning of the year. Right now our focus, all of us, ought to be to respect what happened on Election Day.

The American people want us to make the Congress function in their interests. The American people are waiting for us to lift up an enormous challenge.

And what's interesting to me is, you know, my colleagues in the Senate and the House are not going to do unto others as they've done unto us. We're not going to be seeking retribution. We're all reaching out to our ranking members as future chairmen. We're going to try to work across the aisle. We're going to try to build the consensus necessary.

And I'm prepared -- as I say, I called Condoleezza Rice. Nothing is more important than resolving Iraq, Afghanistan, North Korea. And I will do everything in my power there.

WALLACE: Let me ask you about Iraq, if I can. We've got about a minute left.

General John Abizaid, the commander of all U.S. forces in the Middle East, spoke to the Senate Armed Services Committee this week. He said to start pulling troops out of Iraq now would only increase the sectarian violence and weaken the government.

One, how do you respond? And, two, do you still have confidence in the generals in charge of the war in Iraq? KERRY: I have confidence in the generals. I think they've been put in a very, very difficult position.

What I don't have confidence in is the policy. And General Abizaid is giving us a diagnosis that is based on the current policy. But that policy has to change, and it can change.

I believe that if you pursue -- I know that if you pursue legitimate diplomacy, the way Henry Kissinger did when he made multiple trips, night after night, day after day, twisting arms, working; if you make the effort that Jim Baker did to build a legitimate coalition, I'm confident we can do what's necessary to get the neighborhood -- and I include in that Iran and Syria -- to take greater stakes in what they realize they have a stake in.

And, frankly, it's very incumbent on us Democrats -- and this is why I called Condoleezza Rice. We have a significant role to play, because we have credibility, because we need to represent a united government. This is in America's interest. This is not Democrat or Republican.

And, frankly, that's how you protect and honor the troops. You give the troops the civilian leadership and the policy that backs them up. We owe them that, and that's what I'm going to work on.

WALLACE: Senator Kerry, we're going to have to leave it there.

KERRY: Thank you.

WALLACE: I want to thank you so much for coming in today...

KERRY: Proud to be here.

WALLACE: ... and dealing with all of this. Please come back, sir.

KERRY: I will.

WALLACE: Up next, the Republicans pick a team to try to lead them back to the promise land. We'll ask former House Speaker Newt Gingrich what the GOP needs to do. Back in a moment.

WALLACE: In 12 years, the Republicans went from seizing control of both houses of Congress to once again watching from the sidelines, leaving many GOP leaders wondering where they went wrong. For answers, we turn to former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

And welcome back to Fox News Sunday.

GINGRICH: It's good to be with you.

WALLACE: So what do congressional Republicans need to do between now and 2008?

GINGRICH: Well, I think they have to recognize that the country sent them a message. I mean, the first thing Republicans have to do is realize they lost the election. I actually agree with John Kerry about this. Elections matter. The country sent a signal that, on performance, they were unhappy; that there were some scandals that made them even more unhappy; that the conservatives felt the Republicans were not controlling spending the way they wanted to.

And I think that there's got to be some fairly serious soul- searching, not just on Capitol Hill, but in the White House, as Republicans try to understand, you know, where do we go wrong and starting with the State of the Union and the budget and the things that will come up in January, how does the Republican Party get back on message in what had been a growing center-right majority over a 20- year period, starting with Ronald Reagan in 1980.

WALLACE: You call for bipartisanship, but you say that there are two very different choices: that there's one bipartisanship where you try to work with the congressional leaders, with Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid. The other way is what you call conservative bipartisanship, which is to try to peel off some of those conservative so-called 54 Blue Dog Democrats, in effect the way that Ronald Reagan did it in the early '80s.

GINGRICH: Yes, I was a sophomore, a very back-bench, junior congressman when President Reagan reached out and, for example, on his tax cuts, we got 49 Democrats who bolted from Tip O'Neill and the liberals and gave the Republicans a majority on the House floor.

Now, the Republicans in the Senate, of course, are right at the edge of a majority, with 49 votes. The Republicans in the House will be over 200, so they're stronger than they ever were under Ronald Reagan.

When you look at the number of Democrats who won in places like North Carolina, Indiana, Arizona, campaigning as centrist or Blue Dog or conservative, depending on where they were, Democrats, there's the potential that, with the right policies and right choices, that you could consistently have floor control for the conservatives in a bipartisan coalition even though you have a very liberal Democrat speaker.

WALLACE: You wrote an open memo this week in which you said the following, and let's put it up: Are House Republicans electing a leadership team to be an effective minority or a leadership team to regain the majority?

Well, on Friday, they chose to keep John Boehner and Roy Blunt as their leaders, both men with strong ties to lobbyists and special interests. And I don't have to tell you, some of your fellow conservatives weren't happy about that. Dick Viguerie said that we've decided to reward failure. Jeff Flake, congressman from Arizona, said, We're still in denial.

Does that same team of Boehner and Blunt, do they send the message of change that you say voters want to hear?

GINGRICH: Look, let me start with John Boehner. John Boehner was part of the original reform gang of seven that worked with me when I was the minority whip. John Boehner organized the Contract with America event on the Capitol steps. He was a very visionary leader of the House Republican Conference when I was speaker. And Boehner has only been the majority leader for the last seven or eight months and was not part of how we got in trouble.

Now, he's going to have to decide -- and I know John pretty well, and I think he desperately wants to be speaker and not minority leader. He's got to decide, is he going to focus on regaining control of the House, or is he going to focus on being the White House's floor leader? They are very different jobs. And my hope is that Boehner is going to decide that he wants to be the leader who helps the party get back into majority status.

WALLACE: Well, it's interesting you say that, because you seem to indicate that working for House interests is different from working for the White House.

I mean, there's a thing that's run through a number of statements you've said recently: Do you think the White House and President Bush have gone off-track?

GINGRICH: Look, I think every White House is its own world. I mean, President Eisenhower, President Nixon, President Reagan in his last two years. You know, it is inevitable.

The president gets up, and he has a legacy concern. What do I do in the next two years? I hope he'll decide that that legacy is in a bipartisan coalition that helps also, by the way, elect a Republican president in '08. The House Republicans have a different institutional challenge. How do they reach out in very closely contested districts, recruit the candidates, build the record, create the excitement and the energy to regain a majority?

They're not automatically identical. They can be identical. And I think if they work together and they're serious about it, they can make it identical. But they shouldn't start out every morning assuming that they're the same interests.

WALLACE: I want to press the point about the White House, because you blistered President Bush recently for getting rid of Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld on the day after the election...

GINGRICH: Yes.

WALLACE: ... rather than making this announcement a couple of weeks before. You say if he had done that, that the Republicans would still control the Senate and they might have a lot more seats in the House.

How do you explain the president's actions?

GINGRICH: I don't. I mean, I look at three things we've heard in the last week: dismissing Rumsfeld; General Abizaid saying we needed to change tactics in Iraq; and reports that the Baker-Hamilton Commission has been talking with Syria. And I look at a level of flexibility, which apparently was going on before the election, which is the opposite of what the American people were being told.

And I believe a large part of this election was an effort to send a signal that said you can't just stay the course in Iraq. You have to have flexibility. You have to find a way to get to a solution.

So I look at that, and I don't understand why, in mid-October, the president didn't publicly say, you know, We're going to go through changes. I hear you. We're going to do things differently.

And I think, had he done that -- and I've talked to a lot of candidates, including several defeated incumbents, who absolutely believe that, had that been the case by October 15, that you would still have a Republican Senate and you might well have a Republican House.

WALLACE: We asked presidential counselor Dan Bartlett about your criticism last week. He said if the president had made this announcement about Rumsfeld two weeks before the election, it would've looked, one, desperate and, two, political.

GINGRICH: Well, first of all, it's inherently political. I mean, deciding whether to keep the secretary of defense is always inherently political.

But in an election campaign, why wouldn't -- this goes back to my point about how White Houses think. Why wouldn't a White House, two weeks before an election in which the largest single issue is Iraq, try to answer the country -- not be political in some narrow, cheap, consultant sense, but answer the country, say to the country, You're right; I hear you ?

And I think it's a huge mistake for White Houses to think that somehow they can ignore the American people. And they usually get punished by the American people deciding to send a stronger and stronger signal until, finally, they get the message.

WALLACE: What do you think of Nancy Pelosi? And as a former speaker, how serious is her having this early defeat?

GINGRICH: Well, she's going to be the first woman speaker in American history. She is going to be a very left-wing San Francisco- values speaker. And she should be; she represents San Francisco, and that's honestly her background.

She has to learn to manage the House. I made a number of mistakes when I was speaker. She will make a number of mistakes when she's speaker.

But Republicans, instead of chortling about, you know, the fact that she backed Murtha rather than Hoyer, Republicans need to start by saying, you know, if she has these weaknesses, how come she's going to be speaker? She won.

She and Rahm Emanuel put together a very intelligent campaign. People like Steny Hoyer went out and raised a lot of money. The Democrats took control of the House for the first time in 12 years.

She did make a mistake with Murtha. I think, frankly, backing Jack Murtha and then losing, I think if she appoints Alcee Hastings to be the head of intelligence, that will be a further mistake in the direction of making her far too left-wing and far too insensitive.

But I would say no one should render judgment on her until she's had six months to learn this new job.

WALLACE: Finally -- we have a couple of minutes left -- let's look ahead to the 2008 presidential race, because once an election's over, we've got to look at the next election.

GINGRICH: That's right. It never ends.

(LAUGHTER)

WALLACE: With George Allen and Rick Santorum now apparently out, is there a vacuum on the right for a candidate appealing to true conservatives?

GINGRICH: Well, there's probably a vacuum, but you have to be fair. Governor Mitt Romney is working very hard to fill that vacuum, and may well succeed. Senator McCain would like to find a way to fill that vacuum and is working very hard at it.

WALLACE: Why do conservatives have doubts about John McCain? And are they legitimate?
GINGRICH: Well, I mean, look, I have a fundamental difference with Senator McCain on amnesty for illegal immigrants; on the tax policy, where he was very much against tax cuts; on the question of McCain-Feingold, which I think is the first censorship...

WALLACE: Campaign finance reform.

GINGRICH: ... which I think is the first censorship bill since the Alien and Sedition Acts in the 1790s and I think is a profoundly bad bill and is part of why these last elections were so unendingly negative.

So there are serious principle discussions, but Senator McCain is a relatively solid conservative. He's a very honest, hard-working man. He has a very patriotic record, both in the military and in the Congress. I served with him in the House.

And you'd have to say, you know, either he or Giuliani is the frontrunner right now. And then McCain, in organizational terms, is the frontrunner. So he's a serious man.

I do think on the movement right, in the areas that produced Ronald Reagan and produced Barry Goldwater, there's a yearning for a clearer voice of conservatism. And I think that Mitt Romney has an opportunity to fill that.

WALLACE: You say Mitt Romney. McCain started an exploratory committee this week. Thirty seconds: Are you going to do the same?

GINGRICH: No. We have a program called American Solutions we're working on. And in September of next year, I'll be glad to come back and talk with you about running for president, but not until...

WALLACE: Not until that late?

GINGRICH: Not until September.

WALLACE: Why so late?

GINGRICH: I think it's important for us to focus on solving very big, very real problems. We have lots of time for personal ambition. And I think an awful lot of this early energy is wasted, and we ought to be focusing on, you know, how are you going to compete with China and India, how are you going to solve the problem in Iraq? I mean, real issues that need real solutions.

WALLACE: Mr. Speaker, thank you. Thanks for joining us today. Appreciate it.

GINGRICH: You bet.

WALLACE: Coming up, we'll talk with our Sunday regulars about the choice of leaders for the new Congress. Nancy Pelosi suffers an early setback. And Republicans go for continuity over change. Stay tuned.

NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), SPEAKER-ELECT: As we say in church, let there be peace on Earth, and let it begin with us. Let the healing begin.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was speaker of the House-to-be Nancy Pelosi, trying to put the best face on a stinging defeat as Democrats rejected her choice for majority leader.

And it's time now for our Sunday gang. Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of Fox News, and Fox News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard and Juan Williams also from National Public Radio.

So, Nancy Pelosi tried to get rid of her number two, Steny Hoyer, because of longtime personal and professional differences, political differences. But her choice, anti-war advocate John Murtha, in the immortal words of George W. Bush, got a thumpin'.

Brit, what does this tell us about Pelosi and what does it tell us about her strength in the new Congress?

HUME: Well, it's a little early to tell from this, but it looks on the surface like kind of an unforced error. At first it was thought that she had sort of such a relationship with Jack Murtha that she was going to personally back him, but that would be all there was to it. It would just be an expression of a view and that she would recognize that Hoyer was going to win and she wasn't going to go all out.

Well, it's not true that she went all out, but an awful lot of work was done in her direction to try to swing this for Murtha, and it failed utterly. He was beaten, what, 149-86 or something like that, was Murtha. That's a major defeat.

The other thing about it is that she has expressed a view on the war which is identical to Murtha's. And basically, she wants to get out and she doesn't seem to care particularly about what the consequences are in Iraq and the aftermath. I'm not sure that's a position that a lot of Americans would support, but I think that's where she is. And if that's the case, of course, we're likely to see more such actions on her part that will put her perhaps even at odds with her own majority.

LIASSON: Yes, look, I think the decision that Nancy Pelosi made left a lot of people scratching their heads and kind of baffled. And I think the outcome is also unclear. Now, if she knew all along that Murtha wasn't going to win, but did it to show loyalty to someone who had been loyal to her? And to also send a signal to the liberal base of the party that they were hurt in this election, but that now she and Steny Hoyer will work just as well as they've worked together, regardless of personal feelings about each other, as they've worked together for the last number of years?

Or does it signal something that the Republicans were saying. Look, 149 of her caucus is willing to buck her and we're going to try to peel them off on other issues. I don't know if that can actually happen, but I do think that the big next test for her -- and it's almost more important than the majority leader race -- is who she's going to put in as the intelligence committee chairman. Whether she's going to put -- she seems to have all but decided Jane Harman will not get it again, but I think that's a very big test for her.

WALLACE: And the reason that's a big test, Bill, is because if she takes Alcee Hastings, who would the senior person, I guess, if Jane Harman isn't, this is a fellow who was removed as a federal judge on corruption charges. He was acquitted of them in a criminal court, but the U.S. Senate saw fit in its wisdom to remove him from office. The idea of making him house intelligence chair is questionable, no?

KRISTOL: I think -- and the U.S. House voted to impeach him when the Senate convicted him. I think Nancy Pelosi...

(CROSSTALK)

KRISTOL: So there's redemption in American politics. I mean, it will be a good talking point for Republicans and I think it will not be an effective committee for the next two years. I don't suppose it will make a fundamental difference.

You know, what's striking about Pelosi's endorsement of Murtha is she believes that the duty of the Democratic Congress is to get us out of Iraq. I think that's an honest belief of hers, and of Jack Murtha's. I don't think that's political. And everyone -- the conventional wisdom in Washington right now is but of course they'll never cut off funds. That would be politically suicidal, and that's not going to happen.

I don't believe that. Four months from now, if things continue to slide downhill, if the president hasn't adjusted course, if hawks like Senator McCain haven't been satisfied that there's been an increase in troops or that we have a real strategy for victory, I think Nancy Pelosi and the Democratic House will move at some point to enforce timetables and to enforce a funds cutoff.

And frankly, if things don't get better four or six months from now -- that was the window that Abizaid gave, remember, in his testimony? He said he had -- we think we have four to six months to prevent it from really sliding over to the edge to really just sectarian civil war. And if things aren't better four or six months from now, I think we could be looking at a Democratic House and some Republicans who are willing to just pull the plug on Iraq.

WILLIAMS: I don't know about pull the plug, but I think you're looking at an American nation that is totally discontent with the way things have been going in Iraq, and I think that's why she felt comfortable in making clear her support for Murtha as the hero, the anti-war hero, the guy who would, you know, put his credentials as a Vietnam veteran...

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: ... that that was completely rejected.

WILLIAMS: It wasn't completely rejected.

WALLACE: It was rejected by the majority of the House...

WILLIAMS: No.

WALLACE: ... of the Democratic caucus.

WILLIAMS: No, there was a decision made, Chris, a decision made that the leadership team that had Pelosi and Hoyer is a better team and that Hoyer is clearly a better inside player in terms of...

HUME: That wasn't what Pelosi wanted, though, was it?

WILLIAMS: No, but I'm telling you, I think Pelosi may have been wise. I think the media may have misplayed this, Brit. I think, in fact, it may be that she is sending a statement to the -- to her base that the Democrats understand the war was a defining issue of the midterm elections, that this Democratic party's not going to run away from the war, not going to try to play moderate and somehow play ball with the White House in a way that will allow the war just to continue ad infinitum.

And that what you've got here is Steny Hoyer, who is much more moderate, much more of the blue dog type Democrat. He gets in. But now what's he going to have to do? He's going to have to kiss up to Pelosi. She's not going to kiss down to him.

WALLACE: All right, before we end this discussion, I want to turn to the Republicans if we can. Because they also made an interesting choice. There were two young conservative -- and there you see them up on the screen, House members Mike Pence and John Shadegg -- who wanted to jump the line and take over the leadership. In fact, Republicans decided to stand, as we mentioned, with Newt Gingrich, with the current team of John Boehner and Roy Blunt. Brit, what do you make of that?

HUME: Well, Boehner is an old face going back, as you heard Newt Gingrich describe, to that era. But he's associated with the reform element in the Republican caucus in the House. He's just really taken over as majority leader. So -- or was majority leader. He'll be minority leader, of course, in the next House. So it's not as if he was necessarily someone who could be identified as part of the problem.

Roy Blunt, of course, goes back to the DeLay era and is a technician and a vote counter and a good one from all accounts. It's very like the Republicans not to throw over their next in line people. They don't -- they tend not to do that. Democrats are more inclined to do that. And in this case, Republicans decided not to. And I suppose it's -- in Boehner's defense, you could say he hasn't been around very long. The guy deserves a chance.

LIASSON: Yes, I think that the Republicans decided that you need real tactical skills to be in the minority. The same thing happened in the Senate when they returned Trent Lott to a position in the leadership that was...

WALLACE: Talk about political resurrection, huh?

LIASSON: Talk about redemption. That was really something. But Trent Lott is very able. And I think that the Republicans on the Hill decided that they want people who know how to use the rules, in the case of the Senate, the rules of the Senate, who know how to use whatever small clout the minority party has in the House, to their advantage and to set themselves up for 2008 rather than making some kind of a symbolic gesture or showing a fresh face. Because, let's face it, the minority is some of the less visible faces on Capitol Hill.

KRISTOL: I'm afraid Republicans in Washington are in a state of denial. This was the worst Republican election since 1974. The worst showing across the board for the Republican party since 1974, since the beginning of the Republican realignment. To send the same leadership team back, for the White House to say so far no big changes except throwing Rumsfeld out the day after, I'm worried that they think this is just a tactical defeat, a short-term problem. And I think they need to be more radical in thinking about changes in personnel and changes of policy.

WILLIAMS: I wonder if it's not a -- it's bad news for the White House, I tell you that. I think that not only to have the established leadership in the House reaffirmed, as opposed to going towards new, more conservative people, but then also to see that Trent Lott comes back. Trent Lott has a grudge, I mean like a personal grudge, not only against Bill Frist, but against President Bush, given the way he was treated before.

WALLACE: Oh, it's going to be interesting.

All right, we have to take a break here. But when we return, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East delivers a message that not every senator wants to hear. That's next.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Hope is not a strategy. GEN. JOHN ABIZAID, U.S. CENTRAL COMMAND: With regard to hope not being a method, Senator, I agree with you. And I would also say that despair is not a method. And when I come to Washington, I feel despair.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Senator Hillary Clinton and General John Abizaid sparring this week about the way forward in Iraq. And we're back now with Brit, Mara, Bill and Juan.

Well, General Abizaid, it was very interesting, took fire from both the right and the left when he appeared before the Senate Armed Services Committee. He rejected calls from Democrats to start pulling troops out, but he also rejected calls, especially from Senator John McCain, to send in more troops.

Brit, how long can he continue to sell the steady as she goes idea?

HUME: Well, it's not going to hold up much longer if the situation doesn't improve. And if it deteriorates further, there will be a cry to do something different, anything different, because, you know, continuing to do the same thing over and over again and expecting the same result is said to be a definition of insanity.

However, it's very interesting to listen to Abizaid on this. Rumsfeld is not gone yet, but he's on his way. If Abizaid had a different view of how this war ought to be fought, one would think we might have gotten an inkling of it.

The truth of the matter is that the way that is being waged in Iraq, it's Abizaid and Casey's war. This is the way they think it ought to be done, and they're worried about two things at all times when it comes to troop levels. They're worried about whether the force is big enough to do the American end of the job. And they're also worried about it being so big that it furthers the sense of occupation and heightens the problems that grow from that, as well as making it easier for the Iraqis to do less.

The policy is the Iraqification of the war. That is what is being sought here, and that's why the steady as you go approach may work if indeed the Iraqis can step up. That's the big question. The Iraqi military and police.

LIASSON: Look, I think that that whole notion that if only we would draw down a little bit and really make the Iraqis understand that we're not going to be around there forever, all of a sudden they'd suddenly be up to the task and do all the things they wanted them to do, make some kind of national reconciliation political deal, get rid of the sectarian militias that have completely insinuated themselves into the security forces, everything would be fine.

What if that's just not the case? In other words, what if they have no willingness or ability to do those things? And I think that's potentially what we're facing. But the other question that was raised this week is, if the number of troops now are clearly not succeeding, the two choices are either, as many Democrats have concluded, cut your losses and get out, it will never work, or as John McCain is suggesting, put in more troops. The generals are all saying there are no more troops to be put in.

WALLACE: Yes, let's talk about that, Bill, because you have been nothing if not consistent for a long period of time in saying send in more troops. General Abizaid was asked about that repeatedly by John McCain and Lindsey Graham. He said two things. One, if we sends in more troops, it sends the wrong signal to the Maliki government that they don't have to get Iraq together. And the other thing he said is, we could send in 20,000 more troops for a brief time, but as it's currently configured, the military can't sustain that.

KRISTOL: Well, on the first point, this has been Abizaid and Casey and Rumsfeld's consistent theory, that Iraqification comes ahead of victory, is the way I would put it. Or the only way to win, to be fair to put it, is Iraqification. I think that's been now -- that's false. We're failing at Iraqification because there's no confidence that we'll be there to help the Iraqis who are with us. So I think that theory was not crazy. It's been discredited. It's time for more troops.

Are there more troops? There are. It would be a strain on the army. You could do 20,000 in the short-term. You could do up to 50,000 over six to eight months. It would require a lot of strain and a lot of extending deployments and taking people out of Okinawa and other places and bringing them into Iraq and stressing our commitments elsewhere. And we need to rebuild the military at the same time.

But, look, Abizaid's job -- he's not chief of staff of the army. He is a combatant commander. He is commander of CentCom. Casey is the field commander. Their responsibility is to win the war. And in my view, they have talked themselves into this notion that their responsibility is to Iraqify the war instead of to win the war.

We can afford to win this war. If we choose not to -- and I think Abizaid said something very important when he said I come back to Washington and I feel despair. That's a big problem. I think Bush has two or three months. If by the state of the union -- I agree with Brit on this -- if by the state of the union, things aren't getting better on the ground or there's not a really plausible change of tactics here at home, I am very worried that political support will crumble; not among Democrats, but among Republicans.

WILLIAMS: But I think political support is gone. I think that's why increasing the size of the force is really not an option politically. I don't think there's support for it. And I think that, on the contrary, there's concern about the sense of the U.S. being an occupying force. And that's why the Baker commission I don't think is even looking at that as an option. What they're talking about is stability, maybe containing Iraq so that you don't have the insurgents there festering and growing in number.

And maybe you also have a possibility of redeploying on a more gradual rate and pulling in people like the European allies, Syria, Iran. Maybe even extending it in terms of bringing back negotiations over the Arabs and the Israelis and saying, you know what, this is a regional issue.

KRISTOL: Oh, my God.

WILLIAMS: I don't think, though, that there's any realistic and -- you know, you and Brit agree on this. The Iraqification hasn't worked, isn't working.

HUME: Well, here's the problem of arguing against Iraqification as a strategy. At some point, in order for this whole enterprise to be a success, the Iraqis have to take charge. We're not going to appoint a viceroy and have a permanent occupation of the country and have it defended and policed by the American military in perpetuity. At some point, the Iraqis have to step up and take over.

The sense, obviously, is that if you don't make them do it now and it's really urgent, it's not going to be easier to make them do it later, and an insurgency can revive. So that this policy of trying to help and protect where needed while building them up may be the only policy that makes sense.

(CROSSTALK)

WILLIAMS: ... a democracy.

HUME: Juan...

WILLIAMS: Remember, we went in there, we were going to promote democracy.

HUME: I'm making the point that -- no, exactly the opposite point.

WILLIAMS: What's the point?

HUME: Listen to me. Which is that a democratic Iraq has to be able to defend itself. It cannot be a successful, people-driven democracy while it's depending on an external force to protect it. And this is what -- this is what the whole idea is, is to get Iraq into a position where it can police itself, defend itself and have confidence in its own...

WILLIAMS: I think our interests as Americans is to simply say, listen, you may not be able to defend yourself, but we'll defend you to the extent that we don't want terrorists using you as a training ground and we'll stop that. That's the American interest. What you want to do in terms of sectarian violence, democracy, that's up to you.

WALLACE: Well, we'll have to get Brit's response next Sunday. Thank you, panel. We'll all continue the discussion in a week.

Up next, our Power Player of the Week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK) WALLACE: The holiday season is the time for plenty of parties, but if you think you've got a lot of entertaining to do, don't complain to our Power Player of the Week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CRIS COMERFORD, WHITE HOUSE CHEF: It's logistics. It's space. It's the food itself. You know, we have to make sure we have enough supplies of whatever we need.

WALLACE (voice-over): Cris Comerford is the White House chef. Between now and Christmas, she and her staff will cook for more than 10,000 people, attending 26 receptions with the president.

(on camera): You make it sound almost like a military operation. I mean, you talk about logistics and planning and supplies.

COMERFORD: Definitely. Because we have to make sure that everything we do are done in waves.

WALLACE (voice-over): Which is why, the week before Thanksgiving, Comerford and her team had already been on the job for a month...

COMERFORD: Do we have enough room in this freezer?

WALLACE: ... preparing sauces. And on this day...

COMERFORD: They are portioning out about 2,000 pounds of beef. These are Angus tenderloin beef. This is going to be turned into a chicken fried steak for Christmas.

WALLACE: Of course, nothing is cooked until the day of each reception, when the small White House kitchen will be bustling with more than 20 people.

(on camera): How do you entertain a thousand people in this -- in a kitchen this size?

COMERFORD: It's very orderly chaos. They know their dance steps. They know where to go.

WALLACE (voice-over): This is Comerford's second Christmas as White House chef. Last December, Laura Bush introduced her to the public.

LAURA BUSH, FIRST LADY OF THE UNITED STATES: Cris Comerford. Cris is our new White House chef.

WALLACE: Of course, Comerford's main job is feeding the first family. They eat fruit and yogurt for breakfast. He'll have a grilled cheese or peanut butter sandwich for lunch. And while dinner may be steak and vegetables, they literally count the calories of every portion.

COMERFORD: In terms of the meat, I mean, two ounces of meat is really good enough for you.

WALLACE (on camera): Two ounces?

COMERFORD: Two ounces of beef.

WALLACE: Does the president ever complain and say, hey, I want a meal here?

COMERFORD: No, he does not. He's very good.

WALLACE (voice-over): Comerford grew up in the Philippines, getting a degree in food technology. But her first job in the U.S. was running a salad bar in a Chicago hotel.

COMERFORD: My first year was just really like kind of horrifying, because I'm like, I went to college, I don't want to be a salad girl.

WALLACE: After years cooking around the world, in 2005, the salad girl became the first woman to be White House chef.

COMERFORD: So when we developed our Christmas menu, we made sure...

At first, I was like, whoa. And the more I thought about it, I got so scared. But then you're like, no, God put me in here, I'm going to make sure that I'm going to do it well.

WALLACE: Since then, Comerford has cooked a state dinner for Prince Charles and almost every night for the president.

COMERFORD: It's exhausting, but it's a rewarding exhausting type of thing.

WALLACE (on camera): Do you cook when you go home?

COMERFORD: I cook once in a while, but my husband does the most cooking. He's also a chef.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: Cris Comerford told us she spent three months planning that state dinner for Prince Charles, even serving the first family various menus until they agreed on buffalo with mushrooms.

And that's it for today. Have a great week and a happy Thanksgiving. And we'll see you next FOX NEWS SUNDAY.

CBS – FACE THE NATION

SCHIEFFER: Today on Face the Nation, guns and butter. Your taxes and America at war. Republicans repeated it like a mantra during the campaign this fall: Democrats will raise your taxes if they control Congress. Well now they do. So is it true? We'll ask the new chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, Charles Rangel, Democrat of New York.

And this week, the head of American forces in Iraq said the United States should not withdraw or send more troops there. We'll talk about that with one of the senators who questioned General John Abizaid on the hill, Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina.

Then I'll have a final word on O.J. Simpson and the land of opportunity. But first, raising taxes or not on Face the Nation.

Good morning again. And joining us from New York, the incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Charlie Rangel. Mr. Rangel, of course, will now have the title of the powerful chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee because that's what the chairman of this committee is always called. And that is because the House Ways and Means Committee is where all tax bills originate.

Thank you for coming this morning, Congressman. Let me just start off by playing a tape for you of what Republicans were saying throughout this campaign. What you're going to hear is Bill Frist, the outgoing majority leader in the Senate, and the head of the Republican Party, Ken Mehlman. Just listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR BILL FRIST, R-TENNESSEE: Charlie Rangel said it upfront that there's not a Bush tax cut that he won't try to get rid of.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KEN MEHLMAN, REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN: Mr. Rangel, who would be responsible for writing tax policy, were Democrats to take control of Congress, he stated in his last week in session that there would be across-the-board tax increases affecting millions of Americans.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

SCHIEFFER: So, what's your version, Mr. Chairman?

RANGEL: I assume that was just campaign rhetoric, and I think Democrats probably said enough themselves. The truth of the matter is that raising taxes that have already been put into effect is poor tax policy and bad politics. As a matter of fact, one of the things that Republicans failed to respond to is, when are we going to tackle the alternative minimum tax which is a tax that we had placed on wealthy people to make certain that they paid some minimum tax?

Now we find that 23 million people have this tax on them. It costs a lot of money to remove it. But I only mention that, Bob, to indicate that that's nobody talking about an increase in taxes. There are lots of taxes that we Democrats and hopefully some of the new Republicans would like to see more targeted to the working class and to the middle class people.

But having said that, tax increases is certainly not on the agenda. The Republicans knew it. It's campaign rhetoric. But we only get two years to prove who we really are, and that's what we're concerned about.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let me just talk a little bit about this alternative minimum tax. As you well know, but let's review for our viewers, I guess it was in 1969 that they put this tax in. And the idea was to make sure that rich people who were taking a lot of deductions by giving things to charity, by getting into tax shelters were winding up not paying any income taxes. And so the alternative minimum tax was put in to make sure that everybody would pay something.

But now, because it was not indices for inflation, a lot of people who consider themselves very middle class are being caught up in this. And we're told if it is allowed to stand as it is maybe as many as 30 million Americans will come under this tax over the next couple of years. What do you want to do about the alternative minimum tax?

RANGEL: Well, it's one provision that neither Republicans nor Democrats can argue that it was put in there and intended to target these people. Because it was not indexed for inflation, a lot of middle-income people had -- was pushed into this category. The first thing I think that I have to do though, even though you can describe the office as the powerful chairman, when you've got a president with a veto, I don't know how powerful it's going to be.

But one of the major things that we have to do in the Congress is to get to know each other and agree to work with each other. Certainly we have to do that on the Ways and Means Committee. I'm meeting with the administration. I met with Secretary of Treasury Paulson. And I'm hoping that we can create some atmosphere of legislating before we go to big-ticket items like the AMT or Social Security or tax reform or even Medicare.

And so, initially, I hope that we can find some low- hanging fruit to show that Republicans and Democrats, at least on the Ways and Means Committee, trust each other, are anxious to work with each other.

We haven't done it in the last decade.

But once we agree that this is something that is not a reform, because it never should have happened in the first place, I would think that this would be a piece of legislation that the whole nation will look forward to in saying, hey, they can work together; this is something that should have been done a decade ago. And we'll be proud of our work.

SCHIEFFER: Well, could you, in fact, do anything meaningful about the alternative minimum tax without the help or the cooperation of the White House?

RANGEL: Of course not. As a matter of fact, that is going to be key. We know, as Democrats, that we only have two years to prove that we deserve the vote that we got to lead.

And to do this, we're not only are going to have to work with the Republicans but we may have to work with a lot of new Democrats that were elected in so-called Republican districts.

On top of this, I'm assuming that the president and the vice president will put an end to the rhetoric that Democrats just want to raise your taxes and they just want to raise spending.

Because if they go into this rigid policy and not change the course on domestic policy, such as Social Security and tax reform, then it means that the president has selected becoming a lame duck. And I don't think the Congress or the country would want that.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let's talk about this because it brings me to the second question. And that is the deficit.

If you eliminated the alternative minimum tax, I'm told that that might, what, cost the government as much as a trillion dollars over ten years.

RANGEL: Exactly.

SCHIEFFER: How do you pay for that, Mr. Chairman? RANGEL: With great difficulty, Mr. Schieffer. The truth of the matter is one of the things, if we can find the political courage to handle it, is that the IRS, Internal Revenue Service said that there's $350 billion in a tax cut where people have not paid their proper share of taxes.

If we went back to the pre-campaign rhetoric, they would say collecting this money means that you're raising taxes. But I think any responsible legislator would know that this is money due and owing the government.

The other big ticket item, if we can find the bipartisanship even to talk about it, is simplifying the tax code. True, it would be difficult to think about a flat tax, but there are trillions of dollars of waste in that code.

It's complicated. It violates the rules of a voluntary system. And many of those provisions were put in because one member of Congress or one member of the Senate needed that provision in order to vote for some other unrelated piece of legislation.

If we were able to simplify that tax code, I submit that there's trillions of dollars to be found and saved in that bill.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Let me ask you about a couple of other things that people have talked about. And that is some sort of deduction better than what you have now for college tuition.

Would you in fact favor 100 percent deduction for college tuition, up to $3,000 a year?

That's one figure that's being kicked about.

And how would you pay for that?

RANGEL: First of all, as soon as we organize -- as you know, we don't organize until January. I don't know what new members are going to be on the committee. I have to get them together, see what their priorities are. It's not going to be a question of just Rangel deciding what he wants. I have to work with the Republicans.

And just as I told the secretary of treasury that I would like to find out what things is it that the administration would like to get done so that, collectively, we could work. The problem, now, in talking about credits and deductions -- and certainly I would want to support anything that would encourage our young people to be able to get training, to be able to get a better education.

And the same thing would go for health care because I think an educated and a healthier work force is important for our national security.

But the problem is that, if you're talking about credits and you're talking about tax reform, it's inconsistent. So you can't put more stuff into the code while you're trying to squeeze it and make the code more effective. SCHIEFFER: Let me just ask you one thing. What do you think ought to be done about cheaper drugs for senior citizens?

Some people say that the administration, the government, ought to negotiate drug prices.

Do you favor taking that approach, Mr. Rangel?

I know -- I take what you said; I take your point you don't even know who is going to be on your committee yet.

But how do you generally feel about that?

RANGEL: I don't need anyone on the committee to answer that question. There is no question that we should be able to bargain for our senior citizens with the pharmaceutical companies to get the best price and the lowest price possible. It works for the Veterans Administration. There's no reason why it shouldn't work for the United States government.

SCHIEFFER: Let me just switch to the war in Iraq. You have been one of those who have called for a draft. Were you really serious about that? Or did you think that was just a way to bring this war to a close by pointing out, you know, that we don't have a draft and that the sacrifice is not being spread across the country.

Because now, we heard General Abizaid say this week that we really can't put all that many troops more into Iraq than we have there now on a long-term basis because the Army is really not large enough. Would you favor, still seriously favor a draft in this country?

RANGEL: You bet your life. Underscore serious. There's no question in my mind that this president and this administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way.

The second thing, as you pointed out, if we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, to send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without a draft. Lastly, a draft doesn't necessarily mean that everyone drafted will have to serve in the military. I think at a time where national security is so important, having our young people commit themselves to a couple of years in service to this great republic, whether it's our seaports, our airports, in schools, in hospitals.

And at the end of that to provide some educational benefits, it's the best thing for our young people and the best thing for our country. I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session.

SCHIEFFER: You will? You will introduce that bill again?

RANGEL: You can depend on that.

SCHIEFFER: I just...

RANGEL: I don't see how anyone can support the war and not support the draft. I think to do so is hypocritical.

SCHIEFFER: Mr. Chairman I want to thank you very much for being with us this morning. We hope to have you again as we go down the road. And we'll be back in just a second with Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina.

RANGEL: Thank you, Bob.

SCHIEFFER: Thank you.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: And with us now from Kiawah Island in South Carolina, Republican Senator Lindsey Graham. Well, Senator Graham, you just heard what Congressman Rangel said. He says, and he has been saying it for a while, but he underlined that he is very serious about it. He says we need to put a draft back in. Without a draft we simply don't have enough people to do what we may call on the military services to do. What's your response to that?

GRAHAM: Well, I agree with him we don't have enough people. But I think we can get enough people through a voluntary force. The good news for America is that enlistment and retention among those who have served in Iraq and Afghanistan is sky high.

The people in the military have a sense of purpose of why they're there.

We just need to get more people to join, better benefits, better pay. I think we can do this with an all-voluntary service, all-voluntary Army, Air Force, Marine Corps and Navy. And if we can't, then we'll look for some other option.

SCHIEFFER: Well, one of the points that Congressman Rangel was making, that when the sacrifice is not spread among all segments of society, it gives people a different attitude. He says there's no way we would have gotten involved in Iraq if you'd have had a draft, because every senator and every congressman would have to be answering back to his constituents on the kind of situation, the number of casualties that we're now having.

How do you feel about that?

GRAHAM: Well, it assumes that the people that are serving now we don't care much about. I can assure you, I care very much about everybody who voluntarily joins. Senator McCain has got a son at the Naval Academy. He's got a son who's in basic training in the Marine Corps. Kit Bond has got a son who has been over there. Several members of Congress have had their family members serve.

I care very deeply about those who volunteers. So the suggestion that we are just sending people over we don't care about I reject.

We can win this war with an all-voluntary service, but we've got to increase dramatically the Army and Marine Corps, because we don't have enough people to defend America right now.

SCHIEFFER: Well, I take part of your point, but it seems to me what Congressman Rangel was saying, that the sacrifice is not spread across the whole spectrum of American life. He didn't suggest that people don't care about the people who are there now in the all- volunteer Army, Senator.

GRAHAM: Well, the voluntary service represents the country pretty well in terms of ethnic make-up, economic background. I just think the all-volunteer service, if properly paid, properly benefited, can win this war. They're reenlisting in droves. They're committed to what they're doing.

Abizaid told the Congress, the Senate, that if we wanted 20,000 more troops to go to Iraq, Bob, the Army couldn't sustain that, because the Army is too small and too worn out. So we've got to -- one thing I agree with Charlie Rangel about, we need a bigger Army and Marine Corps. And I'm willing to try the voluntary route. I think that it will meet our needs. But if it fails to meet our needs, then we'll do what we have to, to win this war and defend this nation.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let's just listen to what General Abizaid said when he was before the Armed Serves Committee, of which you are a member.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEN. JOHN ABIZAID, CENTCOM COMMANDER: We can put in 20,000 more Americans tomorrow and achieve a temporary effect. But when you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now with the size of the Army and the Marine Corps.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

SCHIEFFER: And when you hear that, Senator Graham, I mean, whether you're for a draft or not, that is rather chilling, it seems to me.

GRAHAM: It's the most chilling testimony I've heard since the war began. It should be a wake-up call to the Congress. It would be political malpractice for the Congress to allow that situation to sustain itself.

It is obvious to me we don't have enough troops in Iraq to provide the security necessary to create a democracy from the ashes of a dictatorship. There's not enough troops in the beginning, according to General Shinseki. He had 200,000. Abizaid said at the hearing Shinseki was right.

Well, what's happened from then to now to justify less troops? I disagree with the idea of keeping the troop levels where they're at now. I think we need an overwhelming presence in Iraq for the short term. You cannot have a democracy where people are getting killed and kidnapped and murdered at the level they are now. So we need more Iraqi troops; we need more American troops. We need to increase the Army and Marine Corps by at least 50,000. That's going to cost money. That's going to cost sacrifice. But we need to push to have it done now, because we're going to lose this war if we don't adjust quickly.

SCHIEFFER: So you're saying send more troops, more American troops to Iraq, along with Iraqi troops, but I think what our viewers...

GRAHAM: Yes.

SCHIEFFER: ... want to know -- you want to increase the troop levels. By how much, Senator?

GRAHAM: Enough to win the war. The Powell doctrine is that you go to war with an overwhelming force. The Anbar province -- there are four provinces that are out of control. The big battle's in Baghdad. The Marine general in Anbar province, where the Sunni insurgents are thriving right now, says he has enough troops to train the Iraqi army but not to defeat the insurgency. We've been playing whack-a-mole, as John McCain says it, where you clear one area but you can't hold it because you go to the next area to suppress a surge in violence.

We need a larger troop presence in Iraq to bring about security.

The police force in Iraq needs to be rebuilt, Bob. It is just a mess over there. You don't have a functioning police force. They're not loyal to the people at large. They're loyal to sectarian groups. So we need to have a security presence over there with more American troops in the short term, so the Iraqi people can solve their problems through the political process, not through violence.

The hearts of the Iraqi people are hardening against each other. It's hard for a politic ian to go to Baghdad and do a deal with somebody on the opposite side when 50 of your constituents were shot in the head the day before.

SCHIEFFER: Do you believe, Senator Graham, that things are worse, right now, in Iraq, than, say, they were six months ago?

GRAHAM: Absolutely, they're worse. I've been there four times. The first time I went there, I walked around town and bought rugs. The fourth time I went, about a year ago, I had to be in a tank.

The political progress in Iraq is real. But it's being eroded because of the level of violence.

The insurgency is a lot more robust now than it was before. And it goes back to letting the country get out of control. The Iraqi politicians have to disarm the militia.

You can't have a democracy where you've got political parties with armies and sectarian or religious groups with their own armies stronger than the police or the national army.

So we've got a lot to do. And we don't have enough troops to get it done with. But if we put a presence in there -- a robust military presence, I think, can bring about security, push the Iraqi politicians to disarm the militia.

They're dying for their own freedom in droves in Iraq, Bob. I think they can still do this if they get a little breathing room from the balance.

SCHIEFFER: Let me just ask you. Here's, kind of, the story of the morning. On the A.P. -- I'm just going to read it you -- dateline, London: Military victory is no longer possible in Iraq, former secretary of state Henry Kissinger said in a television interview broadcast on Sunday.

Kissinger is quoted as saying, If you mean, by military victory, an Iraqi government that can be established and whose rift runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control, then the political process of democracy will emerge, I don't believe that is possible.

GRAHAM: Well, I disagree.

SCHIEFFER: Do you have a comment?

GRAHAM: Yes, I disagree with the secretary. He's a very bright man. He's done a lot more in the world than I have. But I do believe this. The people who are fighting and dying for their freedom in Iraq want it enough to fight and die. If you want to be a judge in Iraq, not only do they come after you. They try to come after your family.

So the Iraqi people are sacrificing. But we do not have control. We do not have security in Iraq. The only way you'll ever get a political solution to the differences that exist among the Iraqi people is to control the violence.

I am willing to send more American troops to make that happen. I believe in the Iraqi people. But they can't get it done at this level of violence.

SCHIEFFER: All right. And that's where we have to end it.

Thank you so much, Senator.

GRAHAM: Thank you.

SCHIEFFER: Back with a final word in just a moment.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: And finally today, I thought the congressional page scandal would surely win the most disgusting story of the year award.

But who knew that O.J. Simpson would write a how-to manual describing the way he would have killed his wife, had he chosen to commit the crime, or so he says. Or that he would get two prime- time hours on Fox Television to promote his book.

In our country, the law says a citizen who is found not guilty can't be tried again for the same crime. So along came a publisher named Judith Regan, who found a way to funnel millions of dollars to O.J. to write this trash. And get this. She says one reason she did it was because she was once an abused wife.

I'm just guessing here, but I'll bet another reason, maybe she gets a cut of the profits. She will personally conduct the two one-hour interviews that will air later this month on Fox Television, which, like Ms. Regan's company, is owned by Rupert Murdoch.

I've never been one to criticize competitors. It always sounds cheesy to me. But may I congratulate the Fox affiliate station owners and managers who have not decided -- or who have decided not to broadcast this dreadful thing being sent out by their network.

Someone -- I think it was William F. Buckley -- once said, something doesn't have to be against the law to be wrong. This one is more than wrong. It is just awful.

That's it for us. We'll see you next week, right here on Face the Nation.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: It's 11 a.m. in Washington, 8 a.m. in Los Angeles, 7 p.m. in Baghdad, and 11 p.m. in Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "Late Edition." We'll speak with senators Carl Levin and Kay Bailey Hutchison in just a moment. First, though, here's Fredricka Whitfield with a quick check of what's in the news right now. Hi, Fred.

(NEWS BREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred. President bush is calling for patience when it comes to the war in Iraq. But Democrats soon to be in control of the House and Senate are promising to push him hard for a plan to begin withdrawing or redeploying troops in a matter of months.

Among those leading the call for a phased withdrawal, the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Carl Levin of Michigan. He's joining us from Detroit. Also joining us from Dallas is Republican Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas. Senators, welcome back to "Late Edition."

And Senator Levin, I'll start with you. You're suggesting, and several of your Democratic colleagues, that the United States should start pulling troops out of Iraq within the next four to six months. The U.S. military commander for the Middle East, General John Abizaid, was before your committee this week and said that's not necessarily a good idea. Listen to what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GENERAL JOHN ABIZAID, COMMANDER, U.S. CENTRAL COMMAND: At this stage in the campaign, we'll need flexibility to manage our force and to help manage the Iraqi force. Force caps and specific timetables limit that flexibility.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Senator Levin, why is he wrong and you're right?

SEN. CARL LEVIN (D), MICHIGAN: Well, he doesn't say that we're wrong, as a matter of fact. He talks about force caps and specific timetables. But we don't have a specific timetable for departure of all or even most of our troops. What we are saying is that to force the Iraqis to come to reality to take really what is going on in Iraq into consideration and to reach a political settlement, which is the only way to solve the problem in Iraq.

We must tell the Iraqis that we would begin, starting in four to six months, a phased reduction of our troops. Because if you don't do that, they're going to continue to have the false assumption that we are there in some kind of an open-ended way. And it is that assumption on their part which takes them off the hook.

We've got to put pressure on them. I hope the Baker commission puts pressure on them. And listen to one other thing that General Abizaid said in front of us. It is a short quote, but it has not been widely circulated, and it should be. He said, in opposition to more troops going into Iraq, he said that "I believe that more American forces prevent the Iraqis from doing more, from taking more responsibility for their own future."

That is the logic behind our proposal that they be told that starting in four to six months, we begin a phased redeployment with a limited presence beyond that.

BLITZER: I'm going to get to that other side of the equation, bringing in more troops, which Senator John McCain, among others, Senator Lindsey Graham supports. But when you say four to six months, your critics are saying you are coming up with a specific timetable to begin phasing out the U.S. deployment. And they're saying this is an artificial timetable that's going to be counterproductive.

LEVIN: Well, the reason that it's essential we do that is to give the Iraqis the message that the open-ended commitment is over. It's not a precipitous plan. It gives the Iraqis an opportunity during the next four is six months to reach a political settlement.

It also is essential that if we're going to have an international conference, which I think many people want, including us, that was part of our Democratic proposal to include the regional countries, that that Democratic conference be given an opportunity to put some kind of political pieces together to help the Iraqis reach a political settlement to support the sovereignty of Iraq.

Four to six months gives them an opportunity to do that if there is an international conference. And one other thing, General Abizaid said that if in the next four to six months, the violence is not put -- if there's not an end put to the violence and if the militias are not put under control, then it is going to be irretrievable. So he himself used a four- to six-months timeframe.

BLITZER: Let me just bring in Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison in a second. But before I do, one quick follow-up, Senator Levin. If you start the withdrawal in four to six months, how long does it take to complete the withdrawal?

LEVIN: We don't have a complete withdrawal in any event. We have a limited presence at the end of whatever the withdrawal amount is because you're going to need people there for force protection. You're going to need people there to support the logistics of an Iraqi army. You may need people to stay on for training. You need a counter-terrorist small unit. So there's going to be some limited presence. But you don't want to be specific on that. You don't want to get lost in the minutiae here. You want to make the point to the Iraqis that, folks, you've got to take responsibility for your own country. We cannot do it for you. We've given you an opportunity.

BLITZER: Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, is there anything you just heard from Senator Levin with which you disagree?

SEN. KAY BAILEY HUTCHISON (R), TEXAS: Well, yes. I think he is making some good points, and everyone wants to push the Iraqis into finding a solution that is right for them. But I think the setting of the deadline is the problem. General Abizaid said that setting a deadline is not the right approach, and many other experts, including many Democratic senators, have said that is not the right approach, that it would encourage more insurgency. It would even put our troops in harm's way if we set a deadline.

BLITZER: Excuse me for interrupting, Senator. But he's saying start the withdrawal. Don't set a deadline for the completion of withdrawal but just start phasing out the troops in four to six months. Is that a deadline?

HUTCHISON: Yes, it is. It is saying that we are going to start bringing our troops out at a certain time, which tells the insurgents that we're on our way out. So you just have at it, and you go forward because America is going to leave, no matter what the circumstances are.

I think you have to put the solution first. You have to put the plan first before you start talking about our withdrawing troops. Even General Abizaid said, where we need our troops is in training the security forces, and it may even take more to do that.

But I think you have to put the cart before the horse. You've got to say, here is the solution that the Iraqis have agreed to. I, too, have called for a regionwide conference. I think we should bring other countries in that region into this mix because it's not good for any of them to have an eruption or a terrorist haven in Iraq.

BLITZER: Senator Hutchison, I know Senator's Levin, his argument, though, is -- and I'll repeat it, and then I'll let him respond -- his argument is that unless you put that kind of pressure on the government in Baghdad of Nouri al Maliki, they're not going to step up to the plate.

That's why he says, go ahead and start this withdrawal in four to six months. What do you say?

HUTCHISON: I think that's the wrong pressure point. I think putting pressure on them is to bring the other countries in, have a solution, put the pressure from other countries in the region on them to come up with a solution. Then you talk about the aftermath.

BLITZER: Senator Levin, you want to respond?

LEVIN: Sure. Unless you put pressure on those other countries as well, by their finally recognizing that the stability of Iraq is in their interest and we do not have an open-ended commitment anymore.

We've got to end that open-ended commitment and we've got to let those other countries know, at that international conference, that it's up to them to take on some responsibility here, too.

So the pressure of ending this open-ended commitment of American troops, which is what is currently the program of this administration: we're there as long as they need us; we're there as long as they want us -- that is what's got to end.

And it's the other countries in the region and the world that have got to be told that, as well as the Iraqi government.

BLITZER: On the other side, Senator Hutchison, as senator John McCain, Senator Lindsey Graham, both Republicans, who make it clear the United States has to deploy more, thousands of additional troops to Iraq; Senator McCain saying on Thursday -- well, let's play it.

Here it is, right now: "Without additional combat forces, we will not win this war."

Do you agree with Senators McCain and Graham, Senator Hutchison?

HUTCHISON: Yes. They asked General Abizaid that question. And General Abizaid said, we probably need more troops for training of the Iraqi security forces.

I have been one, in the past, who has said that I thought the troop protection issue would call for more troops, but I think, if we have a solution and the solution is agreed to by all the parties and we can go forward, then I think we have to let the generals decide where should the troops be and what is the number. I think the point is that we do need to put pressure on the countries surrounding this region. I have been saying that for a year. They have pretty much sat back. Some of them are friendly. Some of them are helpful with advice.

But I think it is time for the others in the region to start taking some responsibility for Iraq. I think we can have a good solution there, but it is in no one's interest, no one's interest, to have upheaval.

BLITZER: We're going to take a break. But I want Senator Levin to respond, first to Senators McCain and Graham, who say send in thousands of additional troops.

LEVIN: No. That gets us in deeper into Iraqi. That sends exactly the wrong message to the Iraqis, that somehow or other, there's a military solution.

Our military leaders say there is no military solution in Iraq. There's only a political solution in Iraq. We've got to force the Iraqis to reach that political solution. And as long as they think that we're there as long as they want us, it takes them off the hook in reaching it. So, no, not more troops; fewer troops, beginning in four to six months, to get an international conference, a time to reach some conclusions, to give the Iraqis an opportunity for four more months or six more months, to reach a political settlement.

But for heaven's sake, don't get deeper into Iraq. Start getting us out of Iraq.

BLITZER: We're going to continue this. Senators, stand by. I'm going to ask both of them if that international conference should include Syria and Iran.

Also, they'll weigh in on whether President Bush will be in for a rocky relationship with Capitol Hill once the Democrats assume control.

Then, the hunt for hostages in Iraq. We'll talk about that with the Iraqi ambassador to the United States, Samir Sumaidaie: the killings, the kidnappings plaguing his country.

Also this: Is the United States preparing for a military strike against Iran?

The New Yorker Magazine's Seymour Hersh, standing by live to talk about his brand-new article and what he's learned.

And Coming up at 1:00 p.m. Eastern, for our North American viewers, right after "Late Edition," please be sure to catch "This Week at War" with John Roberts. We'll be right back.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Some in our country may believe, in good faith, that retreating from Iraq would make America safer. Recent experience teaches the opposite lesson.

To get out before the job is done would convince the terrorists, once again, that free nations will change our policies, forsake our friends and abandon our interests whenever we are confronted with violence and blackmail.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Vice President Dick Cheney, speaking here in Washington on Friday.

Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington.

We're talking with the incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Carl Levin in Michigan, and Republican Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas.

Senator Hutchison, should this international conference on Iraq that you and Senator Levin support include Iran and Syria?

HUTCHISON: I think that depends on Iran and Syria. I think that, of course, Iran would have to agree to immediately stop making a nuclear weapon because that is a destabilizing force in the region.

And certainly, Syria would have to agree to stop aiding and abetting the insurgents and the terrorists that have showed up around the Middle East.

So I think it depends on their behavior. If they would be a positive force, I think, of course. But it does take prerequisites.

And Wolf, I want to also say, on Senator Levin's point, you can't set the deadline first. You have to have the plan first. The worst signal would be for troops to leave when you don't have the security forces trained and ready to take over for the troops that are there. That's the point that just has to be made.

BLITZER: All right, Senator Levin, I want to play for you an excerpt of what General Michael Hayden, the CIA director, told the Armed Services Committee this week on Iran. And then we'll pick up the conversation.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEN. MICHAEL HAYDEN, CIA DIRECTOR: The Iranian hand appears to be powerful. And I would offer the view it appears to be growing. And Iranian ambitions in Iraq seem to be expanding.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Question: Do you think Iran and Syria should be part of this international conference that you want to see convene to deal with Iraq?

LEVIN: Yes, I think so. And not only do I think so; 40 senators thought so when we voted for that about six, seven months ago, that there should be an international conference.

I'll predict the Baker-Hamilton commission will propose an international conference. It has to include those countries, whether we like them or not. And we don't.

We're not going to be able to get the preconditions agreed to before the conference. I'd love to get those same preconditions that Senator Hutchison suggested agreed to before the conferences, but that's what these conferences are all about.

I think they want stability, probably, in Iraq. But the only way you're going to force action relative to Iraq is if those countries understand that we're not there for an unlimited purpose.

We've got to put the same kind of pressure on those countries, the international community, as we do on the Iraqi government, that our responsibility there is not open-ended. One other quick thing, though. When Senator Hutchison talks about you have to have a plan before you talk about troop reductions. They haven't been implemented. Remember the plan that as the Iraqis stand up, we'll stand down? Remember that plan of two years ago?

We have not stood down as they have stood up. And the reason is that the Iraqis have not reached that political settlement. So the plans have been there. They've been violated. They haven't been complied with. The Iraqis had a plan a year ago that they were going to have a constitutional convention to consider changes in the constitution. That was supposed to have taken place six months ago. It never has taken place. We've got to act now in our own interest. We've got to force some decisions on the part of the Iraqis and on the part of the international community.

BLITZER: Senator Hutchison, do you wish that the president would have asked Donald Rumsfeld to resign before the election as opposed to the day after election? You might still be in the majority, some believe, if he had done so.

HUTCHISON: Well, I think the president didn't want to make it look political. Certainly he had been talking to Secretary Rumsfeld for a while, but he did not want it to be a disruption or look political in the arena.

But I would just go back to what Senator Levin just said, Wolf, and say the last thing that Iran and Syria are going to try to object to is our leaving. That plays right into their hands that we would tell them, hey, we're going to leave if you don't step up to the plate and start becoming a positive influence here. I would think you would have to have prerequisites to bring them in. If they did come in with the prerequisites met, then I think you would have a very good chance. But the pressure has to be put on them by their neighbors, not us.

BLITZER: Senator Levin, go ahead.

LEVIN: I would not put our planned phased reduction into their hands at all. I would notify the Iraqis and the neighbors that we're going to begin that phased reduction because I believe that is the pressure point on the Iraqis. That is the pressure point on the neighbors who do not want Iraq to disintegrate. They don't want instability in Iraq.

If they do want instability, then a conference isn't going to do any good. It's only if they do not see a disintegrated Iraq in their interest that an international conference does good.

BLITZER: Senator Levin, will you vote to confirm Robert Gates as the next defense secretary?

LEVIN: Depends on what his, how he answers questions, whether he's forthright or not at hearings. And those hopefully can take place this year so we can vote on his confirmation. I voted against him last time because I didn't think he was forthright relative to his role in Iran-Contra. I hope he is forthright. I hope he's independent and objective relative to Iraq. I hope he'll speak truth to power unlike too many other people in this administration. So it all depends on how he does at the hearings.

BLITZER: You voted against him when he was up for confirmation as the CIA director. He was confirmed.

LEVIN: But that was 15 years ago.

BLITZER: That was a long time ago.

LEVIN: A long time ago, and I want to take a fresh look and a fair look at it now.

BLITZER: All right, we've got to leave it right there. Senator Levin, congratulations to you. Good luck when you become the chairman of this powerful committee in the U.S. Senate. Senator Hutchison, thanks to you as well.

HUTCHISON: You're welcome.

BLITZER: And still ahead, Seymour Hersh on his new article in The New Yorker magazine on Iran's nuclear program. Standing by to speak with him live.

Also, what's a greater threat to Iraq, the insurgents and the terrorists, or the sectarian violence between Iraqis, Sunnis and Shia? We'll talk to the country's ambassador to the United States, Samir Sumaidaie. That's coming up next.

But what's also coming up, a quick check of what's in the news right now, including the latest information we're getting on the violence and the kidnappings in Iraq. Stay with "Late Edition." We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition."

In Iraq, we're following disturbing reports of an additional kidnapping, this one of a high-ranking government official by masked gunmen.

Let's get right to the latest. Arwa Damon, standing by live in Baghdad. What do we know, Arwa?

ARWA DAMON, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, Ammar al-Saffar, who is the deputy health minister here, was kidnapped by gunman. He is a Shia, part of the prime minister's Dawa party, living on the outskirts of a predominantly Sunni area.

What we do know from the Iraqi police is that at least six vehicles, carrying 24 gunmen who were masquerading as Iraqi police and government officials, arrived at his home, stormed it, and kidnapped him.

Now, this is not the first time that an attempt has been made on his life. On June 9, 2004, a gunman opened fire on him. He did escape that attempt unharmed. Now, the violence here has taken quite a toll on Iraq's health care system. Officials estimate that some 800 employees and doctors have been killed in the violence.

And right now, the ministry has 31 of its employees still missing, believed to have been kidnapped.

BLITZER: Arwa Damon, reporting for us. Arwa, thanks very much for that.

Joining us now, here in Washington, Iraq's ambassador to the United States, Samir Sumaidaie. Mr. Ambassador, thanks very much for coming in.

SAMIR SUMAIDAIE, IRAQI AMBASSADOR TO UNITED STATES: Thank you.

BLITZER: First of all, your reaction to what Arwa just reported, on the kidnapping of this high-ranking Iraqi cabinet minister.

SUMAIDAIE: Well, that underscores the challenges that each and every official of the Iraqi government is facing. Every day is a day of risk-taking, a day of danger. Yet the government goes on, and people go to their work. And it underscores the necessity to bring some control over the security situation.

BLITZER: As you know, five Western contractors were kidnapped the other day, four of them Americans, one Austrian.

What's the latest information that you're getting?

Do you know who holds these Western contractors right now?

SUMAIDAIE: I don't have any detailed information on individual cases, Wolf. I try to keep track of the general political situation. So I'm not the right person to ask.

BLITZER: But in terms of the general situation, is it fair to conclude that the escalating violence, whether from the insurgents and the terrorists or what seems to be an even greater threat to Iraq's stability, the sectarian violence, the civil war, as some are already calling it, that that is getting worse?

SUMAIDAIE: Well, things are not good. Let's take a good look at the situation. This is, and has always been, the aim of the insurgents, the aim of the Al Qaida people and the Saddamists who wanted to destabilize Iraq and wanted to start a civil war.

BLITZER: And they have. They succeeded in it.

SUMAIDAIE: I would not say they've succeeded. They're coming close to it. They have pushed the system to the limit. And a lot of people are intimidated. A lot of people are threatened. A lot of people are losing their lives.

We have to be clear. The enemy, the prime enemy, is these types, Al Qaida and the Saddamists, who want to turn... BLITZER: Well, what about the death squads, the Shiite death squads, the Sunni death squads, the militias that seem to be bringing this country to a boiling point?

SUMAIDAIE: That's correct. But they -- I believe the prime enemy, the primary cause, the prime mover is the Al Qaida and the Saddamists.

The death squads, the militias have to be dissolved in order to defeat the prime enemy. The prime enemy still is the Baathists, Saddamists, and the Al Qaida.

But in order to defeat that enemy, we have to get control of our security forces. We have to disband the militias and we have to restore calm to the relationship between people.

BLITZER: But what we heard from the leaders of the CIA and the DIA, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency, during their testimony before the Senate Armed Services committee this week, that this threat of this sectarian violence spilling over into an all-out civil war seems to be a much greater threat to Iraq than the insurgents, the foreign fighters or the Saddam loyalists.

SUMAIDAIE: Right now it looks like that. And I agree that we have to get that under control.

There are political as well as security means to do that. But, again, in order to do that, we need to get control of our security forces. We've got to make sure that police masquerading -- criminals masquerading as policemen -- that has to be stopped.

Without doing that -- all these kidnappings are done by people dressed up as police. We have to stop that. Once we stop that; we stop these activities by people masquerading as policemen, then we are beginning to get to grips with the situation.

BLITZER: Let me play a sound bite from the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, General Michael Maples, speaking before the Senate Armed Services Committee this week to back up what we've just been talking about. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LT. GEN. MICHAEL MAPLES, DIA DIRECTOR: Shia militias are a growing impediment to stability. The Ministry of Interior and the police are heavily infiltrated and militias often operate under the protection or approval of Iraqi police to attack suspected Sunni insurgents and Sunni civilians.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Can you disagree with him on that?

SUMAIDAIE: I don't disagree. And that's why I believe that the key to solving the security problem, the key, is to make sure that the police forces are reformed and cleaned up. BLITZER: Here's the problem that a lot of Americans see, that your prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, while his heart may be in the right place, he doesn't have the guts to stand up to some of those Shiite militia, the Mahdi militia, specifically, and those who he relies on to a certain degree for his political base in the Iraqi parliament.

SUMAIDAIE: I think Mr. Maliki is a very brave man. Not only his heart is in the right place, but he's also got the right ideas. And he's got to be supported in implementing them.

He wants to do a two-track approach to the militia problem: one on the political and economic side and one on the security side.

He's got to be supported. People here talk, always, about numbers of policemen trained, how much money is being spent on training. It's not so much training. It's the screening. It's the motivation. It is the vetting that we have to do.

BLITZER: Here's what a lot of Americans would like to see...

SUMAIDAIE: The government needs help with that.

BLITZER: U.S. officials would like to see him arrest Muqtada al- Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric. They say he's the source of so much problem in Iraq, right now, and he's not part of the solution.

SUMAIDAIE: Well, before you come to the point where you arrest a person with a bloc in parliament of 30 members of parliament, you've got to deal with the situation in a different way.

You've got, first, to get control of your own police forces. And that is the key to solving the other problems.

BLITZER: Here's what Henry Kissinger said, this morning, on the BBC: "If you mean by "military victory" an Iraqi government that can be established and whose writ runs across the whole country, that gets the civil war under control and sectarian violence under control in a time period that the political processes of the democracies will support, I don't believe that is possible."

SUMAIDAIE: I still believe that is possible. And I think a lot of people in Iraq, the members of the government and the members of the policy council for national security all believe that the situation is retrievable. It's doable.

But we need to have support of the right kind. And now we have a lot of pressure on us not only from our regional neighbors who are interfering but pressures from our own friends.

BLITZER: Should the U.S. start withdrawing its troops from Iraq in the next four to six months, as Senator Carl Levin is proposing?

SUMAIDAIE: I think that sends the wrong signal. I think what the right signal is that we will never allow an Al Qaida state to be established in Iraq or a state that is Taliban-like or a base for terrorism.

That is bad for Iraq. That's bad for the United States. Everything has to be done in order to prevent that.

BLITZER: We have to leave it there, Ambassador. Thanks very much for coming in.

SUMAIDAIE: Thank you.

BLITZER: You have your hands full in Iraq.

Still to come, here on "Late Edition," the neocons. We'll speak with three prominent neoconservatives who pushed hard for the war in Iraq and may now be having some second thoughts about how it has been waged.

But just ahead: Is President Bush preparing for military action against Iran before he leaves office in two years?

Investigative journalist Seymour Hersh talks about his new article in the New Yorker Magazine, entitled "The Next Act." And don't forget, coming up for our North American viewers, right after "Late Edition," 1:00 p.m. Eastern, it's "This Week at War" with John Roberts. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." The Bush administration maintains it's focusing on diplomacy to try to resolve its differences with Iran, but will the power shift on Capitol Hill effectively kill any plans the White House might have for possible military action against Iran?

Joining us now, investigative journalist Seymour Hersh of The New Yorker magazine tells what he's learned in a new article. Sy Hersh, thanks very much for coming in.

SEYMOUR HERSH, "THE NEW YORKER": Glad to be here.

BLITZER: The article is entitled "The Next Act." The subtitle: "Is a damaged administration less likely to attack Iran or more?" Here's the question. What's the answer?

HERSH: Oh, well, nobody can predict the future, but the idea that somehow there's going to be comity and everything is going to be wonderful because Democrats have control of the Congress, tenuous as it may be, is just not what I'm finding. What I'm finding is that the guys who want to be very tough towards Iran, led by Mr. Cheney, the vice president, are still going to be very tough. That doesn't mean it will happen, but it does mean that there's not going to be much give, certainly in the negotiations as they now exist.

BLITZER: So, basically, your bottom line is that you think a U.S. military strike against Iran is now more likely or less likely?

HERSH: No. It's always not been a question of what I think. It's a question of what the facts are. Right now...

BLITZER: Based on the reporting that you've done, what do you think?

HERSH: I don't think it's changed that much. I think it's always been a strong possibility.

BLITZER: So the election really hasn't had an impact on military options over the next two years as far as dealing with Iran's nuclear threat?

HERSH: In terms of what the vice is president and some of the people in his office think, no. But of course, there's other bigger pictures. I would certainly say that because there's a Democratic Congress and because of problems with Iraq are so immense, the argument is whether or not you can go to Iran and talk to Iran and get them to help you in Iraq. If you do that with negotiation or whether you by being tough can you improve the situation. There's sort of a different argument now.

BLITZER: But don't you agree -- I mean, a lot of people have suggested that the vice president's influence has certainly been curtailed as a result of the political setback that Republicans and the president suffered, that others in the administration may have a different point of view, including the incoming, if he's confirmed, Defense Secretary Robert Gates, a former CIA director, that their influence might be more significant.

HERSH: I would never underestimate Mr. Cheney. I think he's very, very bright, very competent. And I think he's got very strong opinions that so far prevailed. You saw the clip earlier you produced that you ran about what he's saying about Iraq. There's not much of a second thought being given to the White House.

BLITZER: How close, based on your reporting, is Iran to actually building a -- having a nuclear weapon?

HERSH: Far away.

BLITZER: When you say far away, be precise.

HERSH: There's a new report that's the CIA, new assessment. And the CIA, by the way, has really become, under Mr. Hayden, it's getting much more vital. They've done a very good analysis of the Israeli war in Lebanon that hasn't been made public yet. They've done a new analysis that may be part of a national intelligence estimate soon.

BLITZER: You're talking about General Michael Hayden, the new CIA director.

HERSH: Yeah. Well, the stuff coming out of there, from what I gather, is really much more to the point.

BLITZER: So what's the conclusion as far as how much time the world has before Iran actually has a bomb? HERSH: The new study didn't say that. What it said is that we do a lot of very good things. We have tremendous people in the field, tremendous capability. We can do things that I don't write about and nobody should write about. We do very good technical things, and we can't find, the new assessment says we could not find, the CIA says there's no evidence that Iran is doing anything that puts them close to a bomb. There's no secret program of significant bomb making.

BLITZER: The Israelis have a different assessment.

HERSH: Absolutely.

BLITZER: They think the Iranians may be within a year of getting to the threshold of having a point of no return, if you will, from having a bomb. When I was there in July, I had briefings. That's what they suggested.

HERSH: They've been saying that, as you know, for five or ten years, one year. The fact is, the Israelis have come up with new human intelligence. I write about this in the article. Sort of the counter-CIA assessment. They've come up with an agent inside Iran. They have more than one.

And this agent is, who's been reliable, so the Israelis claim in the past, who now says the Iranians are secretly working on making an actual trigger for a bomb. Even though they may not have any specific -- we don't have any specific evidence of a facility where they're doing this work, the Israelis say, yes, they are. They're getting ready to start detonating a weapon.

And once they get the fissile material, the enriched material. Now, that information is being handled pretty much by the White House and various offices in the Pentagon. And the CIA isn't getting a good look at the Israeli intelligence. It's the old word, stovepiping. It's the president and the vice president. It's pretty much being kept in the White House.

BLITZER: They'd like to get more access to this Israeli agent, is that what you're saying?

HERSH: Well, of course the people in the CIA want to know who he is. They want to know, obviously. But they certainly want to know what other evidence does he have of actual making a warhead. This is the internecine war, fight that's going on, the same fight, by the way, we had before Iraq.

BLITZER: In the new article, which I read last night, "The Next Act," there's a paragraph that jumped out at me, and I'll read it to you: "In the past six months, Israel and the United States have also been working together in support of a Kurdish resistance group known as the Party for Free Life in Kurdistan. The group has been conducting cross-border forays into Iran, I was told by a government consultant with close ties to the Pentagon civilian leadership, as part of an effort to explore alternative means of applying pressure on Iran."

Tell our viewers what this means.

HERSH: Well, we've been running covert -- we're involved with the Israelis. They're the main point men for this particular -- it's called the PJACK (ph). And they've been going across the border, whacking away, fighting. There's been a lot of cross-border stuff. I think the idea is -- one idea we'd like to do is get regime change. We still would like that idea. That's getting less and less possible.

But we're putting a lot of pressure along the whole northern front, Baluchistan, the Azeri border. We're doing a lot of pressure to try and destabilize the regime. At least let the regime know we're there. And these operations are continuing to go on. Congress has not been briefed about it. I write about that too. It's all being done under the guise of military activity.

BLITZER: So if it's a military action as opposed to a CIA covert intelligence operation, you're saying the leaders of the intelligence committees or members of Congress, the leadership don't have to be briefed.

HERSH: This is going to be one of Gates' new issues. Thank God Gates, he has a lot of expertise...

BLITZER: Robert Gates, the incoming Defense Secretary, if he's approved.

HERSH: If he's approved, he'll have to look at what Rumsfeld has done in terms of covert operations.

BLITZER: In your article, you note that the Israelis are denying the suggestion they're working with Kurds in Iran.

HERSH: Absolutely.

BLITZER: All right. The White House is also issuing a tough statement on you. We got it even before your article came out: "Seymour Hersh is unfortunately continuing his series of inaccuracy- riddled articles about the Bush administration with another error- filled piece about the administration's policy toward Iran. The White House is not going to dignify the work of an author who has viciously degraded our troops, and whose articles consistently rely on outright falsehoods to justify his own radical views."

First of all, you want to respond to that White House...

HERSH: They've been saying that for years, even after the Abu Ghraib story and all those other stories. They've been saying it story after story. It's the same: We don't dignify this. That's just part of the game.

BLITZER: They're referring to a speech that you gave at McGill University October 30, which was widely reported on the Internet. Among other things -- and we'll get a chance -- the McGill Daily, the student newspaper there, had some quotes from you. I'll read a couple, and you tell me if they're accurate: " 'In Vietnam, our soldiers came back, and they were reviled as baby killers, in shame and humiliation,' he said. "It isn't happening now, but I will tell you, there has never been an American army as violent and murderous as our army has been in Iraq.' "

HERSH: You know, I've always done one thing. In my career, I've always said responsibility must go to the top. I've always written that. I've always been writing, from the days I did My Lai, saying the kids who do the shooting are as much victims as the people they have to kill.

We're in a very, very violent war now. The number of casualties are enormous. There's no question about it. But the idea that I would say, suggest that our soldiers are murders is ridiculous. I didn't say that. And if you're going to rely on a college version, the editor of the paper has also called me to apologize, because it was...

BLITZER: So that's a distortion.

HERSH: Well, it's just inevitable in a college newspaper report, but the point is that there is a serious point. This is say very violent war. But to blame the soldiers is ridiculous. You've got to put blame where it belongs. You've got to hold the highest people to the highest possible standards. That's what I've always done as a journalist.

BLITZER: I'll read two other quotes, and you tell me if these are accurate or not accurate: "The bad news is that there are 816 days left in the reign of King George II of America. The good news? When we wake up tomorrow morning, there will be one less day."

And then this: "In Washington, you can't expect any rationality. I don't know if he's in Iraq because God told him to, because his father didn't do it, or because it's the next step in his 12-step Alcoholics Anonymous program."

HERSH: Alas, I did say that. I do sometimes get funny. And maybe it's inappropriate, but the bottom line is that I think George Bush as a lame-duck president next year is going to have an opportunity to do some of those things, whether there are Democrats there or not that he's always wanted to do.

Whether that's going to get tough in Iraq -- Iran, rather, or not, we have to see. Nobody can predict the future. But being tough and taking a military step is still very much on the table in this government.

BLITZER: We'll leave it right there. Seymour Hersh. He's got a new article in The New Yorker magazine, "The Next Act." We'll have you back.

HERSH: Sure.

BLITZER: Thanks for coming in.

HERSH: Bye-bye. BLITZER: And still ahead, is Iran helping a deteriorating atmosphere in Iraq? We'll assess where things stand with both countries, what the United States should do, with three prominent neoconservatives. They're standing by. You're watching "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

BLITZER: Let's get some of your e-mail that you send in. Ed in Virginia writes, "If we want to win in Iraq, the U.S. needs to negotiate with Iraq's neighbors. That way, our troops can keep the militias in check while still going after the dangerous insurgents left in the country."

And Walter in Washington State writes, "I think imposing a deadline for our troops to withdraw is easier and more practical than expecting the Iraqis to suit our deadline. It's about time for the Bush administration to withdraw our troops before the violence gets worse."

We always welcome your comments. Our e-mail address, lateedition@ cnn.com.

And there's much more ahead on "Late Edition," including the potential impact of the midterm election results on the U.S. mission in Iraq. We'll discuss that and more with three prominent neoconservatives who may be having some second thoughts about the way the war in Iraq has been waged.

And we'll discuss Iraq as well as look ahead to the next moves in the new U.S. Congress with the incoming House Majority Whip James Clyburn and the incoming House Minority Whip Roy Blunt. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: This is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. JOHN BOEHNER (R-OH), MAJORITY LEADER: Republicans in the Congress want to win in Iraq.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), SPEAKER-ELECT: I am a person who is committed to ending this war.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER (voice over): Iraq dominates the debate in Congress, as new leadership takes over in the House and Senate. But will a Democratic majority mean a shift in foreign and domestic policy for the American people?

We'll ask two leaders of the new Congress. The whips: Democrat James Clyburn and Republican Roy Blunt.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: America is going to complete our mission. We're going to get it done right and then we'll bring our troops home with victory.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER (voice over): And 3 1/2 years after the war in Iraq began, we'll take a look back at the mistakes made by the Bush administration and a look ahead to the prospects for victory with three influential neoconservative advocates of the initial invasion: former assistant defense secretary Kenneth Adelman; former Bush speechwriter, David Frum and Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute.

ANNOUNCER: Live from CNN in Washington, this is "Late Edition: with Wolf Blitzer.

BLITZER: Welcome back. We'll talk about what's ahead for the U.S. Congress with the incoming House majority whip, James Clyburn, and the incoming minority whip, Roy Blunt, in just a moment. First, here is Fredricka Whitfield with a quick check of what's in the news right now. Fred?

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: All right, Fred, thanks very much.

Political drama in the U.S. Congress this week: the handover of power to Democrats; the blame game for their defeat among Republicans; a power struggle inside the Democratic leadership; and continuing upheaval over Iraq.

Joining us now, two men with front row seats in these history- making events. Congressman James Clyburn, Democrat of South Carolina, is the majority whip-elect, the third most powerful post in the Democratic leadership in the new House of Representatives. He joins us from Jackson, Mississippi.

And with us here in Washington, Congressman Roy Blunt, Republican of Missouri. He is the current majority whip in the Congress. He'll be the minority whip when the new Congress convenes in January.

To the whips, thanks to both of you for joining us. Good to have you.

And Congressman Clyburn, let me start with you. Nancy Pelosi -- a lot of Democrats are really irritated. They think she made a major blunder by getting involved in this battle for the new House majority leader, the battle between John Murtha and Steny Hoyer.

Steny Hoyer, the man she opposed, was easily elected. The New York Times writing this: "Nancy Pelosi has managed to severely scar her leadership even before taking up the gavel as the new speaker of the House.. she put herself in a lose-lose position by trying to force a badly tarnished ally, Representative John Murtha, on the incoming Democratic Congress as the majority leader."

This was a huge blunder on her part. I assume you'll acknowledge that.

REP. JAMES CLYBURN (D), SOUTH CAROLINA: Well, I don't know if I'd call it a blunder in her part. The fact of the matter is, I think all of us know that these inside -- the party's fights, you have them all the time.

If I remember correctly, right after Newt Gingrich took over, back in 1994, I think he favored Bob Walker to be whip, who lost out to Tom DeLay. And it was all over and then people move on.

So these things happened when you have this kind of change to take place. But Nancy Pelosi is very loyal to her friends. And that is a positive, it seems to me, in this business.

BLITZER: But don't you think...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: If she was going to support Congressman Murtha and make a big fight out of this, instead of quietly asking him to step aside, she should have had a better count and know that she was going to win. Because by losing, and losing decisively, it, sort of, underscored her inability to get the job done, as one of her first major missions.

CLYBURN: I don't think so. Once again, this is intra-party stuff. When we start acting as Democrats, trying to push our agenda, come January, I think that that's when Nancy Pelosi will demonstrate her real mettle. And I look forward to being very successful with her.

So I would not put too much into what may happen inside the party. These are personal relationships that people have, for whatever reason. Some, they go become a long way. Some develop out on the campaign trail. And that makes it a little bit different. And so I would not put too much in this if I were people looking in.

BLITZER: All right, Congressman Blunt, here's how Nancy Pelosi explained, in part, her decision. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PELOSI: I believe the biggest ethical challenge facing our country is the war in Iraq. For all the reasons that you know, that you don't need me to go into, it must be stopped. And I thought that Mr. Murtha's elevation to a leadership position would serve that purpose.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The war in Iraq is a huge issue. And it certainly dominated the elections and was, at least in large part, with the result you're going to be the minority whip as opposed to the majority whip.

REP. ROY BLUNT (R), MISSOURI: I like the majority whip a lot better. And of course, we're going to do everything we can to see if we can make the case to the country, in the next two years, that, in the competition of ideas, our ideas are better.

And one of these ideas is going to be how we deal with this war on Islamic totalitarianism in Iraq and Afghanistan, wherever it is. And there are no easy solutions.

I think the upcoming speaker wants to have an easy solution here. I don't believe there is one. I don't think that Jack Murtha's solution...

BLITZER: Well, do you have a solution?

BLUNT: As a matter of fact, I just said there are no easy solutions.

BLITZER: But you don't have a specific plan yourself?

BLUNT: Well, actually the Congress ought to be looking carefully to do everything we can to help the administration implement a plan. The Congress is not going to have a plan that effectively works, that solves this problem. We need to be a partner in that plan.

BLITZER: But what a lot of voters were complaining is that the Republican majority in the Senate and the House, they didn't do much in terms of oversight and serve as a check and balance, if you will, on what administration was doing.

Looking back over the past six years, when you report in majority, should you have done more, especially in the aftermath of 9/11, into looking into the U.S. going to war in Iraq?

BLUNT: Well, I think our response to 9/11, nobody faults much of that. Nobody faults the early entry into Afghanistan.

How we got into Iraq, there is a debate about that, but I don't think there's the same level of debate about the reality that we are there now.

We have to be very realistic about our foreign policy goals, whether we can achieve them or not, how we set them, how we're moving along the way.

When Jim Clyburn and I were in Iraq together on Memorial Day, we saw a lot of troublesome things. And one for, I think, both of us, certainly for me, is the Iraqis themselves ultimately have to want Iraq to be an independent Democratic country.

We need to see more of that from them every day. And our military men and women there are working hard to try to help make that happen.

BLITZER: Congressman Clyburn, are you among those Democrats who want the U.S. to start pulling out of Iraq within four to six months?

CLYBURN: I'm one of those Democrats. I agree with Nancy Pelosi that the Iraqi war is something that we have got to focus on very, very keenly.

But I also believe that we ought not get out in front of this Iraqi Study Group. James Baker and Lee Hamilton, I think, are coming forward in a matter of days with some ideas, some of which, I think, ought to be codified.

And I believe that we ought to make sure that we don't have the administration off doing one thing with the study group and Congress off doing something else. We ought to wait and see what's in that report. And then we ought to act in concert to get it done.

That's the way I think we ought to move forward. Because that study group is a very extensive, bipartisan study group that all of us have got faith and confidence in.

BLITZER: Congressman Blunt, these leaders of this study group that Congress Clyburn is talking about, the former secretary of state James Baker, the former congressman Lee Hamilton, a man you know quite well, A Democrat. There are five Democrats on this panel, five Republicans on this panel.

They've already done what the Bush administration is refusing to do. They've started talking directly with high-ranking Iranian and Syrian leaders in order to prepare their report.

Is this a good idea?

Should the U.S. be bringing Iran and Syria into this process to try to find a solution in Iraq?

BLUNT: Well, I think we ought to have the right kind of discussions with Iran and Syria. But the worst thing that can happen in Iraq is if we let the future of Iraq be determined by the Syrians, by the Iranians or by the Saudis.

They may be very well in a conflict, internally, that they're going to have to solve themselves. But one of the things that we can do is insist that that happen.

Maybe that involves discussions with the Syrians and the Iranians. Maybe it doesn't. But what would be a big mistake is to let those neighboring countries come in and have undue influence on what happens for the people of Iraq.

BLITZER: Another challenge, Congressman Clyburn, that the new speaker is going to be facing, who's going to be the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee? I'll read to you from an editorial in Friday's Los Angeles Times: "The Intelligence Committee deserves a chairman who is respected by Democrats and Republicans in Congress and by the White House, and who is free of distracting questions about past personal conduct. Jane Harman fits that description far more than Alcee Hastings." Who apparently is the choice of Nancy Pelosi. Jane Harman's the ranking member right now. What do you think? Who should be the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee?

CLYBURN: The chairman the House Intelligence Committee should be whoever the new speaker, Nancy Pelosi, would like for it to be. I don't know why anybody is saying that, you know, that Alcee Hastings is the choice. I don't know what her choice is.

But I do know this. I know what the rules are regarding this committee. I know that time has expired for the current ranking member. And for her to stay would require a waiver of the rules. And I do believe that we ought to be very careful how we start out our new administration or new power with granting a whole lot of waivers.

There are a lot of people on that committee. We don't even know what the composition of the committee is going to be. Because the committee starts out brand new in every Congress. So Nancy Pelosi will be naming the members of that committee, and then she will be making the determination as to who should chair it.

Now, for us to say now, we know exactly who that's going to be, there are other members on that committee that's got a lot of ability. I know that Sylvestre Reyes is on there. I know that Anna Eshoo is on there. Personally, I like and respect Alcee Hastings. And I do not agree with the fact that just because he would move to chair, would be something different from being a member of the committee. I don't think the chair's got any more -- I'm sorry?

BLITZER: I was going to let Congressman Blunt -- I'm going to take a break, but I just want him to respond. Do you have a problem with Alcee Hastings being chairman of the House Intelligence Committee? He was a federal judge who was impeached, as you well know.

BLUNT: I think he was impeached for bribery or influence- peddling or something that would, as nice a man as he is, you would think would be a disqualifying factor. That's really a decision that Nancy Pelosi's going to have to make. Jack Murtha, now potentially Alcee Hastings. I think a tough way to start out if you are trying to establish the kind of standards that Americans want to see coming from the Congress and from Washington.

BLITZER: Congressman Clyburn, do you have a problem with Alcee Hastings having been an impeached federal judge?

CLYBURN: I just said, remember, he was impeached for something that he was found not guilty for in a court of law. And so a lot of times, we have to look at the court of law being much less political than what was going on in the Congress. We are a political body. So the question is, whether or not there are facts or whether or not there are politics involved in all of this.

So I do have respect for him. I like him very much. He's been a personal friend since my college days, and I very well would support him if that's what Nancy would like to happen. BLITZER: All right, gentlemen, stand by. We're going to take a quick break. We'll have much more with the incoming Congressional whips later.

I'll talk to some of the original architects of the U.S. war in Iraq, the so-called neocons. Ken Adelman, David Frum, Michael Rubin. Has their support for the war wavered? And what's down the road for Iraq and Iran?

Plus our highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States, including Senator John McCain on what to do next in Iraq.

And for our North American viewers, at the top of the hour, right after "Late Edition," the only comprehensive look at events in Iraq and updates from our correspondents in Baghdad and Tehran, "This Week at War" with John Roberts. That's coming up right after "Late Edition."

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." Our two guests will have the job of counting the votes and whipping up support when the new Congress convenes. The House Majority Whip-Elect James Clyburn, Democrat of South Carolina, and the House Minority Whip-Elect Roy Blunt, Republican of Missouri. He's the current majority whip. But not much longer.

Congressman Blunt, let me read to you what a columnist in The Washington Post, Eugene Robinson, wrote the other day: "The Republican party put up three high-profile black candidates to try to weaken the bond between the Democratic Party and African Americans, and all three got slammed by the voters, big-time. After a week of reflection, maybe Ken Blackwell, Lynn Swann and Michael Steele have come to understand that they were never intended to be viable candidates. From the start, they were more like cannon fodder."

What do you say to Eugene Robinson?

BLUNT: Well, I just don't think that's right at all. I think they were three great candidates. I think all of them had their own set of circumstances in their own race. All running in challenging states. You know, Ohio this year. Maryland, always.

BLITZER: Pennsylvania.

BLUNT: Pennsylvania, a big challenge with an incumbent governor. You could find all kind of candidates that had similar problems. We need to continue to reach out to all Americans to try to make them an inclusive part of our discussion in our party, and we're doing that.

I'm glad we had those candidates. They were all good candidates. Right here, we got to watch the Maryland Senate race, and Michael Steele was out there, talking about ideas, providing a real alternative in a state where no Republicans won, not just him. BLITZER: By all account, Congressman Clyburn, Michael Steele in Maryland came out a winner even though he lost this race. Are you worried that the Republican Party's making inroads and reaching out to African Americans?

CLYBURN: No, I'm not worried about that at all. I think that Roy is exactly right. This is all about ideas and ideals. And I think that you have to look at a Republican Party that can't quite make up his mind as to what he wants to do. They reach out or put up candidates in three states. And then they allow the kind of TV ads to run against Harold Ford that ran down there. Those were the most despicable ads that I have seen since I have been in public life.

And then they ran, a lot of the debates, especially in the House races, oh, if you elect the Democrats, you're going to have John Conyers chairing Judiciary. You're going to have Nancy Pelosi, a San Francisco liberal, as speaker of the House. And you're going to have Charlie Rangel chairing Ways and Means. They don't share our values.

What is it about Charlie Rangel and John Conyers' values that are different from American values? Both these men served in our military. Charlie Rangel wounded in the Korean war. Come back and served their state. I think those kind of things ought not be in politics anymore.

But what I am happy about...

BLITZER: All right, hold on one second, Congressman Clyburn. I want Congressman Blunt to respond, because that's a serious charge, this notion that the ads Republicans ran against Harold Ford, Jr., in Tennessee and the suggestion that these incoming potential chairmen who are African American, the charge that there was an element of racism here is a serious accusation against Republicans.

BLUNT: Well, it might have been, except my friend Jim mentioned in the middle of that list, he gave Nancy Pelosi, who is not an African American. That was a discussion about ideas. Regarding the Tennessee...

BLITZER: Do you repudiate the ads that were run in Tennessee to Harold Ford, Jr.?

BLUNT: You know, if they were offensive to Harold, if they were offensive to African Americans, I do.

BLITZER: Were they offensive to you?

BLUNT: I didn't see them. But Harold Ford and I...

BLITZER: You didn't see the one about the Playboy party?

BLUNT: I never saw the ad. I heard about it. Never saw it. I don't know whether it was -- what it was intended to do, but I don't know that it did anything that was helpful in either campaign. Harold Ford and I cosponsored the Charitable Giving Act together. People are going to be able to give to charities easier this year and in the future because he and I work together. We came to Congress the same time.

He's an incredibly bright, incredibly talented, capable guy. I do think that the new Senator from Tennessee was more reflective of where the voters have been for several years now in Tennessee elections.

BLITZER: Even though Harold Ford Jr. lost, like Michael Steele in Maryland, I think he also, and a lot of people think he came out a winner. Listen to how Senator John McCain, Congressman Clyburn, summarized what he thought was the result of this election. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN, R-ARIZONA: The election was not an affirmation of the other party's program. Try as hard as I could, I couldn't find much evidence that my Democratic friends were offering anything that resembled a coherent platform or principle leadership on the critical issues that confront us today.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right, you want to respond to someone who is -- clearly wants to be president of the United States in two years?

CLYBURN: Well, let me say this. First of all, we laid out a plan that we call Six for '06. We talked about electing Democrats and getting for the first time in ten years an increase in the minimum wage. That was a substantive plan, and that's what we're going to do.

We talked about making college education or any post-secondary education more affordable for all American children. We talk cutting interest rates on student loans from 8.4 percent down to 4.2, making college tuition tax-deductible. That's the way you grow the middle class. That was a proposal.

We talked about energy, a new energy policy in this country that would make us energy-independent within ten years. And we're -- talked about homegrown and American-owned alternatives to oil. Ethanol, butanol, other biodiesel stuff (ph), hydrogen cells, increasing our expenditures in research. Now that was a program. So I don't know where Mr. McCain was while all of this was going on, but the American people got turned on to it and voted for it.

BLITZER: We've got to leave it right there, unfortunately, because we're out time. The two whips, Congressman Clyburn, thanks very much for coming in. Congressman Blunt, thanks to you as well. Let me congratulate both of you on being elected this week.

Coming up, how early supporters of the war in Iraq are questioning how it's been waged and what to do now. I'll talk to some of the president's early neoconservative allies: Ken Adelman, David Frum and Michael Rubin. they're standing by live.

But up next, a quick check of what's in the news right now, including today's abduction of Iraq's deputy health minister. Stay with us. We'll be right back.

(NEWS BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: We'll succeed unless we quit.

BUSH: The Maliki government's going to make it unless the coalition leaves before they have a chance to make it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: President Bush in Vietnam this weekend, reassuring Australian Prime Minister John Howard that the United States and its allies will get the job done in Iraq.

Joining us now, some of the Washington insiders, the so-called neoconservatives who supported the president early on in his Iraq policy.

In Richmond, Virginia, Ken Adelman, former assistant secretary of defense; here in Washington, David Frum, former speechwriter to the president; and Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute. He spent nearly two years in Iraq as a senior political adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Gentlemen, thanks very much for coming in. And I want to set up this discussion with all three of you by going back, first of all, to what you were all saying before the war in Iraq got started.

Ken Adelman, I'll start with you. I remember very vividly, when you were interviewed by me here on CNN in December of 2001, December 10, 2001, shortly after 9/11, you said, "I don't believe that we need the kind of tremendous coalition that we had before... the Iraqi army is way lower -- one-third of what it was before, and I think it would be a cakewalk."

And then you amplified that, two months later, February 13, 2002, in an op-ed in The Washington Post: "I believe demolishing Hussein's military power and liberating Iraq would be cakewalk."

You remember that, I'm sure, very vividly as well. The toppling of Saddam Hussein did turn out to be, relatively speaking, a cakewalk. But everything that's happened ever since certainly did not.

KEN ADELMAN, FORMER ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE: That is right. And it was probably an ill-advised phrase, to tell you the truth, Wolf. But it was a lot easier than any of us expected. And a lot of the disastrous things that we anticipated in the war to topple Saddam Hussein, did not result, because our military was so much better and the Iraqi military was so much worse than we ever expected. So that was not the problem.

The problem arose, obviously, after the fall of the statue on April 9, 2003. And it is a big question and a legitimate question, Wolf, whether the problem had to arise or whether a series of mistakes -- allowing the looting, dismissing the top echelon of the Iraqi army, dismissing the top echelon of the civil service, on and on and on -- whether all of that resulted in the insurgency that actually didn't start until the end -- or toward the end, the third quarter of the end of 2003.

So that is a legitimate question to ask, whether all of this would have happened had we done it right.

BLITZER: All right. We're going to get to that in a second.

David Frum, you were the speechwriter, among those contributing to the president's State of the Union address on January 29, 2002, when he said these words.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: States like these and their terrorist allies constitute an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world by seeking weapons of mass destruction. These regimes pose a grave and growing danger.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Do you regret contributing to that "axis of evil" phrase?

DAVID FRUM, FORMER BUSH SPEECHWRITER: I think everything the president said there was perfectly true. Unfortunately, it remains true in 2006. And if I have regrets, I think the only regret I would say is, when the president said he would not allow the world's most dangerous regimes to require the world's most deadliest weapons, I anticipated -- I think a lot of people anticipated a swifter and more decisive response to prevent it.

Four years later, North Korea and Iran continue, remain very dangerous regimes.

BLITZER: Two of the three axis of evil.

FRUM: And they continue to advance toward these terribly deadly weapons. At least Americans don't have to worry about deadly weapons in the hands of Iraq, which is something that the United States did have to worry about from 1980 until 2003.

BLITZER: But when you were drafting that speech, in your wildest imagination, did you ever imagine that, four years later -- it's almost four years since he delivered that State of the Union address -- the United States would be bogged down in Iraq the way it is today?

FRUM: I didn't imagine that. But I also would have not imagined that, even with Iraq being as difficult as it has been, that there would have been so little action on these other threats that the president mentioned.

BLITZER: North Korea and...

FRUM: North Korea and Iran.

BLITZER: Is that in part because the United States has been preoccupied with Iraq?

FRUM: I don't think it had to be true.

BLITZER: But it's a matter of fact.

FRUM: I think that, when people say that, they say, well, look, there are only so many resources that the U.S. government has got. I don't think that the resources that are being used in Iraq are the same resources you would need to prevent the nuclearization of...

BLITZER; But if the U.S. is going to go to war, militarily, against Iran and North Korea, you've got to have troops from some place.

FRUM: But I don't think anyone ever anticipated a ground invasion of either Iran or North Korea or any...

BLITZER: People envisioned air strikes.

FRUM: As a last resort. But what they imagined a long time before that was a serious attempt to weaken the power of the Iranian regime, through all kind of techniques that remain available to the United States.

BLITZER: Here's what you wrote on September 9, Michael Rubin, in the Weekly Standard Magazine -- September 9, 2002, before the war.

"The United States can't bog down in protracted warfare in Baghdad unless a significant number of Iraqi troops are willing to fight us there... they may not be. In 1991, it's worth remembering, the Iraqi military collapsed and fled a mere 100 hours into the ground war... there's good reason to believe that the risk of taking on Saddam Hussein is -- thankfully -- far lower than the skeptics would have us believe."

MICHAEL RUBIN, AMERICAN ENTERPRISE INSTITUTE: And I still stand by that. What we're looking at is not the Iraqi army. A lot of people were talking -- I remember Time Magazine spoke about how the invasion of Iraq would become -- the actual invasion of Iraq would become another Nasiriyah.

People, at the same time, said that Afghanistan would become "Vietnam with snow." The fact of the matter is, we got to Baghdad in three weeks and Saddam's statue came tumbling down.

We then fumbled the honeymoon period. We were greeted with flowers and chocolates. We bungled it.

BLITZER: And a lot of people were saying, getting rid of Saddam was the easy part. What happens afterwards is going to be a nightmare.

And a lot of the Bush administration officials seem to have neglected that advice that they were getting from some of the early -- from the first Bush administration, the president's father's administration, the Brent Scowcroft, the James Bakers.

They were suggesting, you know what, this is not going to be simply a matter of getting rid of Saddam. Then you've got to figure out what to do next.

RUBIN: Well, actually, I just looked up an interview with Ed Djerejian, who's the director of the James Baker Center. And what he said is he believed it would take two to three months to put Iraq back on its feet. That was the advice which many of the so-called State Department Arabists were giving us as well.

What we most estimated is the goodwill of the Iranians. When we struck a deal -- when Zalmay Khalilzad struck a deal with the Iranians for non-interference before the war, we trusted them. That was our mistake. And it would be a mistake to, again, put our national security in the trust of Iran's words.

BLITZER: So you're blaming Iran for a lot of the current instability in Iraq?

RUBIN: I most certainly am. And frankly, a lot of Iranian journalists do that as well, when they highlight the broken deals which the Revolutionary Guard has made.

And a lot of people forget, we have an ambassador in Iraq; Iran has an ambassador in Iraq, but Iran's ambassador isn't from the diplomatic corps; he's from the Revolutionary Guard corps' elite unit, charged with export of revolution.

BLITZER: Ken Adelman, you caused a stir, on the Vanity Fair Web site, on November 3, just before the election, when these words were printed: "I just presumed that what I considered to be the most competent national-security team since Truman was indeed going to be competent. They turned out to be among the most incompetent teams in the post-war era. Not only did each of them, individually, have enormous flaws, but together they were deadly, dysfunctional."

You're referring, specifically, to the president, the vice president, the national security adviser, the secretary of defense, the top leaders of the Bush administration.

ADELMAN: Well, I think, when you look at the record, Wolf, it's a record that has a lot of mistakes. You can't read a book without, you know, realizing that.

George Packer's book, "The Assassin's Gate," Michael Gordon and Bernie Trainor's book on "Cobra II," Bob Woodward's book on "State of Denial," Tom Ricks's book, "Fiasco" -- they all have different episodes but the same sad, story.

And you have to ask yourself, how did this happen? And all them attempt, and all of them are serious works and all of them full of facts and figures and episodes. And to tell you the truth, it just breaks your heart.

BLITZER: Does it break your heart, David Frum, to see how this situation unfolded?

Because in the Vanity Fair quotes that were released -- the whole article has not yet been published, but in the quotes -- I'll read one of them from you, and you'll tell me if this is accurate: "I always believed, as a speechwriter that if you could persuade the president to commit himself to certain words, he would feel himself committed to the idea that underlay those words."

And the big shock to me has been that, although the president said the words, he just did not absorb the ideas. And that is the root of, maybe, everything.

FRUM: Yes, that is an accurate quote.

BLITZER: It is accurate?

FRUM: Yes. And it reflects a lot of what I've been saying for the past year and a half.

When the president gives these speeches, every speech is the result of a battle for the president's heart and mind, as has famously been said about the speech-making process.

So different people try to persuade the president to say different kinds of things. And he considers and deliberates. And George Bush committed himself to a series of propositions.

One, he was going to stop Iran and North Korea from acquiring these terrible weapons. And two, that in Iraq, he was going to put his trust in the future of Iraq in a democratic process.

Instead, what happened in Iraq, for example, was the United States became an occupying power almost immediately.

That even before the invasion of Iraq, the decision was made not to have any kind of an Iraqi face on the future government, on the next government of Iraq, because...

BLITZER: Was that Paul Bremer who made that decision, who was the provisional authority representative, the proconsul, as some people say he was? Or was that a decision made by Rumsfeld or Cheney?

FRUM: Paul Bremer was the result of it. But the reason there was a proconsul was because a decision was made not to have an Iraqi provisional government. And that came about because the administration fought itself to a standstill. I mean, there were people who -- there were a number of Iraqis, each of whom had patrons in the administration.

BLITZER: A lot of people would say, that was, Michael Rubin, a huge blunder. You were there. You worked for Paul Bremer. Who came up with that idea of a U.S. military occupation as opposed to trying to let the Iraqis take charge?

RUBIN: Well, I'd second what David said, that that decision, Paul Bremer was the result of that decision. What there was was a debate within the administration about, you have the Iraqi opposition. You had, I believe it was seven key figures. And the question was whether to allow them to become a provisional government. They had already been self-selected through a number of conferences. Or whether there would be some sort of American presence first.

The real debate in Washington was whether we would have more influence before liberation or after liberation. And ultimately, it was the National Security Council, the national security adviser which made the decision to go with an American occupation presence.

BLITZER: That was Condoleezza Rice?

RUBIN: That was Condoleezza Rice and Stephen Hadley.

BLITZER: The deputy national security adviser...

RUBIN: At the time, yes.

BLITZER: ... who's now the national security adviser. And Condoleezza Rice, of course, is the secretary of state now.

RUBIN: That was the compromise that came out of interagency debate, when again, as David said, the State Department, the Pentagon and the others fought themselves to a standstill.

BLITZER: And you think that was a blunder?

RUBIN: I do believe it is one the greatest blunders we have made. The Coalition Provisional Authority and Paul Bremer did a lot of good, but nothing they accomplished which was good couldn't have been accomplished without an immediate transfer of sovereignty. And the fact that we labelled ourselves an occupying power, unlike in Bosnia, unlike in Kosovo and elsewhere, really put -- it justified all the insurgent rhetoric against us. And it turned our allies from those creating a democracy into collaborators.

BLITZER: All right. We're going to take a quick break. A lot more to talk about. The neoconservatives, we're going to ask them some more questions. What went wrong? What went right? What did go right? And what should the U.S. be doing next?

And this note for our North American viewers, right at the top of the hour, John Roberts looks at the war, the impact on the whole region, talks to analysts and our correspondents. "This Week at War" coming up right after "Late Edition."

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. We're talking about the way ahead in Iraq with three prominent neoconservatives who are not necessarily all that happy with the way the Bush administration has waged the war in Iraq: former Assistant Defense Secretary Ken Adelman, former Bush speechwriter David Frum and Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute.

Ken, I'll start with you. The Iraq Study Group. Ten members of this group, which has been meeting since last April, their mission is designed to come up with a new strategy, some new ideas. Supposedly going to release their plan next month.

Let's take a look at who these ten members are. On the Republican side, five Republicans, James Baker, Lawrence Eagleburger, Edwin Meese, Sandra Day O'Connor and former Senator Alan Simpson. On the Democratic side, five members. Former Congressman Lee Hamilton, the co-chairman, Vernon Jordan, Leon Panetta, William Perry and Chuck Robb, the former U.S. Senator. I see ten very influential, prominent guys, but I don't see one conservative, neoconservative, Ken Adelman. What do you make of that?

ADELMAN: Nothing, to tell you the truth. I'm not a neoconservative. I was always a conservative. While the neoconservatives, I guess, were Trotskyites in campaigning in some nefarious manner in 1964, I was campaigning for Barry Goldwater. So I think it doesn't matter all that much. It's an academic exercise. Because I am conservative and all that. But I think it's a very good group, and I'm interested in what they have to say.

BLITZER: Are you concerned, though, about the membership of this Iraq study group, David Frum, given their histories, the so-called realist as opposed to the neoconservative, the idealist school of thought?

FRUM: I think it is -- I'm with Ken. I'm not sure how helpful any of those terms are. And what I'm more concerned about with the Iraq study group is the answers are already baked. That they're not studying at all.

That there is a decision been made to try to negotiate a grand deal with the Iranians and the Syrians by which they would help the United States exit from Iraq in return for the United States overlooking their activities. And if that's the plan, that's not a good plan.

BLITZER: Is that a good idea?

RUBIN: I don't believe it's a good idea. First of all, it's not a new idea.

BLITZER: To bring in the regional powers, including Iran and Syria and to start a dialogue. The Iraq study group of James Baker and Lee Hamilton, they're already doing what Bush administration refuses to do. They've been meeting with high-ranking Iranian and Syrian officials.

RUBIN: Actually, the Bush administration doesn't refuse to do it. On May 31st, Condoleezza Rice offered to have direct talks with Iran in the context... BLITZER: But they laid out certain conditions?

RUBIN: The only condition was that Iran suspend uranium enrichment during the duration of the talks.

BLITZER: But Baker-Hamilton didn't ask for that suspension.

RUBIN: But you know what? Four days later, Ayatollah Khamenei, the supreme leader of Iran, got up in response to Condoleezza Rice's offer and said, why don't you just admit that you've lost? Why don't you just admit that you are weak and your razor is blunt?

That was Iran's response. Now, we trusted Iran in 2003, when Zalmay Khalilzad met with the Iranian ambassador, and the revolutionary guard didn't keep the word. The problem with negotiating with Iran is that the question of which Iran you are negotiating with? The diplomats or the people that actually hold power, which are the revolutionary guard?

BLITZER: Ken Adelman, we're almost out of time, but I want your quick thoughts, all three of you before we go. Iran, should the U.S. bomb Iran's nuclear facilities anytime soon?

ADELMAN: No.

BLITZER: That's a pretty quick thought. What do you think, David?

FRUM: The United States does not have to do it soon. But the United States -- because there are a lot of intermediary steps. What is worrying is that the United States seems to have moved away even from the very idea of a coercive diplomacy of any kind. And that what United States, I think, is in most serious danger of doing is overlooking the fact that, right now, there are American troops who are under attack from Iranian weapons and from troop, guerrillas trained by Iranian trainers, and that is an outrage, and the United States ought to be taking a hard line on that.

BLITZER: Here's what Joshua, your colleague at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Los Angeles Times today: "We must bomb Iran. It has been four years since that country's secret nuclear program was brought to light. And the path of diplomacy and sanctions has led nowhere. It is now clear that neither Moscow nor Beijing will ever agree to tough sanctions. What's more, even if they were to do so, it would not stop Iran, which is a country on a mission."

Very quickly, what do you think?

RUBIN: I disagree. It's a last resort. What we should be doing is making the Iranian government more accountable to the people, trying to replicate what we did in Poland in 1981 with the Gdansk labor movement. We have the opportunity to do that in Iran, but the more as we debate as if it's only a dichotomy between engagement and military action, the more we squander our opportunity to take advantage of other opportunities. BLITZER: I want to thank all of you for joining us. Ken Adelman, David Frum, Michael Rubin, an excellent discussion. We'll continue this down the road.

And coming up, our "in case you missed it" feature brings you highlights of the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States. "Late Edition" will be right back.

BLITZER: Let's take a look at what's on the cover of this week's major newsmagazines here in the United States. Time magazine has "The Pope Confronts Islam." Newsweek explores growing up with autism. And U.S. News & World Report looks at "Taking Care of Mom and Dad."

Up next, "Late Edition's" Sunday morning talk show roundup. And for our North American viewers, at the top of the hour, "This Week at War." We'll be right back.

BLITZER: And now, in case you missed it, let's check some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States. Discussion focused on the new Congress and the way forward in Iraq.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN, R-ARIZONA: You've got to ask yourself some questions. One, are we winning? And I think the answer is no. The other is, what are the consequences of defeat? I just pointed out the widening war, greater chaos in the region, other countries drawn in, emboldening and strengthening of Iraq.

Can we still win? Yes, I believe we can. It'll be tough, but we need to do it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JAMES WEBB, U.S. SENATOR-ELECT, D-VIRGINIA: We need to talk to Iran and Syria. I think it was a great mistake not to as this moves forward, and that's one thing I've been encouraged to hear from former Secretary of State Baker, that you need to talk to your enemies as well as your friends. You don't have to give up anything in terms of, you know, national concerns to be talking to them. But it's impossible to resolve the situation now without talking to them.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. REP. CHARLES RANGEL, D-NEW YORK: A draft doesn't necessarily mean that everyone drafted will have to serve in the military. I think at a time when national security is so important, having our young people commit themselves to a couple of years in service to this great republic, whether it's our seaports, our airports, in schools, in hospitals and at the end of that, to provide some educational benefits, it's the best thing for our young people and the best thing for our country. I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

NEWT GINGRICH, R-GA, FORMER U.S. HOUSE SPEAKER: When you look at number of Democrats who won in place like North Carolina, Indiana, Arizona, campaigning as centrist or blue dog or conservative depending on where they were Democrats, there's the potential that with the right policies and the right choices, that you could consistently have floor control for the conservatives in a bipartisan coalition, even though you have a very liberal Democrat as speaker.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here on "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk. And that's your "Late Edition" for this Sunday, November 19. Please be sure to join us next Sunday and every Sunday for two hours, at 11 a.m. Eastern, for the last word in Sunday talk.

Remember, we're in the "Situation Room" Monday through Friday from 4 to 6 p.m. Eastern, another hour at 7 p.m. Eastern. Until then, thanks very much for watching. I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. "This Week at War" with John Roberts starts right now.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, November 21, 2006 8:10 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, November 21, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061121.pdf; agnb061121.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2006EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Defends Domestic Wiretapping 4
Judge Rejects PAWF Request For NSA Documents 5
Human Rights Groups Back Democrats On Detainee Law Overhaul 5
Reno Joins Other Former DOJ Officials In Challenging Terror Law 5
Islamic Charity Distances Itself From Sudanese Group With al-Qaida Links 6
Judge Rules US Not Required To Transfer Detainee For Medical Treatment 6
Second Man Charged In Hezbollah TV Station Access Case ..6
Prodi Sacks Intelligence Chiefs Over Suspected CIA Kidnapping 6
Germany Detains Six, Releases Five In Suspected El Al Bomb Plot 7

Homeland Response:

ACLU To Release Documents Detailing Pentagon Records On Antiwar Groups 7
Six Imams Removed From US Flight 7
Hawley Urges Travelers To Learn Rules Before Going To The Airport 7
Pentagon Delays Chemical Weapons Destruction 8

War News:

Bush Says He Hasn't Decided On Changes To Iraq Strategy ..8
Wolf, Rice Were Early Supporters Of Iraq Study Group Proposal 10
Cost Of Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan Nears $500 Billion 10
Iraqi President To Hold Talks With Iranian, Syrian Leaders 10
Army's Effort To Train Iraqi Forces Reportedly Beset By Setbacks 12
More Than 1200 Iraqi Civilians Have Been Killed This Month 13
Pro-Saddam TV Station Reemerges After Being Banned 13
Blair Meets With Karzai In Kabul, Visits British Troops 13
Taliban Reportedly Reliant On Profits From Opium Production 14

DOJ:

GAO Finds DOJ Making Progress On Information Classification 14

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ Drops Appeal Of Lay Ruling 14
Cyberonics Head Resigns Amid Expanding Options Probe 15
Former Capital One CFO Settles Insider Trading Charges For $1.8 Million 15
South Korean Prosecutors Indict Lone Star, KEB On Stock-Manipulation Charges 15
Coehlo's Stock Options Draw SEC Scrutiny 16
Redstone's Nephew Sues Over Family Trust Management ..16
Insiders Made Millions Trading In Money-Losing Firm's Stock 16
Paulson Criticizes Sarbanes-Oxley Law 17
Senate Hearing To Examine SEC's Effectiveness 17

Criminal Law:

FBI Expanding Global Presence To Fight Cyber Crime 17
Three Gang Members Sentenced To Life For Targeting Black Victims 18
US Backs Off Prison Restrictions For Aryan Brotherhood Members 18
Ohio Republican Fundraiser Sentenced For Embezzlement 18
Pennsylvania Man Charged In West Virginia Death Could Face Death Penalty 19
FBI Recovers Stolen Goya 19
Judge Rules Accused Cuban Spy's Alleged Confession Admissible At Trial 19
Former Daley Patronage Chief Sentenced To Four Years In Prison 20

NYC Bus Driver's Union President Charged With Racketeering, Extortion 20
Jeffs Evidence Hearing Begins Today 20
USA Today Finds Inaction On Many DNA Matches 21
New Orleans Defendants Freed Because Of Evidence Problems After Katrina 21
WPost Praises Outgoing Police Chief Ramsey 21

Civil Law:

Attorneys Argue Validity Of 1998 Law Aimed At Curbing Online Pornography 22
Smokers Sue Phillip Morris For Lung Scans 23
Judge Strikes Down Bank Of America Ruling 23
Court Rules Internet Users, Providers Not Liable For Posted Defamatory Material 23

Civil Rights:

Democrats Will Target Election "Robo Calls." 24
Georgia Prosecutors Launch Review Of Excessive Force Cases 24
UCLA Officer In Taser Video Has Been Subject Of Two Other Use-Of-Force Complaints 24
Judge Strikes Las Vegas Ban On Feeding Homeless In Parks 25
WPost Says Both Parties Should Embrace Ryan Abortion Bill 25

Antitrust:

Suspected Municipal Bond Abuses Raise Tax Questions 25
Private Equity Firms Fuel Takeover Boom 25
Freeport To Acquire Phelps Dodge In Copper Merger 26
Mattel Lays Claim To MGA Entertainment's Bratz Line 26
Probe Finds Cephalon Used Questionable Tactics To Sell Actiq 27
LSE Rejects Nasdaq's Offer 27

Environment/Indian Affairs:

National Park Service Proposes Snowmobile Plan For Yellowstone 27
Marine Protection Sought For Northwest Atlantic 28
Conrad Defends Agricultural Disaster Assistance Funding 28
Navajo Tribe's Efforts At Desert Radiation Cleanup Thwarted By Delays, Disputes 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senate Appropriations Bill Might Order FBI To Recover VCF Funds From SAIC 29
Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation 29
Texas Man Caught With 1,700 Pounds Of Marijuana Pleads Guilty 29
More Than 100 Charged In Kentucky Prescription-Drug Investigation 29
Trainer Returns To Prison For Refusing To Testify Against Barry Bonds 30
"Operation Central Hub" Reveals Links To Drug Organizations In 5 States, Mexico 30
ATF Finds Bomb, Components In Texas 30

Immigration:

Texas Legislators Propose Stripping Benefits From Children Of Illegals 30

Tax:

IRS Says More Audits Lead To Increased Tax Revenue 31

Congress-Administration:

GOP Leadership Plans To "Punt" Spending Bills Until Next Congress 31
Pelosi Stresses "Pocketbook" Issues, Pledges To Work With GOP 32
Gates Meets With Levin 33
Democrats Distance Themselves From Rangel's Support For Draft 33
Democrats Expected To Boost Generic Drugs 34
House Intelligence Panel Reinstates Clearances For Democratic Aide 34
GOP Said To Ignore Election Results In Retaining Blunt 34
Democrats' House Majority Equals GOP's High Water Mark 34
Democrats' Control Of Senate Said To Be Precarious 35
Democrats Have Expensive List Of Priorities 35
Study Recommends TSP Not Include REITs 36
WSJournal Accuses White House Of "Pandering" To Textile Industry 36

Other News:

Leading Indicators Up In October; Existing Home Sales Down 36
Utility Industry Markets Seen As Flawed 37
Venezuelan Discounted Heating Oil Program Comes To Washington DC 37
Family Of Slain Journalist Sues DC For $20 Million 37
Typos In Bills Can Invalidate Laws, Redirect Funding 38
Buchanan Named Winner Of Disputed Florida House Seat 38
Extent Of Clinton's Campaign Spending Concerns Some Democrats 39
Women Made Historic Gains In This Year's Elections 39

DOJ_NMG_0096502

Brownback To Announce Decision On Presidential Run Next Month 39
McCain, Romney Seek To Bolster Support On Right 39
Hunter Seen As Having Potential In GOP Presidential Primary 40
Doro Bush Koch Seen As Contrasting Bush 41 And 43 40
Hatch Aide Is New CEO Of Liquor Lobby 40
Thousands Protest Bush's Visit To Indonesia 40
US Approves Most IAEA Aid For Iran Nuclear Sites 41
Israeli Military Chief Starts Investigation Of Cluster Bomb Use 42
Hariri Probe Said To Have Caused Rift In Lebanese Government 42
Palestinian Unity Government Talks Suspended 42
Train Bombing In India Kill 8, Wound 60 43
Natsios Says US Could Opt For "Plan B" To End Darfur Violence Next Year 43
Muslim Population Increases In Russia 44
Muslim Women Gather In New York To Issue Fatwas 44
Losing Candidate Declares Himself President Of Mexico 44
Researchers Find Unconventional Transmissions Of AIDS In Africa 45
Commission Blames Nepali King For Bloody Violence On Demonstrators 45
NYTimes Says UN Human Rights Council Needs Improvement 45
WPost Suspects Putin Is Behind Poisoning 45

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 45

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 46

DOJ_NMG_0096503

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Defends Domestic Wiretapping. The Denver Post (11/21, Cardona) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales reiterated his support for a domestic wiretapping program to fight terrorism during a visit Monday with The Denver Post editorial board. … 'We've done a lot to make America safer, but it's not safe,' Gonzales said when asked about the need for warrantless eavesdropping. 'Fundamentally, the world is different today. My 14-year-old son will grow up in a different world than I grew up in. It's much more likely there will be a terrorist attack in this country. I never worried about a terrorist attack as a boy.'" The Post continues, "Gonzales said the Bush administration would not be deterred by the Democratic takeover in Congress but that he hoped new congressional leaders would be as willing to avoid a confrontation on national security as he is. … 'I'm not going to prejudge,' Gonzales said of the possibility of trying to convince the new Congress. 'We are going to work as hard as we can to avoid the kind of crisis you referred to.'" The Post adds, "Gonzales said the Bush administration's anti-terrorism efforts since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks have improved intelligence gathering, especially between nations. … 'The unsung story of this is our relationships with our foreign partners,' Gonzales said. 'The level of cooperation is outstanding, and it's made a big difference now that we are able to analyze plots. We have to be right 100 percent of the time; they (terrorists) only have to be right one time.' … Gonzales also spoke about the issues with security at the Supermax prison in Florence and said he considered the problems 'a priority.'"

Gonzales Says Supermax Prison Is Safe. The Rocky Mountain News (11/21, Burnett) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged today there have been problems at Supermax prison in Florence but said steps have been taken to improve security and make sure the community is safe. … 'I think it's a safe facility,' Gonzales said during a meeting with the Rocky Mountain News editorial board. 'Have mistakes been made? Have there been some problems there? No question about it, like there are at every facility. But we've taken steps to address them.'" The News continues, "Gonzales said the Department of Justice has added 11 new employees at Supermax, and that seven more positions will be filled 'as soon as we can.' The 18 new employees would bring the facility to 208 — still short of the 240 employees it had when the prison opened in 2004." The News adds, "Supermax, the nation's highest-security prison and home to inmates such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, also has addressed problems with inmate mail and phone calls not being monitored, Gonzales said. … He said a 'large portion' of phone calls are being monitored as they occur, and others are recorded and later reviewed by translators. All mail is being viewed, he said. … In September, a Justice Department inspector general's report criticized the prison for not properly screening terrorists' mail and other communications. Gonzales today called that situation 'intolerable' and said steps were taken to correct it."

More Commentary. The Rocky Mountain News (11/21) editorializes, "In a meeting with News editors and writers on Monday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales delivered both good news and bad news about the security of communications flowing to and from inmates at the Supermax lockup in Florence." The News continues, "On the plus side, Gonzales said that every communication with prisoners, by mail or telephone, is now reviewed. Mail is read and telephone messages are either monitored on the spot or recorded and eventually translated. … That's a dramatic improvement. A report by the department's inspector general published earlier this fall found that less than half of inmate phone calls at Supermax were monitored, and during a test period a mere 1.8 percent of mail to and from the prisoners was checked by law enforcement officials." The News adds, "The 'eventually translated' part, however, is the bad news. While the AG asserted that the goal was to monitor all communications in 'real time,' it's not happening now. The Bureau of Prisons lacks enough translators to interpret messages as they come and go. Which means that instructions to terror networks or outside criminal enterprises could be flowing freely for days, weeks or months (more like months, as we'll explain below) before potentially lethal plans are derailed. … Until recently, however, deciphering those messages was a low priority for the feds. The IG report said the FBI attempted to produce translations from intercepted letters within 60 days, which is already far too long. In actuality, it could take between six and 18 months to get a useful translation, the report added. … Given the wide latitude Congress has granted the administration to wage the war on terror, not to mention the expansive surveillance powers the White House has asserted on its own, such delays are indefensible. … In our conversation Monday, Gonzales agreed. But he still needs to push his department to finish the job of ending the security risk at SuperMax."

DOJ_NMG_0096504

Judge Rejects PAWF Request For NSA Documents. The AP (11/21) reports, "The National Security Agency is not required to release details about its secret wiretapping program, a federal judge said Monday." The AP continues, "The People for the American Way Foundation, a liberal advocacy group, sued to obtain records under the Freedom of Information Act. The group sought to find out how many wiretaps were approved and who reviewed the program. … President Bush has acknowledged the existence of the program, which he calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program. The National Security Agency monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the U.S. and people in other countries when a link to terrorism is suspected." The AP notes, "Civil liberties group criticize it as an expansion of presidential power, and a federal judge has said it is unconstitutional. The Justice Department says it is a necessary tool to fight terrorism. … The NSA denied the request for documents, saying the records would jeopardize national security. The advocacy group argued that the law can't be used to protect the government from disclosing details about illegal programs. … U.S. Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle disagreed, saying that even if the program is ultimately determined to be illegal, it doesn't change the fact that the materials are classified and are not covered by the Freedom of Information Act."

Human Rights Groups Back Democrats On Detainee Law Overhaul. The Hill (11/21, Tiron) reports, "Some human-rights groups are hoping that the Democrats' takeover of Congress will provide the necessary momentum to overhaul the controversial new legislation governing military tribunals. One of the groups' main goals is to restore habeas corpus rights to military detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." However, "Senate Democrats could have a tough time gathering enough support to stave off a White House veto. The Senate passed the military commissions bill by a vote of 65 to 34. ... House Democrats may face larger hurdles than their Senate colleagues in trying to change the tribunal legislation. The House passed the Military Commissions Act by a vote of 253 to 168."

WPost Blasts "Alternative" Interrogation Tactics. The Washington Post (11/21, 690K) editorializes, "Magid Khan was one of the al-Qaeda suspects who was detained in a secret prison of the CIA and subjected to 'alternative' interrogation tactics -- the administration's chilling phrase for methods most people regard as torture. Now the government is arguing that by subjecting detainees to such treatment, the CIA gives them 'top secret' classified information -- and the government can then take extraordinary measures to keep them quiet about it. If this argument carries the day, it will make virtually impossible any accountability for the administration's treatment of top al-Qaeda detainees. And it will also ensure that key parts of any military trials get litigated in secrecy."

Reno Joins Other Former DOJ Officials In Challenging Terror Law. The AP (11/21, Apuzzo) reports, "Former Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials filed court papers Monday arguing that the Bush administration is setting a dangerous precedent by trying a suspected terrorist outside the court system." The AP continues, It was the first time that Reno, attorney general in the Clinton administration, has spoken out against the administration's policies on terrorism detainees, underscoring how contentious the court fight over the nation's new military commissions law has become. Former attorneys general rarely file court papers challenging administration policy." The AP adds, "Suspected al-Qaida sleeper agent Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri is the only detainee being held in the United States. … The former prosecutors challenged the Justice Department's right to bring al-Marri before a military commission. … A citizen of Qatar, he was arrested in 2001 while studying in the United States. He had faced criminal charges until authorities designated him an enemy combatant and ordered him held at a naval base in South Carolina." The AP notes, "The Justice Department said in court papers last week that a new anti-terrorism law strips detainees such as al-Marri of the right to challenge their imprisonment in court. … 'The government is essentially asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute those people criminally — perhaps because it would be too difficult to obtain a conviction, perhaps because a motion to suppress evidence would raise embarrassing facts about the government's conduct, or perhaps for other reasons,' the former Justice Department officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0096505

Islamic Charity Distances Itself From Sudanese Group With al-Qaida Links. The AP (11/21, Apuzzo) reports, "A Missouri-based Islamic charity accused of being part of an international terrorist organization tried to distance itself in federal court Monday from a Sudanese group suspected of financing al-Qaida." The AP continues, "The Treasury Department considers the Islamic American Relief Agency, of Columbia, Mo., to be an arm of the Islamic African Relief Agency, a Sudanese group accused of providing financial support to Osama bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas." The AP adds, "The FBI raided the charity's office in Missouri and the homes of people affiliated with the group nationwide. Since then, the 20-year-old charity has been unable to raise money. … Attorney Shereef Hadi Akeel told the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that the charity was not part of the Sudanese group. The organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts, he said. … If the two groups were the same, Akeel said, when the Missouri group wanted to move money into Sudan, it would have simply transferred it. Instead, he said the charity sought U.S. permission." The AP notes, "A federal judge rejected the group's lawsuit in 2005, finding enough evidence to support the Treasury Department's decision. The three-judge appeals panel seemed hesitant to reject that finding Monday, asking few questions and noting that it would need to see clear evidence to overturn the agency's decision. … The Justice Department pointed to the Missouri charity's own tax and corporate documents, which list the charity as a chapter or affiliate of the Sudanese group."

Judge Rules US Not Required To Transfer Detainee For Medical Treatment. The AP (11/20, Apuzzo) reports, "The U.S. military is not required to send a Guantánamo Bay detainee to a civilian hospital for medical treatment, a federal judge said Monday, leaving the prisoner to choose between having a heart procedure performed at the military base or not at all." The AP continues, "Saifullah A. Paracha, a 59-year-old multimillionaire Pakistani businessman and television producer, argued that the procedure was too risky to be handled anywhere but in a cardiac unit. He asked to be transferred to a hospital in the United States or Pakistan. .. .The procedure, called cardiac catheterization, is used to detect heart problems such as blockages. A doctor inserts a plastic tube into a vein and slides it into the heart or nearby coronary arteries to measure blood pressure or oxygen levels. … If something goes wrong, Paracha's attorney said, doctors could need to perform emergency heart surgery." The AP adds, "Doctors successfully completed an identical procedure at Guantánamo Bay in 2003, the Justice Department said. Special medical equipment and personnel were available, attorneys said, making transferring Paracha an unnecessary security risk. … U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman agreed, saying the government regularly decides how best to treat civilian prisoners inside the United States and judges rarely intervene."

Second Man Charged In Hezbollah TV Station Access Case. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/21, Neumeister) reports Saleh Elahwal of Matawan, N.J., "was charged Monday with supporting terrorists by enabling customers to obtain satellite broadcasts of a Hezbollah television station, the second person accused in a case that has drawn scrutiny over how far the government can go in claiming someone is aiding terrorist groups." Elahwal and Javed Iqbal of Staten Island "could each face up to 110 years in prison if they are convicted of all 11 counts in a rewritten indictment unsealed Monday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. They pleaded not guilty." The AP notes, "As part of their probe, FBI agents searched two storefronts in Brooklyn where Iqbal worked and at his residence, where multiple satellite dishes helped him distribute the broadcasts to New York-area customers through a Brooklyn company called HDTV Limited, prosecutors said."

Prodi Sacks Intelligence Chiefs Over Suspected CIA Kidnapping. The Financial Times (11/21, Barber) reports, "Three top intelligence officials were removed on Monday in the most abrupt shake-up of Italy's espionage community since the current structures were established almost 30 years ago. The government of Romano Prodi removed the chief of the national military intelligence agency, whom prosecutors want to put on trial for involvement in the suspected kidnapping by CIA agents of an Egyptian imam in February 2003. It also replaced the head of the domestic secret service and the chief of an intelligence co-ordinating committee that reports to the political authorities. ... Since the creation of Italy's democratic political system in the late 1940s, the intelligence services have played a prominent and often bitterly criticised role in battling home-grown terrorism, of the extreme-left and extreme-right varieties."

DOJ_NMG_0096506

FT Inveighs Against Rendition. The Financial Times (11/21) editorializes about rendition, "a capitulation by liberal societies to their enemies, a surrender of the rule of law to jihadi totalitarianism, to sink into such practices - whatever semantic evasions are used to describe them. As the Financial Times has persistently argued: we should not need to make the case against torture. It is morally depraved. It corrodes the society that condones it. It elicits largely worthless information. ... A start might be made if those high up the chain of command - such as Donald Rumsfeld, the now defenestrated US defence secretary - were called to account for their actions. Italy may have started this process."

Germany Detains Six, Releases Five In Suspected El Al Bomb Plot. The New York Times (11/21, Landler, 1.16M) reports, "German authorities, investigating an alleged plot to hide an explosive device aboard a passenger jet" in Frankfurt "last summer, detained six men on Friday on suspicion of belonging to a terrorist group. All but one of the men was released the following day, the federal prosecutor in Karlsruhe said on Monday. But German authorities said they are investigating additional people whom they believe sought to bribe an employee at Frankfurt Airport to place a bomb aboard the plane in luggage. The plot was in its very early stages, the prosecutor said." The Times notes, "German news organizations…reported that the men were from the Middle East, possibly from Jordan. The newspaper, Die Welt, said on its Web site that the target was the Israeli state airline El Al."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

ACLU To Release Documents Detailing Pentagon Records On Antiwar Groups. The New York Times (11/21, Lichtblau, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports, "An antiterrorist database used by the Defense Department in an effort to prevent attacks against military installations included intelligence tips about antiwar planning meetings held at churches, libraries, college campuses and other locations, newly disclosed documents show." Pentagon Counterintelligence Field Activity Unit Acting Director Daniel J. Baur "said that those operating the database had misinterpreted their mandate and that what was intended as an antiterrorist database became, in some respects, a catch-all for leads on possible disruptions and threats against military installations in the United States, including protests against the military presence in Iraq. … Once the problem was discovered, he said, 'we fixed it,' and more than 180 entries in the database related to war protests were deleted from the system last year." However, the ACLU plans to release documents today which detail the data that was collected, "and officials with the group said they would push for Democrats, newly empowered in Congress, to hold formal hearings about the Talon database."

Six Imams Removed From US Flight. The AP (11/21, Karnowski) reports, "Six Muslim imams were removed from a US Airways flight at Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport on Monday and questioned by police for several hours before being released, a leader of the group said. … A passenger initially raised concerns about the group through a note passed to a flight attendant, according to Andrea Rader, a spokeswoman for US Airways. She said police were called after the captain and airport security workers asked the men to leave the plane and the men refused. 'They took us off the plane, humiliated us in a very disrespectful way,' said Omar Shahin, of Phoenix." The imams "were returning from a conference in Minneapolis of the North American Imams Federation, said Shahin, president of the group." Shahin said that "three of them stood and said their normal evening prayers together on the plane," and "he attributed any concerns by passengers or crew to ignorance about Islam." The AP notes, "Shahin said they went as far as notifying police and the FBI about their meeting in advance."

Hawley Urges Travelers To Learn Rules Before Going To The Airport. TSA chief Kip Hawley, in an op-ed in USA Today (11/21, 21A, 2.27M) writes that the TSA's "primary mission is to ensure the security of air travel. … TSA and our partners in law enforcement, airlines and airports handle the security work, but we also depend on travelers to be active participants by being prepared when they arrive at the airport." Hawley continues that air travelers "can have a huge impact in making the process go smoothly and quickly for everyone" if they spend a minute learning "the rules before going to the airport (www.TSA.gov)." Meanwhile, security officers are doing "a demanding job," and checkpoints are "not the place to debate the merits of various security measures."

DOJ_NMG_0096507

Meanwhile, in an editorial under the headline "Fliers Aren't Giving Thanks For Fickle TSA Rules, Screeners," USA Today (11/21, 21A, 2.27M) offers a warning for those planning to fly this Thanksgiving week: "Be prepared. Since a plot to bomb jetliners with liquid explosives was broken up in London last August, flying has proved a little less convenient and a lot more confusing." USA Today says the rules, which were relaxed in September, have become "so complicated that they aren't applied consistently." After providing examples of inconsistent carry-on rules, USA Today writes, "While TSA screeners must make judgment calls — and fliers must comply — screeners should be reading from the same playbook, and that playbook needs to be simple enough that it's easily understood. It isn't." USA Today states that "whether everyone is ready for the busiest travel weekend of the year is very much in doubt. Passengers and screeners alike will have to give a little."

Poster Advises Screeners On Dealing With Daggers Worn By Sikhs. The Washington Post (11/21, A6, Boorstein, 690K) reports a "centuries-old requirement" that Sikhs "always wear a dagger" has "collided with beefed-up, post-Sept. 11 rules that no longer allow people to leave legal weapons and other banned items with security guards working in such buildings as courthouses and federal offices. … In an effort to bridge the culture-security gap, the Homeland Security Department and the Sikh legal group yesterday unveiled a poster meant to help screeners through these interactions." The poster advises screeners to be respectful when asking "if a Sikh is carrying a kirpan" and to "handle the kirpan with respect and care" if it must be confiscated.

Pentagon Delays Chemical Weapons Destruction. The USA Today (11/21, Eisler, 2.27M) reports, "The Pentagon has extended its timeline to destroy its aging chemical weapons arsenal until 2023, despite concerns by Congress and watchdog groups that the stockpiles raise the risk of an accident or theft by terrorists." The new schedule "means the military won't eliminate its stocks of deadly nerve gases and skin-blistering agents until 11 years after the 2012 deadline set by the international Chemical Weapons Convention." Pentagon spokesman Chris Isleib said the delay "is the result of several factors, including technological challenges in developing and building disposal plants, regulatory delays, and safety and security issues." Critics said "the plan to slow spending and stretch construction at the remaining disposal plants will raise costs and create needless risks of an accidental chemical release or terrorist attack."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says He Hasn't Decided On Changes To Iraq Strategy. The Financial Times (11/21, Sevastopulo) reports, "George W. Bush said he had made no decisions on altering troop numbers in Iraq on Monday following reports that the Pentagon was considering a temporary boost to curb sectarian violence in Baghdad. … 'I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases,' Mr Bush said in Indonesia." The AP (11/21, Hunt) notes that "asked specifically whether there were any risks in increasing US troops," Bush said, "There's no need to comment on something that may not happen. But if it were to happen, I will tell you the upsides and downside."

Bush's comments in Indonesia are being reported in the context of a story in yesterday's Washington Post. That story, which outlined three possible Pentagon strategies for Iraq, sparked extensive media commentary last night and this morning – much of it highly negative. NBC Nightly News (11/20, lead story, 3;10, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the "apparent leak from inside the Pentagon has revealed what appear to be the three possible options for the US in Iraq." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "As outlined first by the Washington Post, the options reportedly include go big: A large increase in US forces to try to bring down the level of violence, rejected by senior military officials who say that could take several hundred thousand more troops and the military's already stretched too thin. Go home: The rapid withdrawal of American forces, rejected because it could ignite a full-blown civil war. The most viable option: Go long a compromise that would temporarily increase the US force by 20,000 to 30,000 troops to try to quell the violence, then gradually reduce the total force from 140,000 troops now to 60,000 who could remain in Iraq for five to 10 years." But "military experts contend even a temporary increase in troops will not change the course of the war." General Barry McCaffrey (ret): "I think the notion of bubbling up 20,000 to 40,000 US forces to demonstrate our political will before we do the drawdown is nonsense." NBC added "senior Pentagon and military officials aren't putting much stock in these specific three options laid out publicly, saying that if that's the best we can do, we're in brig trouble."

DOJ_NMG_0096508

The CBS Evening News (11/20, story 5, 2:10, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "A team of military advisors has developed one option which includes a temporary troop buildup as prelude to the start of a withdrawal. A measure of the quandary the Bush Administration faces, that was rejected just last week by the top military commander for Iraq." General John Abizaid, Commander US forces: "I do not believe that more American troops right now is the solution to the problem." CBS (Couric) continued, "Meanwhile…I know Henry Kissinger weighed in on the BBC today and he wasn't very optimistic, either."

Fox News' Special Report (11/20, Hume) noted "the option the Pentagon is calling 'go big,' a short-term increase in troops, is favored by Sen. John McCain among others." Sen. McCain: "No, we're not winning in Iraq. That's why we have to have more troops there and we have to do it quickly."

The New York Times (11/21, Cloud, 1.16M) says "Pentagon officials conducting a review of Iraq strategy are considering a substantial but temporary increase in American troop levels and the addition of several thousand more trainers to work with Iraqi forces, a senior Defense Department official said Monday. The idea, dubbed the 'surge option' by some officials, would involve increasing American forces by 20,000 troops or more for several months in the hope of improving security, especially in Baghdad." That "would mark a sharp rise over the current baseline of 144,000 troops." But "some officials and senior military officers are arguing against the idea, saying that it could undercut a sense of urgency for Iraqi units to take on a greater role in fighting the insurgency and preventing sectarian attacks."

The Washington Post (11/21, A23, Fletcher, 690K) reports, "Even with the endorsement of a Pentagon panel, or that of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), any increase in troops would be controversial, particularly because Democrats in recent months campaigned on the need for a plan to decrease US exposure in the country."

McClatchy (11/21, Hutcheson) reports, "Of the three obvious options -- sending significantly more US troops to Iraq, staying the course or withdrawing immediately - only one has much support, however." The US "doesn't have enough troops to increase its presence significantly, and there's wide agreement that a hasty retreat would only leave a bigger mess. So support is coalescing around alterations to the current strategy, perhaps adding 20,000 to 50,000 more troops for a limited time, then beginning a drawdown."

The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A6, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports, "Both supporters and opponents of the war agree there are few easy -- or bloodless -- ways of winding down the troubled US effort. Leading Democrats have rallied around a proposal from Michigan Sen. Carl Levin that calls for beginning troop withdrawal within four to six months. A rising number of Republicans also have begun arguing US forces should start returning home next year."

USA Today (11/21, Kelley, Slavin, 2.27M), under the headline "Bush Pressured To Come Up With New Iraq Strategy," says "increased pressure from Congress and high level studies commissioned by the Pentagon and the White House are prodding President Bush to significantly change strategy in Iraq for the first time since the war began in March 2003."

Obama Calls For Regional Dialogue, Troop Reduction. The Chicago Tribune (11/21, Parsons, Mendell, 617K) reports, "Amid intense speculation about whether he will run for president, Sen. Barack Obama on Monday used the spotlight to showcase his strategy for the war in Iraq, excoriating the Bush administration for its 'misguided' war and describing a solution that includes dialogue with hostile nations in the region." In his speech to the Chicago Council on Global Affairs, Obama "said the US should end its 'coddling' of the Iraqi government by beginning a reduction of troops in the next four to six months and pressuring Iraqis to work out agreements among their warring factions." The senator offered "few new specifics." The AP (11/21, Bellandi) also says Obama "was careful not to set a specific timetable for withdrawal of troops or suggest troop levels."

The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Huffstutter, 850K) notes Obama also "criticized President Bush for pushing forward with a war that 'would require an occupation of undetermined length, at undetermined cost, with undetermined consequences.'"

More Commentary. On the CBS Evening News (11/20, story 6, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M), NYTimes columnist

DOJ_NMG_0096509

Thomas Friedman said, "I'm rather despondent that anything can really solve the situation in Iraq right now." Iraq "is so broken…that it can't even have a proper civil war. It's so broken. You know, to have a proper civil war, you need two sides, basically. There are now 15 sides there." He added, "Our choice in Iraq is…ten weeks or ten years. That is, either we're going to conclude this thing is so broken and therefore we're just going to have to get out -- or we're going to say this thing is so broken we basically have to start over. And that is a ten-year project. Because the idea that there's some kind of middle ground where we kind of stand up the Iraqi army and then we kind of quietly leave, I think that's an illusion."

In his Washington Post (11/21, 690K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "Defections, recrimination and finger-pointing among the people who got us into this mess provide an amusing sideshow. But the main event is the mandate that midterm voters imposed this month, in no uncertain terms: Find a way out. ... If American troops begin pulling out tomorrow, Iraq surely will suffer a terrible spasm of bloody violence. But if we wait a year and then pull out, there is no reason to expect any different outcome."

In his Washington Post (11/21, 690K) column, Richard Cohen writes, "As with Vietnam, we are fighting now merely not to lose -- to avoid a full-fledged civil war (it's coming anyway) or to keep the country together, something like that. But not for victory. Not for democracy. ... This, above all, is how Iraq is like Vietnam: older men asking younger men to die while they try to figure something out."

Wolf, Rice Were Early Supporters Of Iraq Study Group Proposal. The Washington Post 911/21, A25, Layton) reports, "On his third trip to Iraq, in September 2005, Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) knew the American mission was imperiled. … That's when" Wolf "first began to think about the need for 'fresh eyes' to scrutinize U.S. policy regarding Iraq. Quietly, he went to the White House and presented his plan: a bipartisan commission of well-respected policymakers to bore deeply into the Iraq dilemma and recommend solutions." According to the Post, "The result is the Iraq Study Group, though "initially, the White House was cool to the idea, Wolf said. But he was able to win over Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld followed, as did national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. 'Rice's support was key,' Wolf said. 'But I had to have the support of everybody or there would be no way to do this.'

Cost Of Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan Nears $500 Billion. The Christian Science Monitor (11/21, Grier, 59K) reports, "The cost of combat in Iraq has now surpassed $300 billion, according to government estimates. Add in activities in Afghanistan, and the total price of the global war on terror is about $500 billion, making it one of the most monetarily costly conflicts in which the nation has ever engaged. Now the Department of Defense is in the process of drawing up its follow-on request for the remainder of FY 2007. Reports indicate that the Pentagon could ask for $120 billion to $160 billion, which would be its largest funding request yet for the global war on terror." The Monitor notes, "Before the invasion of Iraq, the White House estimated that combat operations there would cost about $50 billion. … Three years later, Iraq alone is costing the US some $8 billion a month."

UK Think Tank Predicts War On Terror Will Continue For Thirty More Years. AFP (11/21) reports, "The fight against terrorism could last 30 years or more, according to a report published by a British think tank that specialises in international security. 'There is every prospect of the 'war on terror' extending for 30 years or more,' said the report by the Oxford Research Group. … 'Most people believe that the recent elections mark the beginning of the end of the Bush era but that does not apply to the war on terror,' said Professor Paul Rogers, who wrote the report, in a statement. 'In reality there will be little change until the United States faces up to the need for a fundamental re-think of its policies'."

Iraqi President To Hold Talks With Iranian, Syrian Leaders. USA Today/AP (11/21) reports, "Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad invited his Iraqi and Syrian counterparts to a weekend summit in Tehran to tackle the chaos in Iraq, Iraqi lawmakers said Monday." Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's spokesman Kamaran Qaradaghi "said in a statement late Monday that the Tehran meeting will include Talabani and Ahmadinejad. He said Syrian President Bashar Assad would not attend, but that Talabani had accepted an invitation to meet with Assad in Damascus. No date was set." The AP adds, "A close parliamentary associate of Talabani told the Associated Press that the summit represents an attempt by Tehran to strengthen its position in the region and prevent the United States from dividing Syria, a predominantly Sunni Arab country, from its ally of convenience, Shiite Iran. The associate spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with the media."

DOJ_NMG_0096510

The State Department "reacted with skepticism about Iran's intentions in Iraq, but said it was up to Iraq. 'It's their call,' spokesman Tom Casey said in Washington. 'We have seen statements like this many times,' and there have been several high-level contacts between Iran and Iraq, Casey said. But Iran's statements of a desire to reduce violence in Iraq "have not been backed up by facts," he said."

The New York Times (11/21, Tavernise, 1.16M) notes Baghdad "re-established diplomatic relations with Syria on Monday, agreeing to restore an embassy in Baghdad after more than 20 years with no formal avenues of communication." The Times adds, "As the United States undertakes a broad review of its role in Iraq, the neighboring countries of Iran, Turkey and Syria have stepped forward to try to position themselves in case of a major change in policy, leading to a recent flurry of diplomatic efforts. The countries are also concerned about the possibility of a political collapse as the Iraqi government sinks into paralysis with its two main sects stuck in a deadlock."

ABC World News (11/20, lead story, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M) refers to "a move with potentially stunning implications." Fareed Zakaria, ABC News consultant, said, "What Iran is saying to Iraq is, "Look, if you want stability in your country, you think we can help you. Don't go through Washington, come directly to us.'" ABC (Karl) said, "It's a move designed to limit US influence in the region." Zakaria: "It's a very clever move on Iran's part."

NBC Nightly News (11/20, story 2, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "It's clear that Iran and Syria are already adjusting to the new reality in the Middle East: That Iraq has collapsed, that there is potential for oil development, there's a potential to contain the situation within Iraq. The US helped create this situation by launching the war and now has backed away and is not really engaged in any kind of diplomatic process at all. The US must get engaged very quickly, it seems, or Iran and Syria are simply going to redefine the region according to their own terms."

The CBS Evening News (11/20, story 4, 1:00, Palmer, 7.66M) said "a pledge of help has come to the increasingly desperate Iraqi government directly from the Syrians and it's considered a diplomatic breakthrough."

The Washington Post (11/21, A23, Trejos, 690K) says Damascus and Tehran "have offered to help bring stability to Iraq's fractured government, but the Bush administration has long-standing concerns about Iran's support for Shiite Muslim militias and Syria's failure to stop foreign fighters from joining the Iraqi insurgency."

The Financial Times (11/21, Negus, Smyth, Dombey) reports UK sources indicate "Iran was keen to host three-way talks, but Iraqi sources said there were no plans for such a meeting." Some analysts believe Tehran "is trying to ensure that it has the capacity to cause severe problems for US forces in Iraq as a possible deterrent to US-led military efforts against its own territory."

The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Moore, 850K) reports Syria "has served as an entry point and refuge for Sunni Arab insurgents who have waged a steady stream of attacks on US forces and the fledgling Iraqi government since the American-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. Iran, a Shiite Muslim nation, holds strong sway over the Shiite militias that have increasingly attacked Iraq's minority Sunnis in retaliation." However, says the Washington Times (11/21, Sands, 88K), "there has been intense speculation about a change of course in Washington since the midterm elections and about the pending report from an independent panel looking into US alternatives in Iraq." The State Department "said yesterday the United States did not feel 'snubbed' in being excluded from the Tehran gathering, and that it was up to Iraq to determine its relations with its neighbors."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, 850K) editorializes, "Iran has invited top Iraqi and Syrian leaders to Tehran this weekend, but there are no Americans on the guest list. The omission is hardly a snub -- US diplomats probably wouldn't have much fun there anyway --- but the talks underline the absurdity of the White House position, which is essentially to wait for a bipartisan commission to give it permission to sit down with some friends and enemies. Regional discussions about the future of Iraq are already happening. The US should send out some invitations of its own." President Bush "need not wait for the release of a commission report to convene a conference and invite all of the key players in Iraq's future: Iraq, Iran, Syria, Turkey, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, as well as representatives of the Gulf Coordination Council, the European Union and the UN Agreeing on a mutual duty to respect and uphold Iraq's territorial integrity would be the first goal."

In an op-ed for USA Today (11/21, 2.27M) Wesley Clark, former Supreme Commander of NATO, writes, "Instead of cutting and running or staying the course, it is time for us to begin to redeploy. The right approach is a coordinated diplomatic, legal, economic and security campaign drawing upon broader dialogue in the region and intensified political work inside Iraq. Here is how to do this…begin talks within Iraq, and with all its neighbors, based on a clear set of principles outlined by the team. The goal would be to seek the commitments necessary to achieve our aims inside Iraq and also advance U.S. interests in the region. … A permanent Gulf regional security dialogue could emerge that includes Syria and Iran, and the United States could undertake a role as regional security guarantor. Preliminary discussions should lead to a more intensive dialogue with Iran in which security assurances and nuclear programs are discussed."

DOJ_NMG_0096511

In a column titled "Syria Lends A Hand," Bret Stephens writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/21, A17, 2.04M), "At a simplistic level, the argument is: Where's the harm in talking? Oddly, the people who say this about Syria rarely make it in connection to, say, al Qaeda. A more sophisticated view is that the administration is anyway not seriously interested in overthrowing Mr. Assad -- the Muslim Brotherhood might well end up taking over -- so it will need carrots as well as sticks to improve his behavior. The largest of those carrots, supposedly, is a promise not to seek regime change; another is to abandon the cause of a truly independent Lebanon; a third is to lean on Israel to abandon the Golan Heights in return for a peace treaty. In exchange, it is hoped, Damascus will start playing a constructive role in Lebanon, abandon its support for terrorist groups in Iraq and Palestine, and begin to step away from its alliance with Iran." Stephens adds, "In the summer of 2005, a senior administration official smugly noted that the Syrian regime was sinking on its own weight, as if on quicksand. Now the countries have traded places, and some would urge the administration to grasp the offered hand of the likes of Mr. Moallem. They should consider what that hand has done, and whether it will pull us up -- or sink us."

Dick Morris writes in The Hill (11/21), "A consensus seems to be developing that only a 'regional solution' embracing Iran and Syria can extract the United States from Iraq without jeopardy to those who have stood with us and without damage to both our reputation and Bush's place in history. But at what price? Nobody seems willing to say what 'engagement' with Iran for a regional solution would entail. We cannot ask Iran's help while we bomb its nuclear reactors or impose tough sanctions on the country." Morris adds, "The price of Iranian cooperation will be complicity in Tehran's nuclear ambitions. Iran will gladly assure Bush it does not intend to develop an atomic weapon. But we shouldn't believe it." Israel "will have only one course -- to bomb Iran in hope of delaying its acquisition of nuclear weapons. … An Israeli strike would produce waves of nationalist sentiment in Iran and inflame Arab hatred of the Jewish state. It is precisely what we don't need now in the Middle East."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/21, 1.16M) Mark Moyar, an associate professor at the United States Marine Corps University, writes, "Iraq's prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, is now saying that he wants the United States to stand back and let him use Iraqi forces to restore order. Within six months, he asserts, the bloodletting will cease. The United States must give this proposal very serious consideration. Critics of America's current Iraq policy, particularly among the Congressional Democrats, have tended to concentrate on international diplomatic remedies. Experience, however, suggest that only the Iraqis themselves can end the chaos and violence." Moyar goes on to draw parallels between present-day Iraq and Vietnam in the mid fifties. According to Moyar, "South Vietnam's history recommends the pursuit of two objectives that American officials are now urging upon Prime Minister Maliki: subduing the Shiite militias and transferring control of the police from Shiite partisans to Iraqi nationalists."

Army's Effort To Train Iraqi Forces Reportedly Beset By Setbacks. The Washington Post (11/21, A1, Ricks, 690K) reports, "The U.S. military's effort to train Iraqi forces has been rife with problems, from officers being sent in with poor preparation to a lack of basic necessities such as interpreters and office materials, according to internal Army documents. … A Pentagon effort to rethink policies in Iraq is likely to suggest placing less emphasis on combat and more on training and advising, sources say. In dozens of official interviews compiled by the Army for its oral history archives, officers who had been involved in training and advising Iraqis bluntly criticized almost every aspect of the effort. Some officers thought that team members were often selected poorly. Others fretted that the soldiers who prepared them had never served in Iraq and lacked understanding of the tasks of training and advising. Many said they felt insufficiently supported by the Army while in Iraq, with intermittent shipments of supplies and interpreters who often did not seem to understand English. The Iraqi officers interviewed by an Army team also had complaints; the top one was that they were being advised by officers far junior to them who had never seen combat." The

DOJ_NMG_0096512

Post adds, "Despite its central role in Iraq, the training and advisory program is not well understood outside narrow military circles. Congress has hardly examined it. … The Army has done some studies but has not released them. Even basic information, such as how many of the 5,000 U.S. military personnel involved are from the National Guard and Reserves, is unusually difficult to obtain."

US Advised To Embed More Combat Advisors Into Iraqi Battalions. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) Hans Binnendijk, a professor at National Defense University, and author Bing West write, "The reassessment of U.S. strategy in Iraq should radically alter the combat mission of the American troops serving there. The key policy change is to embed five times as many U.S. combat advisers into Iraqi battalions. This will, on the one hand, reduce the size and casualties of U.S. forces, and on the other, strengthen the Iraqi army -- the only institution that can stop the creeping civil war. … Currently the U.S. has about a dozen military advisers working in each Iraqi battalion. These advisers spend their time as managers. They are too few to give combat advice and moral reassurance out on the streets during daily operations."

More Than 1200 Iraqi Civilians Have Been Killed This Month. The AP (11/21, Wagner) reports, "In all, 25 Iraqis were killed Monday in a series of attacks in Baghdad, Ramadi and Baqouba, police said. The bodies of 75 Iraqis who had been kidnapped and tortured also were found on the streets of the capital, in Dujail to the north of Baghdad and in the Tigris River in southern Iraq. The Iraqi death toll this month is already well above the 1,216 who died in all of October, which had been the deadliest month in Iraq since the AP began its count. The actual totals are likely considerably higher because many deaths are not reported. Victims in those cases are quickly buried according to Muslim custom and never reach morgues or hospitals to be counted."

Prominent Iraqi Television Personality Killed. The Washington Post (11/21, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "For the last three years, Walid Hassan had an impossible task. He had to make war-weary Iraqis laugh. Week after week, the comedian and broadcaster found inspiration in the turmoil and bloodletting. On his weekend television show, 'Caricature,' he poked fun at the poor security, the long gas lines, the electricity blackouts and the ineffective politicians. … On Monday, Hassan, 47, a father of five children, became a victim of the war and chaos from which he drew his inspiration. A Shiite Muslim, he was found in the majority-Sunni neighborhood of Yarmouk in west Baghdad with multiple bullet wounds to his back and head, according to police." The Post notes that Hassan, "who also produced a political show, was the latest casualty in the Iraqi media world. … So far, 133 reporters, cameramen and other media workers have been killed in Iraq, the vast majority of them Iraqi, according to Reporters Without Borders."

Pro-Saddam TV Station Reemerges After Being Banned. McClatchy (11/21, Allam) report, "When Iraqi government officials pulled the plug on al Zawraa TV earlier this month, they thought they'd finally stamped out a channel known for reporting live from 'occupied Baghdad' and declaring Saddam Hussein's death sentence 'a sad day for Iraq.' Two weeks later, however, the Sunni-owned station is back, and bloodier than ever. … Saddam-era martial music boomed as an insurgent video montage began: a sniper hitting an American soldier snacking on a sandwich, a U.S. Humvee bursting into flames as it hit a roadside bomb, Sunni Muslim militants vowing to overthrow Shiite leaders who are portrayed as agents of Iran." Al Zawraa "is the station of choice for nostalgic Baathists, militant Islamists, Iran-hating Sunnis and anti-American Arab nationalists. Driven underground by a court order on Nov. 5, the day Saddam was sentenced to death, the satellite news channel has re-emerged in recent days, broadcasting from an unknown location and devoid of any pretense of neutrality." Al Zawraa "was launched in November 2005, the brainchild of Mishaan al Jubouri, a Sunni member of the Iraqi parliament who fled to Syria recently amid allegations of corruption." Jubouri "said the new pro-resistance format has increased the number of viewers '100 times over.'"

Blair Meets With Karzai In Kabul, Visits British Troops. The AP (11/21, Stringer) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair visited Afghanistan and met with President Hamid Karzai "following a visit to meet hundreds of troops in the country's restive southern Helmand province — a former Taliban stronghold and hub of Afghanistan's heroin trade. Blair paid tribute to the troops at Camp Bastion — Britain's main southern base." The AP notes, "The visit was the British leader's first to Afghanistan since 2002. Britain has around 6,000 soldiers deployed in Afghanistan." The AP adds, "A total of 41 British soldiers have died in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 — including 36 killed since Britain's deployment to Helmand province in July, Blair's office said." The Washington Times/AP (11/21, Stringer) reports Blair "pledged his nation's commitment in Afghanistan 'for as long as it takes,' telling British soldiers fighting the resurgent Taliban that success would help establish global security."

DOJ_NMG_0096513

Taliban Reportedly Reliant On Profits From Opium Production. The Christian Science Monitor (11/21, Peters, 59K) reports, "As Afghanistan's narcotics trade explodes past $3 billion a year, there is concern that the Taliban is becoming another FARC, Colombia's notorious leftist insurgent group that draws much of its funding from the drug trade. The Taliban and FARC - the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia - both got their start protecting peasants from corrupt governments. There's evidence both initially fought narcotics traffic but then levied taxes on the trade for much-needed cash. … Evidence is growing that the Taliban and their allies are moving beyond taxing the trade to protecting opium shipments, running heroin labs, and even organizing farm output in areas they control. 'It's reached the point where about half of the opium we seize in the provinces has some link to the Taliban,' says Gen. Ali Shah Paktiawal, director of the anticriminal branch of the Kabul police." The Monitor notes, "Many experts believe the Taliban has always been dependent on the poppy trade. Declassified US State Department records show that two major narcotraffickers now in US custody, Baz Mohammed and Bashir Noorzai, sat on the original five-member Taliban shura, or leadership council.

DOJ:

GAO Finds DOJ Making Progress On Information Classification. Federal Computer Week (11/21) reports, "A report from the Government Accountability Office says the Justice Department has significantly improved the way it handles classified information, but the agency has not corrected one of the most glaring problems: staff shortages." FCW continues, "Increased staffing was one of the recommendations made by the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which reviewed security procedures at DOJ in July 2004 and April 2005. GAO was brought in this year to assess how well DOJ and its FBI component were following the recommendations. … The agencies have made a lot of progress in a lot of areas, according to GAO's report. 'DOJ, however, has taken no action on the most important recommendation, addressing staff shortages, which continue to place its program at risk,' the document states." FCW adds, "Justice said it does not have the resources to address the staff shortages, according to the report. The department said it 'is trying to address its resources constraints, a longstanding problem that GAO identified as early as 1993, by requesting additional funds from an administrative account in fiscal year 2007.' … But Justice officials acknowledged they do not know precisely how many new employees they would need because they have not fully assessed those needs, the report said. 'It also does not have a strategy that identifies how it will use additional resources to address remaining deficiencies,' the report added. … Justice had taken action on five of 10 recommendations, 'including fixing problems with outdated and insufficient training and insufficient monitoring of components' programs,' GAO said. … The report found that five department components — the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Criminal Division; the Drug Enforcement Administration; the FBI; and the U.S. Marshals Service — were experiencing problems designating sensitive but unclassified information."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Drops Appeal Of Lay Ruling. The Houston Chronicle (11/21, Hays) reports, "Federal prosecutors on Monday had this to say about their intent to challenge a judge's decision to wipe out former Enron Chairman Ken Lay's convictions: Never mind." The Chronicle continues, "Last week the Justice Department filed notice it would appeal U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's October decision to clear Lay's name. That filing came the same day two senators introduced a bill to allow crime victims to seek restitution when a convicted defendant dies before exhausting appeals. … Lake had based his ruling on precedent set by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — the same court that would have heard a challenge. But prosecutors filed court papers Monday that said the government would withdraw its appeal notice." The Chronicle adds, "Monday's filing explained that last week's action came as the deadline for filing notice of appeal was about to expire. … Even though the Justice Department acknowledged helping draft the proposed legislation, prosecutors said in Monday's filing that last week's move was "protective" to ensure they met the deadline and could then review the bill to determine if it could help support an appeal. … 'Having concluded that review, the government now moves to withdraw its notice of appeal,' the filing said."

DOJ_NMG_0096514

Cyberonics Head Resigns Amid Expanding Options Probe. The New York Times (11/21, Feder) reports, "The tumultuous tenure of Robert P. Cummins as chairman, president and chief executive of the medical device maker Cyberonics has ended, the company disclosed yesterday." The Times continues, "Mr. Cummins, 52, who is known as Skip, is a former venture capitalist who joined the board of Cyberonics in 1988 and became chief executive in 1995. He gained a reputation as one of nation's most passionate and intimidating business leaders in dealing with critics, regulators and investors." The Times adds, "Mr. Cummins had been under growing pressure since questions arose in June about the timing of stock options for 100,000 shares that were granted to him in 2004 just hours after a regulatory panel recommended approval of a Cyberonics implant to treat depression. Although none of the options vested immediately, their potential value soared when trading in the stock resumed the next day. … Scrutiny of the timing of the 2004 options grant expanded into internal and government investigations of whether Cyberonics was among the scores of technology companies that improperly manipulated options grants to ensure that executives would profit from them. … Cyberonics stock, which has been battered by the accounting questions and by the company's problems getting insurance coverage for its depression implant, soared yesterday after the company disclosed before trading began that Mr. Cummins resigned on Friday. The shares climbed as high as $26.45 before retreating to close at $24.17, up 12 percent for the day."

USA Today (11/21, Smith, 2.27M) reports, "A USA TODAY investigation reveals that Cyberonics' board has engaged in a series of questionable practices to reward Cummins, certain directors and some executives with stock and options almost from its inception as a public company in February 1993. Among its practices, the company frequently issued stock options just before market-moving events that insiders participated in, including merger talks, regulatory milestones and earnings advisories. It also repeatedly issued options at the lowest or second-lowest monthly trading price, SEC filings show. On one occasion, management, including Cummins, and a director who serves on the compensation committee, bought company stock at a discounted price in which Cummins represented himself both as the CEO selling the shares and as an individual buying them."

Former Capital One CFO Settles Insider Trading Charges For $1.8 Million. The Washington Post (11/21, D01, Hilzenrath) reports, "A former chief financial officer of credit card issuer Capital One Financial Corp. agreed to pay more than $1.8 million to settle insider trading charges, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday." The Post continues, "David M. Willey was accused of exercising Capital One stock options and cashing in shares after learning in 2002 that a regulatory examination of the company was likely to end unfavorably. After the results of the examination were made public, Capital One's stock price plunged by about 40 percent." The Post adds, "Without admitting or denying wrongdoing, Willey agreed to give up $801,434 in alleged ill-gotten gains, plus $218,180 in interest and a penalty of $801,434. The SEC dismissed a related claim against Willey's wife, Joy S. Willey, a former Capital One vice president. The agency had previously named her as a defendant alleging that some of the proceeds of the insider trading were in her possession. … Willey, who joined McLean-based Capital One in 1989, earned more than $1.2 million in salary and bonus in 2001, according to a company report. … The following year, Federal Reserve examiners found serious management problems in areas under his authority, the SEC alleged in a 2004 complaint. The lead examiner told Willey of the Fed's concerns in a private meeting and warned that they could lead to formal supervisory action, the complaint said."

South Korean Prosecutors Indict Lone Star, KEB On Stock-Manipulation Charges. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A3, Santini, Yoon) reports, "South Korean prosecutors indicted Dallas private-equity firm Lone Star Funds and Korea Exchange Bank on stock-manipulation charges related to the bank's credit-card unit, part of a nine-month investigation that the U.S. firm has blamed on antiforeign sentiment in Korea." The Journal continues, "The chief prosecutor in the case, Chae Dong Wook, vowed to continue a separate probe into whether Lone Star illegally purchased the bank in 2003. Prosecutors have been examining whether government and bank officials conspired to understate KEB's financial health when Lone Star acquired control of the bank. Lone Star's role in that transaction is also under scrutiny." The Journal adds, "Korean lawmakers have threatened to nullify Lone Star's original purchase of KEB if wrongdoing is discovered, jeopardizing a $7 billion sale of the firm's controlling stake to Korea's Kookmin Bank that would secure a $4.5 billion profit for Lone Star. … In recent months, prosecutors have turned their focus to KEB's credit-card unit, leading some foreign investors watching the investigation to speculate that the prosecution had reached an impasse with the broader probe into the KEB purchase. Regarding KEB itself, prosecutors still haven't provided any evidence of wrongdoing by Lone Star in the transaction. … Last week, the Korean court issued arrest warrants for Lone Star's vice chairman, Ellis Short, and Michael Thomson, the firm's general counsel. Both men have refused to travel to Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0096515

Coehlo's Stock Options Draw SEC Scrutiny. USA Today (11/21, Smith, 2.27M) reports, "Former U.S. congressman Tony Coelho received below-market stock options from Cyberonics in early 1994, three years before he joined the board, at a much deeper discount to the market price than the company's stock-option plan provided for at the time, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings. On Monday, Coelho was named chairman of the medical device maker after its former chairman and CEO, Robert Cummins, resigned under pressure." USA Today notes Coelho "resigned from Congress in June 1989 after failing to disclose on his congressional financial statement a 'junk' bond investment he had obtained on favorable terms. In recent years, Coelho and Appel cashed out their below-market options from Cyberonics at different times, reaping nearly $1.1 million in combined profits, SEC filings show. … Cyberonics is now under investigation by the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan, which are looking into the company's history of awarding lucrative stock options to company officers and directors."

Redstone's Nephew Sues Over Family Trust Management. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, B5, Angwin) reports, "Viacom Inc. Chairman Sumner Redstone, already facing a lawsuit from his son, now faces a suit from his nephew who claims he and other family heirs were bilked out of an approximately $4 billion stake in the Redstone family's business empire." The Journal continues, "The suit, coming nine months after Mr. Redstone's son Brent filed suit against his father seeking to gain direct control of the son's personal stake in the empire, is likely to add to questions about the strength of Sumner Redstone's hold on Viacom and CBS Corp., both of which are controlled by the Redstone family." The Journal adds, "In a lawsuit filed in a Massachusetts court this month, Michael Redstone alleges his father Edward Redstone and his uncle Sumner Redstone engaged in 'self-dealing,' 'breaches of fiduciary duty' and 'unjust enrichment as trustees of certain Redstone family trusts' when they bought his stake and that of other heirs in the family company, National Amusements Inc., in a series of transactions in 1972 and 1984. … Michael Redstone's suit against his father, uncle and the family company is joined by the trustees for trusts representing his late sister Ruth Ann and a trust set up for the four children of Edward Redstone and Sumner Redstone -- Michael, Ruth Ann, Brent and Shari. Michael Redstone and the trustees are asking for the 1972 and 1984 transactions to be rescinded or for damages 'in an amount equal to the present value of those shares.' … In a statement, National Amusements called the allegations 'baseless' and said it would defend itself vigorously."

Insiders Made Millions Trading In Money-Losing Firm's Stock. USA Today (11/21, Smith) reports, "Cyberonics said Monday that its chief executive and chief financial officer had resigned after an internal investigation found that unnamed insiders had incorrectly reported the dates of company stock options for years." USA continues, "Cyberonics general counsel David Wise said in a filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission that the company had under-reported its executive compensation expense by about $10 million and would have to restate its financial statements going back to 1999. … The company's disclosures came at a time when one of the biggest financial scandals in years is sweeping U.S. corporate boardrooms. Federal authorities are examining at least 130 companies to determine whether insiders manipulated options-award dates to illegally profit from market gains, principally by backdating the options to an earlier date than issued to give themselves a head start on rising prices. To date, dozens of companies have announced executive departures or restatements after internal investigations. Two criminal cases are pending." USA notes, "A USA TODAY investigation reveals that Cyberonics' board has engaged in a series of questionable practices to reward Cummins, certain directors and some executives with stock and options almost from its inception as a public company in February 1993. Among its practices, the company frequently issued stock options just before market-moving events that insiders participated in, including merger talks, regulatory milestones and earnings advisories. It also repeatedly issued options at the lowest or second-lowest monthly trading price, SEC filings show. On one occasion, management, including Cummins, and a director who serves on the compensation committee, bought company stock at a discounted price in which Cummins represented himself both as the CEO selling the shares and as an individual buying them."

DOJ_NMG_0096516

Paulson Criticizes Sarbanes-Oxley Law. USA Today (11/21, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "US Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said Monday that the tough, costly rules put in place to combat corporate frauds such as Enron need to be enforced in a more flexible manner if U.S. financial markets are to retain their competitive edge around the globe." In "his first major speech on market regulation," Paulson "said regulators' decision to 'impose rule upon rule upon rule' was making it more difficult for US markets to attract business from abroad. … 'When it comes to regulation, balance is key,' Paulson said. 'The right regulatory balance should marry high standards of integrity and accountability with a strong foundation for innovation, growth and competitiveness.'" The speech "comes amid increasing criticism from businesses that the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, designed to reduce accounting fraud and make corporate CEOs more accountable, is too costly and time consuming to implement."

The Financial Times (11/21, Grant, Guha) notes that "turning to enforcement, Mr Paulson said that a combination of enforcement and guidance was likely to be more effective and more efficient than relying on enforcement alone." The Washington Post (11/21, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports Paulson "rejected wholesale revisions to a corporate accountability law under attack from business groups. … 'I don't think there is a single principle in [Sarbanes-Oxley] that is ill-founded,' Paulson said after the speech." Paulson also "sought to take the debate beyond recent corporate reforms and into broader terrain. He singled out class-action lawsuits as an Achilles' heel in the legal system, which he contended have "gone beyond protection" of investors and now hamper business competition."

More Commentary On Sarbanes-Oxley. Former Labor Secretary Robert Reich, on CNBC's Kudlow & Company (11/20, Caruso-Cabrera), commented, "The question is, are the benefits to the public, to investors outweighing the costs and I think that any fair assessment of Sarbanes-Oxley would say that, it probably does have to be reformed," Sarbanes-Oxley "probably imposes greater costs than benefits" on small businesses.

Stephen Moore of the Wall Street Journal editorial board, on CNBC's Kudlow & Company (11/20, Carusi-Cabrera), said, "We are losing…our competitiveness in the financial markets which has to be one of the hallmarks of America's progress in the twenty-first century. We need to be the world's leader here and Secretary Paulson talked about the overregulation and many of the other problems imposed on small businesses, but…we have got to do something fundamentally in my opinion about Sarbanes-Oxley. We have CEOs of major companies, almost every week come to our editorial board at the Wall Street Journal and this first two words out of their mouth are Sarbanes-Oxley."

Senate Hearing To Examine SEC's Effectiveness. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, C5, Scannell, 2.04M) reports the Securities and Exchange Commission, "already under fire for its handling of a suspected insider-trading case, will receive more congressional scrutiny next month when the Senate Judiciary Committee holds a hearing on the agency's effectiveness." Current Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter "has scheduled an oversight hearing on the SEC for Dec. 5." The hearing "comes as the SEC has been on the defensive since Sen. Specter and Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) said they were investigating the agency's handling of an insider-trading investigation involving hedge fund Pequot Capital Management and John Mack, the chief executive of Morgan Stanley. The matter, which was brought to their attention by a former SEC attorney, was referred to the Government Accountability Office for a thorough review of the SEC's enforcement division."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Expanding Global Presence To Fight Cyber Crime. Under the headline "To Catch Crooks In Cyberspace, FBI Goes Global," the Wall Street Journal (11/21, Bryan-Low, 2.04M) reports in a front-page story, "The 98-year-old FBI, which has traditionally focused on domestic crime, is extending its reach beyond U.S. borders and boosting cooperation with other law-enforcement agencies in pursuit of cybercriminals, much as the agency has done in tracking down terrorists overseas. … The FBI now ranks cybercrime as its third priority behind terrorism and espionage," and "building relationships with police in other countries is 'the only way we are going to effectively get a handle on the problem,' says Christopher Painter, deputy chief of the Justice Department's Computer Crime Section." Although "the FBI is running into limits fighting international computer crime," it "is making some headway, thanks partly to a diplomatic offensive to enlist help from foreign agencies. It now has about 150 agents deployed in some 56 offices around the world, including in Iraq and China," and "during the past two years or so, the FBI has also built up Cyber Action Teams, or CATs -- a group of about 25 people that includes agents, computer forensic experts and specialists in computer code, according to David Thomas, the deputy assistant director of the FBI's science and technology branch." The Journal goes on to report in detail on the 2005 Zotob attack and the bureau investigation that led to the apprehension and prosecution of the hackers who unleashed it.

DOJ_NMG_0096517

Three Gang Members Sentenced To Life For Targeting Black Victims. The AP (11/21) reports, "Three members of a Hispanic gang were sentenced Monday to life in prison without the possibility of parole for using murder and other violent acts to intimidate blacks in their neighborhood." The AP continues, "Federal prosecutors had accused Gilbert Saldana, Alejandro Martinez and Fernando Cazares of targeting blacks in the largely Hispanic community of Highland Park, east of downtown Los Angeles. They were found guilty of conspiring to use violence, including the shooting deaths of two black men in 1999 and 2000." The AP adds, "Authorities said it was one of the first prominent cases in which the U.S. Justice Department targeted a street gang with laws normally used to prosecute white supremacist groups. … 'These were horrific offenses that have had far-reaching consequences,' U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson said during sentencing. … Each defendant received two consecutive life sentences. They were convicted in August."

US Backs Off Prison Restrictions For Aryan Brotherhood Members. The AP (11/21, Flaccus) reports, "Prosecutors have dropped plans to ask a federal judge to prevent leaders of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang from communicating with anyone but their attorneys, officials said Monday, but they may ask U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to do so instead." The AP continues, "Prosecutors will probably ask the Bureau of Prisons to impose the bans on Barry 'The Baron' Mills, T.D. 'The Hulk' Bingham, Edgar 'The Snail' Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson, said U.S. attorney's office spokesman Thom Mrozek. … The change means defense attorneys wouldn't be able to fight the restrictions until after they have been imposed, which would delay the appeals process, said Mark Fleming, an attorney representing Mills." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe filed papers Friday in federal court withdrawing a request for a federal judge to impose the restrictions. … An order would also keep writing implements, paper and previously viewed reading material out of the inmates' cells." The AP notes, "Mills, Bingham and Hevle are to be sentenced Tuesday for murder, conspiracy and racketeering. Gibson, who recently had back surgery, won't be sentenced Tuesday because he can't be present. .. Similar bans have been imposed only 11 times in the history of the federal prison system. Inmates Zacarias Moussaoui, the suspected '20th hijacker' in the Sept. 11, 2001, World Trade Center attack, and convicted Unabomber Ted Kaczynski are among those with restrictions on their prison contacts."

Ohio Republican Fundraiser Sentenced For Embezzlement . The AP (11/20) reports from Toledo, "A Republican fund-raiser who embezzled from a state investment in rare coins was sentenced Monday to 18 years in prison for his role in a scandal that helped bring down Ohio's ruling Republican Party. … The fund-raiser, Tom Noe, 52, was also fined $139,000." The AP continues, "Mr. Noe spent money as if he had 'a bottomless cup of wealth and luxury' at his disposal, 'when in fact it was at the state's expense,' Judge Thomas Osowik of Common Pleas Court said Monday. .. .The sentence is on top of the more than two years Mr. Noe was ordered to serve after pleading guilty earlier this year to illegally funneling $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign." The AP adds, "Mr. Noe was the central figure in a scandal that dogged the Ohio Republican Party for more than a year. On Election Day, the Democrats won the governor's office, a Senate seat and other major offices after 12 years of Republican rule. … Until Monday, prosecutors did not say whether Mr. Noe had used any of the money to make campaign contributions, but after the sentencing, the prosecutor, Ron O'Brien, said, 'You can make those inferences.' … Also for the first time, prosecutors on Monday calculated that Mr. Noe had stolen a total of $13.7 million. … Mr. Noe was hired by the state workers' compensation agency and given $50 million to invest in an unorthodox and risky effort by a state government to make money buying and selling rare coins. A furor erupted when the investment in rare coins became public and when it was learned that millions of dollars were missing."

DOJ_NMG_0096518

Pennsylvania Man Charged In West Virginia Death Could Face Death Penalty. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/21, Simonich) reports, "Eugene Talik Jr., a married man accused of killing his girlfriend to hide their illicit affair, yesterday abandoned any hope of getting out of jail before he stands trial. … He waived his right to a bail hearing and to a second proceeding that would have forced federal prosecutors to reveal some of their evidence." The Post-Gazette continues, "Less than a minute after his court session began, Mr. Talik ended it by saying he did not want to go through either hearing. … U.S. marshals took him back to jail, where he will await his indictment in the death of 28-year-old Kelly Jo Elliott." The Post-Gazette adds, "Prosecutors say the victim and Mr. Talik, 38, were having an affair that soured after she learned he was married. … The government alleges that Mr. Talik and an accomplice killed Ms. Elliott to stop her from telling his wife. … Grand jurors will consider a murder-for-hire charge against Mr. Talik when they hear the case against him, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert McWilliams said in a motion opposing bail." The Post-Gazette notes, "After the indictment, Mr. Talik could face the death penalty, Mr. McWilliams said. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has the final decision on whether the government will pursue a capital case or try to imprison Mr. Talik for the rest of his life."

FBI Recovers Stolen Goya. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/21, Parry) reports, "The FBI said Monday that it has recovered a 1778 painting by the Spanish artist Francisco de Goya that was stolen as it was being taken to an exhibition earlier this month. … Steven Siegel, a spokesman for the FBI, said the bureau recovered the painting Saturday in New Jersey, but would not be more specific about where or how it was located. No arrests were made, but the case remains under investigation, he said. The FBI said extensive news coverage of the theft led to tips that enabled the agency to recover the painting." The AP adds, "Siegel said the thieves apparently did not know what was inside the truck when they broke into it. 'It was a target of opportunity. They probably thought it was a truck full of PlayStations,' he said." The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/21, Boyer, 385K) notes, "The FBI turned to the public for help after the insurer of the painting offered a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to its recovery. The FBI said the media attention led to tips and recovery of the painting, which appeared to be in good condition and not damaged."

The New York Times (11/21, Kennedy, 1.16M) reports, "Officials said the painting was recovered unharmed Saturday in central New Jersey after a lawyer called the F.B.I. and told investigators where they could find it while saying that he could not tell them anything else about the theft. … Contrary to earlier law enforcement theories that the theft was carried out by insiders, they did say it appeared that the thieves probably had no idea what kind of art-historical loot they had stumbled upon." Siegel noted, "There are literally predators — for lack of a better word — who when they see a tractor-trailer or a cargo vehicle parked for any length of time start snooping around." The Times adds, "One law enforcement official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said charges in the case could be filed as early as next week in United States District Court in Newark." The New York Sun (11/21, Hope) notes, "A spokeswoman for the FBI's Philadelphia office, Jerri Williams, said no arrests had been made and no one is in custody for the theft. 'A tip came in that allowed us to recover the painting,' she said."

The New York Daily News (11/21, Moritz, 729K) also reports on the FBI recovery of the painting, as did ABC News' The Blotter (11/20, Walter, Kjellman, 4:06 p.m.) and CNN.com (11/20, Brunswick, 8:22 p.m.).

Judge Rules Accused Cuban Spy's Alleged Confession Admissible At Trial. The Miami Herald (11/21, Weaver, 286K) reports, "A professor who acknowledged he was a Cuban government agent to the FBI has incurred a huge blow to his upcoming trial with a federal judge's ruling that his 'confession' to agents was not obtained illegally. U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Garber rejected…Carlos Alvarez's bid to throw out his statements on grounds that he only spoke with the FBI because of alleged promises not to prosecute if he cooperated as a 'double agent.' Garber said two FBI agents made no such promises during three days of interviews in a hotel last year, nor did they have that authority. The judge also found that the agents did not place him in custody, nor did Alvarez make his statements involuntarily." The Herald notes, "Either side has 10 days to object to the judge's ruling, issued last Wednesday."

DOJ_NMG_0096519

Former Daley Patronage Chief Sentenced To Four Years In Prison. The Chicago Tribune (11/21, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 617K) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief stood defiant Monday as he was sentenced to almost 4 years behind bars for his central role in a political hiring scheme at City Hall." Robert Sorich "pointedly refused to apologize for his crimes before the judge slapped him with a 3-year, 10-month sentence. … 'I tried to do my best, and I tried to be fair,' Sorich said of his 12 years as a top aide in Daley's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs. U.S. District Judge David Coar rejected that, saying Sorich sat near the top of a hiring system that amounted to 'corruption with a capital "c."'" The Tribune notes, "Monday's sentencing almost certainly is not the final chapter of an investigation that has reached into the mayor's office. … On Monday, prosecutors again suggested that they have developed evidence against higher-ranking former city officials in Daley's administration." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/21, Robinson) adds Coar "said that 'for people to owe their jobs to political advancement rather than performance on the job stinks.' 'I don't give a hoot whether this has been going on for 200 years - it still stinks,' Coar said."

The Chicago Sun-Times (11/21, Korecki, O'Donnell) also notes Coar's harsh criticism of Sorich and reports, "Sorich lawyer Tom Durkin argued for no prison time, saying his client didn't take bribes or otherwise gain anything personally. Durkin criticized a legal system in which another corrupt former city official, former water czar Donald Tomczak, got a prison sentence just one month longer than what Sorich got, though Tomczak admitted taking $400,000 in bribes. Durkin criticized the U.S. Attorney's Office for its role in a system he said punishes those who fight charges and take their case to trial and rewards those who cooperate, even if they're more corrupt. … But prosecutors said they wouldn't apologize for a system that allows wrongdoers to make amends and help fix a criminal system."

NYC Bus Driver's Union President Charged With Racketeering, Extortion. The New York Times (11/21, Rashbaum, 1.16M) reports, "Federal prosecutors announced racketeering, extortion and bribery charges yesterday against the president of the 15,000-member city school bus drivers' union, who is already facing trial on charges that he tried to hide Mafia involvement in the union." The indictment against Salvatore Battaglia also "says he is a member of the Genovese crime family. The new charges came just weeks after the union's longtime secretary-treasurer, Julius Bernstein, pleaded guilty to federal racketeering charges and began cooperating with prosecutors and the F.B.I., law enforcement officials said. The new charges said that over at least two years, Mr. Battaglia and others agreed with the owners of a number of school bus companies not to organize their workers, in exchange for tens of thousands of dollars in payoffs from the owners."

Under the headline "FBI Busts Union's Boss On School Bus Shakedown Rap," the New York Daily News (11/21, Smith, 729K) reports, "Battaglia was arrested at dawn by the FBI at his Staten Island home, officials said. … The arrest comes two months after Matthew (Matty the Horse) Ianiello, a Genovese captain, pleaded guilty to charges of shaking down Local 1181. During his plea, Ianiello contended he'd arranged payments to the union from several city school bus companies.

Jeffs Evidence Hearing Begins Today. The Salt Lake Tribune (11/21, Adams) reports, "Word by word, every lesson, sermon and pronouncement polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs ever made is likely to be dissected and offered as evidence -- both against him and in his favor -- as his prosecution begins today." Jeffs "is to appear for a preliminary hearing in 5th District Court as the state of Utah makes its case that he should stand trial on two first-degree felony counts of being an accomplice to rape." The Tribune notes, "Of particular interest will be the FLDS version of premarital advice Jeffs gave in home economics classes for junior-high age girls and in priesthood history classes for boys. The teachings draw on the Bible and standard works of the mainstream Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which publicly disavowed plural marriage in 1890."

The Deseret Morning News (11/21, Winslow) reports, "A judge is expected to decide today whether there is enough evidence to make…Jeffs stand trial on charges he forced a 14-year-old girl into a marriage with a 19-year-old man who is also her first cousin. The young woman is expected to be the prosecution's star witness when she testifies against the Fundamentalist LDS Church leader today." The Morning

DOJ_NMG_0096520

News notes, "Washington County Attorney Brock Belnap said he intends to prove that Jeffs 'enticed (the victim) into submitting to sexual intercourse' with the man she had just married." However, "Defense attorney Walter Bugden Jr. says the state is confusing the culpability of the alleged rapist and Jeffs."

Meanwhile, under the headline "Polygamists Fight To Be Seen As Part Of Mainstream Society," the Washington Post (11/21, A1, Pomfret, 690K) notes the Jeffs hearing and reports that "among the estimated 40,000 men, women and children in polygamous communities are part of a new movement to decriminalize bigamy. Consciously taking tactics from the gay-rights movement, polygamists have reframed their struggle, choosing in interviews to de-emphasize their religious beliefs and focus on their desire to live 'in freedom,' according to Anne Wilde, director of community relations for Principle Voices, a pro-polygamy group based in Salt Lake." The Post adds that their "efforts… are paying off. Utah's attorney general, Mark L. Shurtleff, no longer prosecutes bigamy between consenting adults, though it is a felony."

FLDS Insiders Say Nevada Hotel Room Often Served As Wedding Chapel. The AP (11/21, Dobner) reports, "Room 15 at the Caliente Hot Springs Motel seems like an unlikely place for a wedding. … But it was in Room 15 that dozens of weddings took place between underage girls and men" from Jeffs' FLDS, "church insiders say. … Carolyn Jessop, a former sect member who used to run the motel, said that once or twice a month, beginning in the spring of 1999, she would get a telephone call telling her to plan for a weekend of weddings. Some insiders say as many as 10 such weddings were held in a single day." The AP notes that "sect leaders believed Caliente was a safe place — 'a way to go under the radar screen' — because Utah and Arizona were passing legislation to address underage marriage and threatening prosecution, Jessop said."

USA Today Finds Inaction On Many DNA Matches. USA Today (11/21, Willing) reports, "In a March 2003 speech arguing for $1 billion in new spending on DNA-based crime fighting, then-attorney general John Ashcroft singled out the FBI's DNA database for its many successes. … In Virginia, for example, he said authorities 'have been able to solve 90 homicides and 196 non-homicide sexual assaults' by matching the DNA left at crime scenes to the DNA of prior offenders." USA continues, "What Ashcroft didn't explain was that a DNA match — a crime 'solved' by the FBI's database — does not mean that an arrest was made, that a criminal was prosecuted or even that detectives considered a case closed. Just how many DNA matches lead to an arrest isn't known; no government agency keeps track. … But a USA TODAY investigation found almost three dozen cases during the past five years — including a rape in Virginia — in which investigators failed to pursue potential suspects whose DNA matched evidence found at crime scenes." USA adds, "DNA matches that could have closed cases weren't pursued because of basic police foul-ups, such as overlooking a telephone message reporting the match. Backlogs of unsolved "cold cases" that threaten to overwhelm some big-city police departments caused matches to be ignored, the newspaper found. In some jurisdictions — Richmond, Va., Cincinnati, and DeKalb County, Ga. — police offered no explanations for why matches were not pursued. … The suspects in two such cases, one a rape and the other the attempted sexual assault of a child, were later charged with committing subsequent sex crimes that might have been prevented had the first DNA match been pursued." USA notes, "USA TODAY reviewed hundreds of pages of court documents and local media reports and interviewed police, prosecutors, defense attorneys and lab officials to look for cases in which matches were made but police departments were slow to react."

New Orleans Defendants Freed Because Of Evidence Problems After Katrina. The New York Times (11/21, Drew, 1.16M) reports that as New Orleans' "criminal justice system slowly gears back up after Hurricane Katrina, as many as 500 defendants, mostly in drug, theft and assault cases, have been freed because of problems with evidence, including difficulty in finding the witnesses who have moved away. Law-enforcement officials say a few of those who were freed could potentially be violent, a cause for concern in a city battling a surge in drug-related killings." After the storm, "the evidence rooms at the Orleans Parish Criminal District Court sat in chest-high water for two and a half weeks. Only recently have court officials begun to realize the extent of the evidence problems within the old Beaux-Arts courthouse, which was closed for nine months and is still not quite back to full operations."

WPost Praises Outgoing Police Chief Ramsey. The Washington Post (11/21, A26) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0096521

"News that Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty has decided to turn to someone else to head the D.C. police department comes as no surprise. For some time, Mr. Fenty and D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey have not seen eye to eye on the department's performance, a fact that Mr. Fenty never kept secret. Under the circumstances, and given the incoming mayor's determination to be hands-on with the police force and other city agencies, it probably is best that he have a person of his choice leading the department when the Fenty administration gets started on Jan. 2. … The departure of Chief Ramsey is, however, a development that many District residents and this page receive with regret. The D.C. police force that the chief bequeaths to his successor is in far better shape than the one Mr. Ramsey inherited upon his arrival in Washington eight years ago. The credit goes to him. As the longest-serving police chief since the start of home rule three decades ago, Chief Ramsey, the record will show, made the best use of his time. In every major category of offense -- homicides, rapes, robberies, aggravated assaults, burglaries, larcenies and vehicle thefts -- rates are down. He took a department that was loosely run and staffed with poorly trained, quick-triggered officers and converted it into a better managed and more disciplined force. From scout cars to technology, police officers now do their jobs with 21st-century resources. … Mr. Fenty, in deciding to appoint police Cmdr. Cathy L. Lanier as the next chief, has drawn from within the ranks of the department. It is reassuring that Chief Ramsey spoke well of Ms. Lanier's appointment and that she also has the background and qualifications that Mr. Fenty seeks in a chief. They apparently agree on community policing, and she appears to be in sync with his leadership style. It will soon fall to the new leadership in the John A. Wilson Building and in police headquarters to maintain and expand on the advances achieved by Chief Ramsey. As for the departing chief, any police jurisdiction in the country would be fortunate to have him."

CIVIL LAW:

Attorneys Argue Validity Of 1998 Law Aimed At Curbing Online Pornography. The AP (11/21, Dale) reports, :Justice Department attorneys, defending a law aimed at keeping online pornography from minors, argued that software filters often block valid sites — on gay rights or sexual health, for example — that teens might seek out. … 'Filters are hindering minors from learning about the world around them. That's a huge problem,' government lawyer Joel McElvain said Monday. 'There may be reasons the teenagers have problems speaking to their parents about these (issues).'" The AP continues, "Under the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, commercial Web publishers who fail to keep material 'harmful to minors' away from children could face fines and even prison time. The law has never taken effect, because of a long-running legal challenge filed by Salon.com, the Philadelphia Gay News and other groups represented by the American Civil Liberties Union. … Closing arguments concluded Monday before Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell Reed Jr., ending four weeks of testimony." The AP adds, "Justice attorneys evoked problems with the software filters even as they had defended their use in a 2000 law requiring schools and libraries to block porn if they receive certain federal funds. The high court upheld that law in 2003. … Opponents say the 1998 law is overly vague and would have a chilling effect on their work. They also say it would not apply to foreign Web operators or streaming video and audio. The ACLU argues that filters are more effective than legislation, because they let parents set limits based on their own values and their children's ages. … 'If you're a parent who doesn't want sexually explicit material slipping through, then set it (the filter) strictly,' ACLU lawyer Chris Hansen told the judge Monday. … The U.S. Supreme Court, indicating the government was unlikely to prevail, granted the ACLU a temporary injunction in 2004."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/21, Gambardello) reports, "A never enforced federal law aimed at protecting children from Internet porn is vague, threatens free speech, and will not achieve its intended goal, opponents of the measure argued today. … But the federal government countered that the Children's Online Protection Act, known as COPA, is needed because Internet filters are not foolproof and parents cannot be expected to supervise their children's Web surfing at all times." The Inquirer continues, "U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. heard those opposing positions as both sides made closing arguments at the end of a four-week trial in Philadelphia that had been ordered by the U.S. Supreme Court to determine whether technology developed since Congress passed COPA in 1998, such as commercially available filtering, offered effective ways to protect children. … The law would authorize jail time and heavy fines for online porn merchants who do not require adult-access codes, personal identification, or credit cards to access their Web sites." The Inquirer adds, "Plaintiffs, including the American Civil Liberties Union and a group of Internet artists, merchants and magazines, maintain that having parents use Internet filters and personal control and educate children on Internet usage is the least restrictive way to protect youngsters from porn and ensure the free flow of speech online. … The government pointed to credit cards and emerging online identification services as ways to ensure that only adults - those 17 or older - are accessing Internet porn."

DOJ_NMG_0096522

Smokers Sue Phillip Morris For Lung Scans. The National Law Journal (11/21, Geier) reports, "A group of long-term Marlboro smokers has filed an action in federal court in New York to force Marlboro maker Philip Morris USA Inc. to give them regular low-dose CT scans to catch possible early signs of lung cancer." The Journal continues, "The action is unusual because it seeks only medical screenings for people whose smoking habit has put them at increased risk of lung cancer, said plaintiffs attorney Jerome H. Block of Levy Phillips & Konigsberg in New York. … 'The sole relief we are seeking is that Philip Morris pay for a program of CT scans,' Block said. The scans should be annual, or 'more frequent if something looks suspicious.' He noted that a recent article in the New England Journal of Medicine suggests that such a program would increase dramatically one's chances of surviving lung cancer." The Journal adds, "Block represents Marcia L. Caronia and four other named plaintiffs on behalf of a class of New York residents 50 years of age or older who have smoked Marlboro-brand cigarettes for at least 20 'pack years' -- an average of a pack a day for 20 years. Caronia v. Philip Morris USA Inc., No. 06-224 (E.D.N.Y.). … Generally speaking, early diagnoses of lung cancer now occur by happenstance, when doctors administering CT scans to patients with pneumonia or a broken rib, for instance, discover lesions and nodules that could be lung cancer, he said."

Judge Strikes Down Bank Of America Ruling. The California Recorder (11/21, Scheck) reports, "Earlier this year, talk about the big class action against Bank of America was all about money -- the billion dollars or so in statutory damages, the $284 million in compensatory damages, and of course the correspondingly large contingency fee due the plaintiffs lawyers. … That all changed Monday when California's 1st District Court of Appeal struck down a trial court's ruling that the bank may not withdraw Social Security funds from customer accounts to pay for overdrafts and overdraft penalties." The Recorder continues, "In a trial presided over by San Francisco Superior Court Judge Anne Bouliane, plaintiffs lawyers James Sturdevant and Thomas Brandi had successfully argued that Bank of America's practice of debiting government benefit fees was illegal. … Central to their arguments -- and to Bouliane's jury instructions -- was a 1974 case that said a bank couldn't take public benefit money out of an account to cover a credit card debt. They said the case, Kruger v. Wells Fargo Bank, 11 Cal 3d 352, presented an analogous situation to that of lead plaintiff Paul Miller." The Recorder adds, "In 1998, after Miller had spent money that Bank of America mistakenly credited to his account, the bank withdrew money from Social Security benefits to cover the overdraft. … While the bank eventually returned the money, it repeated the pattern on two other occasions. Miller eventually sued, arguing that government-directed deposits shouldn't be subject to such seizures. … In a unanimous, 14-page opinion Monday, Justice Peter Siggins disagreed with verve."

Court Rules Internet Users, Providers Not Liable For Posted Defamatory Material. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Dolan) reports, "Internet users and providers cannot be held liable for posting defamatory material written by someone else, the California Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday. … 'The prospect of blanket immunity for those who intentionally redistribute defamatory statements on the Internet has disturbing implications,' Justice Carol Corrigan wrote for the court. Immunity 'serves to protect online freedom of expression and to encourage self-regulation.'" The Times continues, "Monday's decision was consistent with holdings by many federal appeals courts and one other state supreme court. … 'The courts are now uniform,' said Ann Brick, who represented the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California in the case. … But attorneys on both sides of the case said the California Supreme Court went further than other courts by giving immunity to all Internet users except the original author. … 'What you couldn't put in your print newspaper, you can put in your Internet newspaper,' said Christopher E. Grell, who represented two doctors who said they were defamed. 'The notion of fact checking and verifying things doesn't apply to the Internet.'" The Times notes, "Mark Goldowitz, the lawyer for the defendant, cited a line in the ruling that the decision brought 'the law of libel from the Gutenberg era to the cyberspace era.' … Unlike hard-copy publications, the Internet allows users to 'immediately respond and correct any harm,' Goldowitz said. 'Not everyone has a printing press, but everyone can start a blog or post on a news group.'"

DOJ_NMG_0096523

The Wall Street Journal (11/21, B5, Delaney) reports, "Legal experts say the decision1 is in line with prior court rulings on immunity for transmitting content online originating from someone else, who themselves may still be held liable for defamation or other claims." The Journal adds, "The California court ruling came in the case of Stephen J. Barrett et al. v. Ilena Rosenthal. The case concerned an article Ms. Rosenthal received via email and posted on two Web newsgroups that the plaintiffs argued was defamatory. … 'This opinion reinforces the broad reach of federal statutory immunization for content published by third-parties online,' said Eric Goldman, Assistant Professor at Santa Clara University School of Law and Director of the school's High Technology Law Institute. 'This case is significant because it shuts down all of the workarounds people have been trying to find.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Democrats Will Target Election "Robo Calls." USA Today (11/21) reports, "Senate Democratic leaders say they'll push legislation next year to make it a federal crime, punishable by fines and jail time, to use automated 'robo calls' and other tactics to mislead and discourage voters. … 'We're going to find some way to stop this,' says Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the incoming majority leader." USA continues, "Civil rights and watchdog groups say some voters complained this year of being barraged by automated recorded campaign calls. Though many were only annoying, some gave misleading information, directing voters to the wrong polling site or raising questions about whether a voter was registered. … 'We definitely think it's a good idea for Congress to investigate and hold hearings on these issues and to consider carefully targeted legislation focused on outright deception,' said Elliot Mincberg of the liberal People for the American Way, which helped operate a national hotline for voter complaints." USA adds, "Tova Wang of the Century Foundation says misinformation in flyers and calls, practices employed by Democrats and Republicans, aim to suppress voter turnout. … New York Sen. Charles Schumer, who is helping to draft Democratic legislation, plans to call for a separate division within the Justice Department to deal with such problems. Penalties could include up to 10 years in jail. … In a letter to Justice officials Thursday, Schumer said he was disappointed with the department's response to voter complaints. … Justice officials defended their record in a letter responding to Schumer, noting that investigations recently have been launched into alleged voter deception and intimidation in Arizona, Maryland, Virginia and elsewhere."

Georgia Prosecutors Launch Review Of Excessive Force Cases. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/21, Weber) reports suburban Atlanta prosecutors "will extensively review at the police chief's request 14 shootings by police, including eight that were fatal, this year following concern about the high number of killings compared to the nation's two largest cities. Prosecutors also have received a request to investigate the death of another person who died in police custody but was not shot, and they expect to be asked later to look into four other fatal shootings by police in September and since then, Adora Andy, a spokeswoman for the DeKalb County District Attorney's Office, said Monday. The review request comes as police released details of an internal probe into the shootings in which a police review board has found that an officer in one fatal shooting was unjustified in using deadly force. Officers involved in three nonfatal shootings were found to be unjustified."

UCLA Officer In Taser Video Has Been Subject Of Two Other Use-Of-Force Complaints. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Proctor, Winton) reports, "The UCLA police officer videotaped last week using a Taser gun on a student also shot a homeless man at a campus study hall room three years ago and was earlier recommended for dismissal in connection with an alleged assault on fraternity row, authorities said." The Times continues, "UCLA police confirmed late Monday that the officer who fired the Taser gun was Terrence Duren, who has served in the university's Police Department for 18 years. … Duren, who was named officer of the year in 2001, also has been involved in several controversial incidents on campus." The Times adds, "In an interview with The Times on Monday night, Duren, 43, defended his record as a campus police officer and urged people to withhold judgment until the review of his Taser use is completed. … 'I patrol this area the same way I would want someone to patrol the neighborhoods where I live,' he said. 'People make allegations against cops all the time. Saying one thing and proving it are two different things.' … While he would not directly talk about why he used the Taser on the student, he said a videotape of any arrest doesn't necessarily tell the whole story. … 'If someone is resisting, sometimes it's not going to look pretty taking someone into custody,' he said. 'If you have to use some force, it's not going to look pretty. That's the nature of this job.' … A student's cellphone video of the incident has been broadcast around the world and focused much criticism on the officer."

DOJ_NMG_0096524

Judge Strikes Las Vegas Ban On Feeding Homeless In Parks. The AP (11/21, Ritter) reports, "A federal judge ruled Monday that the city cannot make it illegal to feed poor people in city parks." The AP continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones issued an injunction prohibiting enforcement of a City Council ordinance passed in July that prohibits "providing food or meals to the indigent for free or for a nominal fee" in a city park and defines indigent as a person whom a reasonable ordinary person would believe to be entitled to public assistance." The AP adds, "Las Vegas Mayor Oscar Goodman said handouts discourage homeless people from seeking help from social service providers set up to handle mental health and substance abuse problems. Neighbors had complained of large numbers of homeless people congregating at downtown parks, drawn by groups providing meals. … Jones told lawyers for the city and the American Civil Liberties Union of Nevada that he intends to issue an order killing the measure. No date was set for final action."

WPost Says Both Parties Should Embrace Ryan Abortion Bill. Columnist E.J. Dionne, Jr. from The Washington Post (11/21, A27, 690K) writes that "the politics of abortion began to change," when in September, "a group of 23 pro-choice and pro-life Democratic House members introduced what they called the Reducing the Need for Abortion and Supporting Parents Act." The Ryan bill, one of several congressional initiatives to reduce the abortion rate," both "favors programs that encourage effective contraception," and "emphasizes helping women who want to carry their children to term." It includes "a remarkably broad set of programs aimed at reducing teen pregnancy, promoting contraception and encouraging parental responsibility. But it also includes strong measures to offer new mothers full access to health coverage, child care and nutrition assistance," and both parties should "embrace this approach."

ANTITRUST:

Suspected Municipal Bond Abuses Raise Tax Questions. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, D5, Connor) reports, "The latest outcropping of suspected U.S. municipal-bond-related abuses, including bid-rigging on guaranteed investment contracts used in some muni transactions, has cast a cloud of potential taxability on billions of dollars of bonds sold to investors as tax-exempt securities." The Journal continues, "One federal official familiar with the situation said the amount of bonds in question remains to be determined but that a conservative estimate could be between $10 billion to $15 billion. He added that the final tally likely will be far larger than that." The Journal adds, "Wide-ranging criminal and civil probes of suspected muni-related illegality are now under way, with the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission investigating suspected violations unearthed initially by the Internal Revenue Service. A number of firms, including leading providers of guaranteed investment contracts, or GICs, have received federal subpoenas recently. .. .The IRS's probe of bid-rigging on GICs -- which are insurance contracts that pay a fixed interest rate over a set period of time, and are often used in retirement plans and in connection with certain muni deals -- has been under way for some time. In early 2005, Mark Scott, then head of the IRS's muni enforcement program, said that "we have a lot of evidence pointing to bid-rigging for GICs in municipal-bond transactions.""

Private Equity Firms Fuel Takeover Boom. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Petruno, Friedman) reports, "Elite private investors are buying up major companies at a record pace, in a wave of deals that is raining riches on Wall Street but also may be raising the risk of a financial bust." The Times continues, "Investors led by Blackstone Group announced late Sunday the biggest takeover ever by a so-called private equity fund, a $36-billion deal to buy Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. owner of office buildings. … The proposed purchase follows announcements in recent months of buyouts that would put firms including radio giant Clear Channel Communications Inc., casino titan Harrah's Entertainment Inc. and food-service company Aramark Corp. in private hands, taking their shares off the stock market." The Times adds, "Takeovers are nothing new in American business, but historically the largest deals have involved companies whose shares are publicly traded buying other companies. … This year, the buyers behind the biggest deals are private equity funds — run by generally secretive investment firms that raise money from pension funds, wealthy individuals and other investors who are hungry for double-digit returns on their capital."

DOJ_NMG_0096525

Debt Is Common Element In Recent Spate Of Mega-mergers. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, C1, Ng, Zuckerman, Hudson) reports, "Wall Street's cash spigots are turned wide open. … That means the recent deluge of merger and buyout deals could keep rising even though signs are emerging that some target companies are being loaded with increasingly risky levels of debt in the process." The Journal continues, "More than $60 billion in deals were consummated in the past 48 hours of frantic merger and buyout activity, not including the debt assumed from target companies in these transactions, according to Dealogic, a research firm. The deals included a $20 billion private-equity bid for real-estate giant Equity Office Properties Trust and stretched from Europe to Canada to the U.S. More than 35 deals were announced globally, leaving bankers looking broadly to other sectors -- including health care, technology, gambling and home building -- for the next megatransactions." The Journal adds, "One important factor behind the year's takeover boom is a well-oiled financial machine: buyout firms searching out prey and raising cash with bonds and loans that are then sold off to investors around the world. Leveraged buyouts account for some 17% of the $3.4 trillion in transactions announced globally so far this year. … The overall pace of deal making already surpasses the $3.3 trillion record set in 2000. Almost $1.3 trillion of mergers have been announced in the U.S. alone, though that is still off from the 2000 pace, which was driven by the tech boom and included many transactions in which companies were acquired in stock swaps." The Journal notes, "The common denominator now is debt. In the U.S., corporations have sold $109 billion in 'high yield,' or junk, bonds and raised an additional $593 billion in junk-rated bank loans so far this year, according to Dealogic. Last year they raised $707 billion in bonds and loans in the U.S."

Freeport To Acquire Phelps Dodge In Copper Merger. The New York Times (11/20, Sorkin, Austen) reports, "Phelps Dodge, the world's second-largest copper producer, will be acquired by Freeport-McMoRan Copper and Gold, a smaller rival that has been embroiled in environmental and human rights controversies, in a cash and stock deal worth $25.9 billion, the companies said yesterday." The Times continues, "The transaction, if approved by shareholders, would create the world's largest copper producer and the largest mining company based in North America. It is the latest move in a series of mining and metals mergers. Like companies involved in other mining mergers, Freeport-McMoRan promoted the idea that increased size has become an important competitive factor." The Times adds, "The chairman and chief executive of Phelps Dodge, J. Steven Whisler, said yesterday that the two companies have talked about a possible merger for about a decade. The premium of about 33 percent being offered by Freeport-McMoRan, Mr. Whisler said, was a decisive factor in Phelps Dodge's decision to end its 172-year history as an independent company. … The boards of both companies have approved the transaction. Under its terms, stockholders in Phelps Dodge will receive $88 a share in cash plus 0.67 of a Freeport-McMoRan share. Based on Friday's closing, the deal is offering Phelps Dodge shareholders a 33 percent premium."

Mattel Lays Claim To MGA Entertainment's Bratz Line. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, B1, Binkley) reports, "Barbie has a new tactic in her battle against the rival Bratz doll clan: If you can't beat 'em, own 'em." The Journal continues, "Mattel Inc., maker of Barbie, is attempting to lay legal claim to the Bratz fashion-doll empire created by its rival MGA Entertainment Inc. The El Segundo, Calif., toy maker yesterday filed documents with U.S. District Court in California arguing that the Bratz dolls rightfully belong to Mattel, whose Barbie franchise has been dented by competition from the saucy, big-headed dolls that appeared on the market in 2001." The Journal adds, "The argument is based in part on Mattel's claim that the designer of Bratz was employed by Mattel when he did initial drawings for the dolls several years ago. Recently, Mattel's lawyers quietly applied for copyright protection on a number of early Bratz drawings, according to the documents. … Moreover, the documents claim that closely held MGA Entertainment hired away a number of key Mattel employees in Mexico, the U.S. and Canada. Mattel says those employees 'stole' confidential sales information, documents, plans, and other Mattel secrets -- copying the information onto hard drives or using other means to transfer the intelligence to MGA over the past six years or so. … Among other sources of information, including depositions of witnesses, the documents cite emails that appear to have been recovered from the personal computers of several former employees."

DOJ_NMG_0096526

Probe Finds Cephalon Used Questionable Tactics To Sell Actiq. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, B1, Carreyrou) reports, "From setting unrealistically high sales quotas to pushing larger prescriptions at higher doses, drug maker Cephalon Inc. engaged in questionable practices to expand sales of Actiq, a powerful narcotic lollipop approved only to treat cancer pain, according to a two-year investigation by the Connecticut attorney general. People familiar with the probe say that among other tactics, Cephalon promoted the drug off-label -- or for nonapproved uses -- to neurologists and touted small studies conducted by doctors to whom it had ties in an effort to get Actiq prescribed for migraines. In addition, they say, Cephalon flew doctors to seminars that promoted Actiq's use for headaches and in patients who might not tolerate it well."

LSE Rejects Nasdaq's Offer. The Financial Times (11/21, Cohen) reports, "London Stock Exchange on Monday batted away a £2.7bn ($5.1bn, €4bn) 'final' offer to be acquired by US-based Nasdaq, saying the bid so undervalued the company its board was not even willing to meet for further discussions." The Times continues, "Posturing by both parties is likely to be played out in coming weeks." Under the UK takeover code, "Nasdaq cannot raise its offer unless either its board recommends a bid or a competing bidder emerges. If it fails to acquire the company, it cannot bid for another 12 months." Nasdaq's latest offer is the second it has made for LSE "and the fifth approach LSE has received in the past two years."

Offer Price An Issue. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, Lucchetti, MacDonald) reports that early on Monday, "Nasdaq took another run at the London Stock Exchange, proposing to buy the approximately 71% of the company it doesn't own for £12.43 a share, or $23.55, valuing the LSE at £2.7 billion, or $5.1 billion." Nasdaq "will likely have to increase its offer price if it wants a chance of taking over" LSE. The Journal adds, "Nasdaq has a 60-day period under British takeover rules in which to convince LSE shareholders and its board to negotiate. Nasdaq billed its latest approach as its 'final offer.'" A "combined company would be home to Britain's giants such as Vodafone Group PLC and BP PLC, and Nasdaq's technology-oriented giants such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Intel Corp. but also thousands of smaller companies that have chosen Nasdaq in the U.S. and LSE's AIM exchange to list." The Washington Post (11/21) also publishes this story this morning.

Nasdaq Planning To Make Another Run. The New York Times (11/21, Timmons, Kanter) reports, "Nasdaq officials said that while they still hoped to reach a friendly deal" with the LSE, "they planned to go ahead with their offer." Nasdaq's chief executive, Robert Greifeld, said during a call with investors that he would like to reach a deal to take over LSE with the approval of the London exchange's board. Nasdaq "expects to post an official offer this week, at which time London Stock Exchange holders have 28 days to tender their shares. That period can be extended to 60 days. In addition, 30 days after posting a formal offer, Nasdaq can buy more shares of the London exchange on the market." The Times adds, "On Monday, the British government said it was open to foreign ownership in London but stressed that any takeover must not threaten the current regulatory framework."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Financial Times (11/21) discusses recent attempts by various entities to take over the LSE, the latest one being the US exchange Nasdaq. The Times says Nasdaq "should not be turned down because it is American. The LSE is a profitable, private business and there is no public interest in protecting it from foreign ownership. It is important to ask, however, if the US authorities would allow a deal if the LSE were trying to buy Nasdaq." The Times adds that for users, the "real prizes would be mergers among Europe's national exchanges and the merger of Deutsche Börse's clearing and settlement arm with LCH.Clearnet, which performs that function for the LSE and Euronext. A Nasdaq deal with the LSE brings such outcomes no closer. Shareholders in the LSE are likely to accept an offer at the right price," but "stock exchange users will still sigh about the handsome Europeans the LSE turned away" before Nasdaq came along.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

National Park Service Proposes Snowmobile Plan For Yellowstone. The AP (11/21, Jalonick) reports, "The National Park Service wants to maintain snowmobile regulations allowing 720 snowmobiles per day to enter Yellowstone National Park." The plan "would limit snowcoaches in Yellowstone to 78 per day and require those vehicles to meet sound and emissions requirements." The drafted plan would also "allow 140 snowmobiles a day to enter Grand Teton National Park and the John D. Rockefeller Jr. Parkway, which connects the two parks." The plan "was issued to other government agencies," and park officials "stressed that the report is only a draft and that the plan is the agency's preferred alternative out of several proposals." A final plan "is expected to be issued in time for the 2007-2008 winter season."

DOJ_NMG_0096527

The New York Times (11/21, Robbins, 1.16M) reports, "Officials are seeking comments from the states and counties that border the park and will release another draft document for public comment early next year," and "the new plan will go into effect for the winter of 2009." Snowmobile in Yellowstone has been "hugely controversial and political." The Clinton administration proposed "banning snowmobiles; the Bush administration proposed a limit of 1,000 a day."

Marine Protection Sought For Northwest Atlantic. The AP (11/21) reports, "Parts of the northwest Atlantic Ocean stretching from Cape Cod in Massachusetts to the northeastern tip of Nova Scotia in Canada should be declared off-limits to fishing and other human activities in order to protect threatened marine species, two environmental groups said Monday." The AP continues, "The Boston-based Conservation Law Foundation and the World Wildlife Fund-Canada recommended creating 30 marine reserves extending 10 miles to 200 miles from shore. … The proposed zones include productive fishing areas, however, and creating the reserves in U.S. waters would require federal authorization." The AP adds, "A fishing industry official worried that closing large areas permanently could make it harder for fishermen to earn a living. … 'They have to be very careful not to close an area that is producing a lot of net benefit to the nation,' Vito Giacalone of the Northeast Seafood Coalition told The Boston Globe newspaper. … The groups said they used computer technology to identify offshore areas where a large number of species could be protected while imposing the fewest restrictions."

Conrad Defends Agricultural Disaster Assistance Funding. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (11/21), Sen. Kent Conrad responds to a November 15 Journal editorial that criticized the North Dakota Senator for seeking funding for agriculture assistance. Conrad said the Journal "editorial 'Fargonomics' misrepresents the facts on agriculture disaster assistance. My bipartisan legislation would bring badly needed federal aid to the thousands of farm and ranch families whose livelihoods were destroyed by natural disasters including drought, flood, frost and disease." To "represent the deepening drought of the Great Plains as anything but a national disaster is an affront to every farm family in the Midwest. This is the third worst drought in U.S. history, searing millions of acres of crops and livestock forage, and driving producers and the small town businesses that rely on them to the brink of foreclosure. If we do not respond, the drought will be followed by economic disaster across the plains."

Navajo Tribe's Efforts At Desert Radiation Cleanup Thwarted By Delays, Disputes. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Pasternak) reports from Church Rock Mine, NM, "Most of the mining companies that drilled, dug and blasted for uranium on the Navajo reservation during the Cold War did nothing to repair the environmental damage they left behind. For a time, tribal leaders staked their hopes for a cleanup on Superfund, the landmark legislation that forces polluters to pay for remediation of toxic sites." The Times continues, "More than 1,000 abandoned mines are scattered across the Navajo homeland, which covers 27,000 square miles in Arizona, Utah and New Mexico. … Such a comprehensive cleanup is 'exactly what Superfund was designed for,' said Paul Connor, a lawyer who once directed Superfund enforcement policy for the Environmental Protection Agency." The Times adds, "It hasn't happened. Bureaucratic delays and misunderstandings between the tribe and the EPA have prevented the Navajos from tapping Superfund's deep pockets and broad legal authority. … Instead, the tribe reluctantly settled for a partial cleanup under a separate program. That effort left many hazards untouched. … One of them is in Church Rock Mine, a Navajo community named for an abandoned uranium site. A 30-foot-high heap of grit and dynamited stone from the mine looms over a cluster of 15 homes. The wind roars for hours at a time, scattering radioactive dust throughout the settlement. … For years, residents appealed to tribal leaders and the U.S. government for help. In 2003, tired of waiting, they joined forces with Navajo activists who were using a foundation grant to conduct radiation testing. … In a dry wash where generations of children had played catch and tag, they discovered elevated radiation levels. .. As word spread of the citizen effort, authorities stirred at last. Under pressure from the tribe, the EPA opened negotiations with the mine's operator, United Nuclear Corp., and its parent, General Electric Co., to clean up the mess."

DOJ_NMG_0096528

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senate Appropriations Bill Might Order FBI To Recover VCF Funds From SAIC. Government Computer News (11/20, Dizard) reported, "The Senate's draft of the appropriations bill for the Justice Department and the FBI would order the bureau to use 'all means necessary' to try to recover funds from the vendor of its failed Virtual Case File project. In an unusual action, according to several sources, the draft legislation…directs the bureau to retrieve as much as $104 million from the defaulted VCF contract. … The Senate's reference to 'the VCF contractor' especially singles out SAIC." GCN noted, "If the FBI were to try to take legal action to recover the VCF funds, it would be stepping into a legal and political minefield," and "sources close to the project said that some of the senior officials in place during the VCF fiasco — including director Robert Mueller — still hold powerful jobs in the bureau, and their reputations could suffer if a public lawsuit or civil trial unveiled the details of their roles." A "federal official involved in the VCF incident said, "The world's greatest investigative body slowed this down. The answer is culpability of the FBI officials who are still there. Mueller says he takes the responsibility. I still think there is accountability and culpability."

Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation. In a continuing report on the DEA's "first global Internet pharmacy case," the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/21) today reports Akhil Bansal, "smuggling a half-million pills a month from India, prepares for the biggest business meeting of his young life. It is July 2004." The Manhattan meeting Bansal's father, Brij Bansal, "had set up from India was too important to ignore any detail. A Costa Rican client sought an exclusive deal to buy 500,000 generic pills a month. Millions of dollars were at stake." The Inquirer continues, "Like most law enforcement agencies in Philadelphia, DEA liked to keep cases in the family. When other agencies got involved, DEA worried about losing control. Or sharing the credit - what feds called 'the stat' - or sharing cash, cars and property seized in the arrests. … This case was different. DEA had never conducted an Internet pharmacy case on such a scale. It needed help." So far, DEA "had identified suspect Web pharmacies in Australia, India, Germany, New York, Virginia and Philadelphia. The pharmacies bought generic drugs for pennies a pill, then sold them online, without requiring a prescription, for a dollar apiece."

Texas Man Caught With 1,700 Pounds Of Marijuana Pleads Guilty. In Louisville, Kentucky, the AP (11/20) reports a Texas man "pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy to distribute marijuana after he was caught driving a semi-trailer truck loaded with about 1,700 pounds of pot hidden among broccoli, authorities said. Erasmo Castillo, 27, of Starr County, Texas, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to distribute marijuana and one count of possession of marijuana with intent to distribute. … Castillo was arrested by DEA agents on June 27, 2005."

More Than 100 Charged In Kentucky Prescription-Drug Investigation. The Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal (11/20) reports more than 100 people "have been charged in connection with a joint federal and state investigation into illegal prescription-drug trafficking in Eastern Kentucky. State arrest warrants were issued Monday for 103 people in Eastern and Southeastern Kentucky, people that authorities described as street-level dealers. … The drugs in most of the cases involved prescription painkillers such as OxyContin, authorities said."

Pharmacists Arrested. The Lexington (KY) Herald Leader (11/21) reports, "Two licensed Kentucky pharmacists were among nearly 70 people arrested yesterday afternoon in a huge crackdown on prescription drug abuse in Eastern Kentucky. David Gregory Jones, who owns RX Express in Ashland, and Dan Daffron, owner of Quick Script in Monticello, face federal indictments charging them with unlawful distribution of controlled narcotics. … U.S. Attorney Amul Thapar said law enforcement officials were still searching for more than 30 others suspected of trafficking prescription drugs."

The AP (11/21) reports police "are still looking for about 50 more alleged street-level drug dealers named in indictments. They also are looking for black market distributors from Georgia, Indiana, Ohio and Tennessee."

DOJ_NMG_0096529

Trainer Returns To Prison For Refusing To Testify Against Barry Bonds. The AP (11/21) reports Barry Bonds' personal trainer "returned to prison Monday afternoon for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury investigating Bonds' steroid use. Greg Anderson has twice been freed on technicalities. He was ordered to report after an appeals court last week upheld the entirety of his contempt-of-court citation. … The Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal has netted five convictions, including Anderson's, and one pending indictment."

"Operation Central Hub" Reveals Links To Drug Organizations In 5 States, Mexico. The Washington Times (11/21) reports DEA agents in Mississippi "assisted by local law-enforcement authorities, have arrested 27 persons, confiscated more than $15 million in cocaine and marijuana and seized cash and property worth $3 million as part of a lengthy undercover investigation. 'Operation Central Hub targeted and successfully dismantled one of the largest drug-trafficking operations ever known to operate in the state of Mississippi,' said DEA Assistant Special Agent Stephen Luzinski in the agency's Jackson, Miss., field office." Rusty Payne "said yesterday that the investigation also yielded criminal links to drug organizations in Dallas; Atlanta; Little Rock, Ark.; Detroit; and Laredo, Texas." Payne "said Operation Central Hub also produced important connections to Mexico, revealing direct criminal links and associations between select Mississippi organization heads and Mexican drug sources of supply."

The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (11/21) reports federal authorities "credit Gulfport-area narcotics agents with starting an investigation that has dismantled one of the largest drug-trafficking operations in Mississippi. The investigation has resulted in 27 arrests and the seizure of $15 million in drugs and $2.9 million in cash and other assets, said Stephen Luzinski, assistant special agent in charge of the DEA in Jackson. … Once the drug shipments crossed the U.S. borders, they were shuttled to various cities, primarily in 18-wheelers driven by employees of Mexican drug bosses. The drugs often were hidden in compartments or commingled with legitimate cargo loads."

ATF Finds Bomb, Components In Texas. The Nacogdoches (TX) Daily Sentinel (11/21, Taravella) reports, "The components of an explosive device and a psilocybin mushroom/marijuana-growing operation were discovered early Monday in a unit at Lakewood Village Apartments, by Nacogdoches police officers investigating an assault." The Sentinel continues, "One resident of the apartment unit was undergoing psychiatric evaluation Monday. At press time, no arrests had been made." The Sentinel adds, "Nacogdoches police and fire, along with University police officials and ATF agents cordon off a section of apartments where they say they found 'components' that could be used to craft an explosive device. … A joint investigation is being conducted by the Nacogdoches Police Department and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, according to Sgt. Greg Sowell, NPD community relations officer. … Although Sowell did not release the nature of the components seized by the ATF, he said the ATF is describing them as 'components that could be assembled as an improvised explosive device.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Texas Legislators Propose Stripping Benefits From Children Of Illegals. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/20) reported, "Children of illegal aliens who are awarded American citizenship because they were born in this country -- there is a rising movement to change that practice." CNN continued, "The Texas state legislature is considering a law to deny welfare and other benefits to the American citizen children of illegal aliens. … Sponsors hope it leads to a review of the 14th amendment to ensure citizenship to former slaves. Today it's widely interpreted as a guarantee of citizenship to virtually anyone born in this country." CNN adds, "Some lawmakers are trying to change the 14th amendment by granting automatic citizenship only to children with at least one parent who's a U.S. citizen or legal permanent resident. 88 lawmakers co-sponsored a Bill in the US House last year that would have made that change but it stalled in committee. The proposed Texas law is another example of local governments trying to crack down on illegal immigration because the federal government has failed to do it."

Immigration Enforcement May Be Causing Shortage Of Harvest Laborers. USA Today/Arizona Republic (11/21, Gonzalez) reports on C.R. Waters, "farm manager for a major vegetable distributor" who "is worried that when the vegetables are ready, there won't be enough laborers to get crops out of the fields to market." Waters, president of the Yuma Fresh Vegetable Association, says that "if growers can't find enough workers, some crops may go unpicked. That could increase prices at the supermarket, and create substantial financial losses for farmers." The shortages "are not limited to the Yuma region. Vegetable growers in Colorado, pear growers in northern California, and apple growers in Washington, all have lacked workers." Immigrants "have served as the backbone of the labor force in Yuma. Many farmworkers, however, have been drawn by steady jobs at housing developments and construction sites sprouting up around Yuma that pay better. The increased presence of Border Patrol agents also has scared some illegal workers already in the USA away from Arizona. In the past year, the Border Patrol also doubled the number of agents assigned to the Yuma sector to 551. Another 200 are on the way. T he buildup is having an effect, the Border Patrol reports. Arrests for the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 declined 14%, to 118,549 from 138,438 the year before."

DOJ_NMG_0096530

TAX:

IRS Says More Audits Lead To Increased Tax Revenue. The AP (11/21, Abrams) reports, "A taxpayer who made more than $1 million had a one-in-16 chance of being audited by the IRS in the fiscal year just ended, up slightly from the year before." The AP continues, "Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in a telephone news conference Monday that the Internal Revenue Service also paid more attention to the filings of small businesses that tend to underreport incomes and to the records of tax-exempt organizations." The AP adds, "Overall, enforcement revenues for fiscal 2006 were $48.7 billion, up from $47.3 billion. Revenues in fiscal 2005 had jumped 10 percent because of collections from a crackdown on improper tax shelters. … The 'tax gap,' the difference between what taxpayers owe and what is collected, has been estimated as $345 billion annually, and congressional Democrats coming to power see closing this gap as an important way to raise revenue without raising taxes. … Everson said that audits of individuals making $1 million or more increased to 17,015 from 12,835. That was an increase only from 6.1 percent to 6.3 percent because of the growing number of millionaires. About 1 percent of all taxpayers face audits.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Leadership Plans To "Punt" Spending Bills Until Next Congress. The AP (11/21, Taylor) reports, "Republicans vacating the Capitol are dumping a big spring cleaning job on Democrats moving in. GOP leaders have opted to leave behind almost a half-trillion-dollar clutter of unfinished spending bills. … The bulging workload that a Republican-led Congress was supposed to complete this year but is instead punting to 2007 promises to consume time and energy that Democrats had hoped to devote to their own agenda upon taking control of Congress in January for the first time in a dozen years. The decision to drop so much unfinished work in Democrats' laps demonstrates both division within Republicans ranks and the difficulty in resolving so many knotty questions in so short a time." According to the AP, "Driving the decision to quit and go home rather than finish the remaining budget work is a determined effort by a group of conservative Republicans to prevent putting a GOP stamp on spending bills covering 13 Cabinet Departments — and loaded with thousands of homestate projects derided as 'pork' by critics."

GOP To Challenge Application Of Pay-Go Rules. The Hill (11/21, Schor) reports, "Democratic leaders vowed even before their decisive Election Day victories to demonstrate their commitment to fiscal responsibility by restoring the pay-as-you-go statute, also known as pay-go, should they win back the majority. Pay-go under law, which expired in 2002, required any new mandatory spending or tax breaks to be offset or risk automatic across-the-board spending cuts. While budget analysts often point out that the hefty Democratic agenda for the 110th Congress would present an immediate challenge to pay-go, Republicans blast pay-go as a tax hike in budget-cutting clothing. … Though they have little hope of defeating a Democratic pay-go plan next year — the vice president cast a tiebreaking vote to stave one off in March — Republicans are poised to put up a fight for a pay-go rule that treats taxes and entitlements equally." The Hill notes, "The Congressional Budget Office treats reauthorized entitlements as pre-existing programs, relieving lawmakers of the need to find offsets under pay-go, but Democrats could tweak their new pay-go rule to apply to more entitlement spending."

Meanwhile, in an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/21, 2.04M) Roger C. Altman, deputy secretary of the Treasury in the first Clinton administration, and Alan S. Blinder, former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, write, "Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi has promised to restore pay-as-you-go financing -- a bipartisan set of budget rules that were originally adopted under the first President Bush, but then brushed aside under his son. Unfortunately, when paygo went, so did any pretense of fiscal discipline. A coincidence? We think not. The new Congress should bring back paygo immediately."

DOJ_NMG_0096531

Pelosi Stresses "Pocketbook" Issues, Pledges To Work With GOP. The AP (11/21, Abrams) reports House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi "said Monday her new Democratic majority will extend a hand to Republicans in moving the agenda of relieving the 'middle-class squeeze.'" Pelosi, "following a strategy meeting with the next House majority leader, Steny Hoyer…said she will meet with incoming House Minority Leader John Boehner and 'we'll find our common ground for the American people.'" Pelosi and Hoyer "repeated that in the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress that convenes in January, they will try to pass bills that directly affect the pocketbooks of working-class and middle-class people, including raising the minimum wage, cutting interest rates for student loans and allowing the Medicare program to negotiate lower drug prices. Other top priorities for January are lobbying reform, implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and rolling back subsidies to the oil industry."

The Washington Times (11/21, Fagan, 88K) reports Pelosi and Hoyer "said they expected bipartisan backing for their efforts to lessen the 'squeeze' on the middle class, specifically increasing the minimum wage, lowering Medicare prices and cutting interest rates on student loans. But Mrs. Pelosi said Democrats can pass those measures on the strength of their new majority alone, if need be."

The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A1, Wessel, 2.04M) reports, "By almost every measure, the gap between winners and losers in the American economy has widened over the past 20 years. In this month's election, anxiety about that gap was not far behind voter anger over Iraq and congressional corruption in driving Democrats to victory. 'We will make our economy fairer' vowed House Democrats, in a campaign manifesto. Now they're in a position to try, raising a big question: What can Democrats do to resist inequality in a way that doesn't choke off economic growth? Can government slice the economic apple more evenly without shrinking it?" The Journal add, "High on Democrats' to-do list is lifting the federal minimum wage. … But its potential to shrink the gap between the wealthiest and poorest wage-earners is limited, especially when wages at the top are soaring far away from the middle and bottom. Limiting pay at the top has proven tough." Rep. Barney Frank, in line to chair the House Financial Services Committee, "vows to push legislation that would force companies to provide more and clearer details of CEO pay, devise policies to recapture incentive pay if earnings are later restated, and require shareholder approval of 'golden parachute' payments to dismissed executives.'

Economists Predict "Gridlock" In New Congress. The Wall Street Journal's web-only "Washington Wire" column (11/21) reports, "Forty-six of 48 economists in the latest WSJ.com economic forecasting survey said they believe an increase in the federal minimum wage is very or somewhat likely to be passed in Congress and signed by the President. As for the raft of other economic issues at hand — tackling the finances of entitlement programs, dealing with foreign trade, addressing the tax code — the economists expect gridlock. Entitlement programs, such as Social Security and Medicare, should be the top priority for Congress when Democrats take control next year, the economists said. But 44 of the 48 economists believe it is somewhat or very unlikely any reform will be signed into law. The story is little different on other fronts: On ensuring that trade negotiations move forward, 31 say unlikley. On revising the Medicare drug benefit, 30 say unlikely. On extending tax breaks for the wealthiest: 37 say unlikely. Rescinding the breaks? Thirty-six."

Pelosi's Handling Of Intelligence Committee Could Undermine Her Leadership. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Neuman, Finnegan, 850K) reports that the "relationship" between Reps. Nancy Pelosi and Jane Harman "has been deteriorating since Harman returned to the House in 2001, according to those who know them, and the tension now threatens to complicate Pelosi's role as House speaker when the 110th Congress convenes in January. Pelosi indicated as early as last year that she intended to oust Harman from the Intelligence Committee — where Harman expected to become chairwoman once the Democrats won control of the House -- in favor of someone more to Pelosi's liking. The move has created dissension within the party. Some Democrats and foreign policy experts argued that Harman, a centrist on national security, is the most credible person for the job. … The coming battle over the Intelligence Committee leadership is turning into a showdown where the political has turned personal. And it could undermine the unity that the Democratic Party had hoped to show as it prepares to take the reins of power."

DOJ_NMG_0096532

House Democrats Putting Together Multifaceted Ethics Reform Package. The Washington Post (11/21, A4, Weisman, 690K) reports, "Despite divisions among Democrats over how far to go in revising ethics rules, House leaders plan a major rollout of an ethics reform bill early next year to demonstrate concern about an issue that helped defeat the Republicans in the midterm elections. But they will do it with a twist: Instead of forwarding one big bill, Democrats will put together an ethics package on the House floor piece by piece, allowing incoming freshmen to take charge of high-profile issues and lengthening the time spent on the debate. The approach will ensure that each proposal -- including banning gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists as well as imposing new controls on the budget deficit -- is debated on its own and receives its own vote. That should garner far more media attention for the bill's components before a final vote on the entire package. … Under that plan, freshmen would offer, over as many as five days in January, separate amendments to ban gifts, meals and travel financed by lobbyists, said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), incoming chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. New rules mandating the disclosure of all contacts with lobbyists would be another vote, as would a rule requiring that the sponsors of funding for home-state pet projects be identified."

Gates Meets With Levin. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/20) reported, "Robert Gates, named to replace Donald Rumsfeld as Secretary of Defense, went back to Capitol Hill today to seek support from both parties. Gates met with democratic Senator Carl Levin, the ranking Democrat and soon to be chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. He met with other Senators last week. He's expected to testify to the Armed Services Committee early in December. Democrats, as of now, are not opposing his nomination."

Gates Critic Accuses Him Of Being Blinded By Ideology. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (11/21, 850K) Jennifer Glaudemans, a former CIA analyst, writes, "fifteen years ago, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence asked me to testify at the confirmation hearings for Robert M. Gates, who had been nominated to be director of Central Intelligence. … I was asked to testify because of my knowledge about the creation of a May 1985 special National Intelligence Estimate on Iran that had been used to justify the ill-fated deals known as Iran-Contra." According to Glaudemans, "It was well known among analysts at the time that we would have a hard time getting Gates to sign off on analyses that did not fit his ideological preconceptions. All one had to do was look at his margin comments on controversial papers to know what was going on. Fortunately for him, classification and layers of bureaucracy kept those comments from public view. Today, however, many cases of politicized intelligence are a matter of public record. The National Security Archive, a not-for-profit organization, has posted many documents on its website that tell the story. … The nomination of Robert Gates to become secretary of Defense is an opportunity for him to demonstrate that he has learned from his mistakes and for Congress to reassert its constitutional authority."

Democrats Distance Themselves From Rangel's Support For Draft. NBC Nightly News (11/20, story 4, 2;05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Veteran New York Democratic Congressman Charlie Rangel says if the United States reinstated the draft, the American people would demand a swift end to the Iraq war. Rangel is himself a decorated veteran of the Korean War and is a critic of the Iraq war. His comments were meant to attract attention and today they did." NBC added Rangel "argues that today's all-volunteer military, with all its economic incentives, draws too heavily from low-income communities. A point the Pentagon disputes." NBC noted, "every key Democrat who has weighed in is opposed. … Rangel concedes there's no chance his proposal for a draft will become law. He's pushing it, he say, to make a point about a war he opposes."

The Washington Post (11/21, A4, Babington, White, 690K) reports, "The new Democratic-controlled Congress will not seriously consider reinstating the draft, even if concerns about the military's strength and resiliency grow, party leaders said yesterday. Key Democrats, including the incoming House speaker, House majority leader and chairmen of the House and Senate armed services committees, said they do not support a resumption of the draft. They predicted that the idea will gather little momentum in the 110th Congress. … Pentagon officials also restated their opposition to a draft." The Washington Times (11/21, Scarborough, Fagan, 88K) reports Rangel "periodically has urged a draft revival as a mechanism to criticize President Bush's handling of military deployments in the war on terrorism. He renewed his call again on Sunday, saying on CBS' 'Face the Nation' that 'if we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without the draft. ... I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session.'"

DOJ_NMG_0096533

NYTimes Criticizes Rangel's Proposal. The New York Times (11/21, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "There are many reasons why we are distressed to hear that Representative Charles Rangel of New York plans to reintroduce his annual measure aimed at resurrecting the draft when the Democrats take control of the House in January. We don't favor military conscription in general. And in this particular case, compelling military service won't achieve the things Mr. Rangel says he wants, either."

Democrats Expected To Boost Generic Drugs. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A4, Mathews, 2.04M) reports congressional Democrats' "vow to cut health-care costs might spell bad news for the brand-name pharmaceutical industry, but their efforts could provide new momentum for the generic-drug rivals' agenda." Boosting the "generics industry may prove to be a politically palatable way to follow up on the party's campaign promises. That's because making more room for generics is meant to cut prices through increased competition -- a solution that is easier to sell as pro-market than other proposals Republicans will portray as precursors to federal price controls." Laws "providing vital funding to the Food and Drug Administration and encouraging studies of drugs' use in children," which are up for renewal in 2007, "could provide gridlock-proof vehicles for generics provisions." The "most important question will likely be how and whether to create a legal pathway for the FDA to approve generic versions of biotechnology drugs." An "array of other measures aimed at smoothing the way for traditional generic drugs will also get attention, and could well be tucked into broader bills next year. Among them are proposals to limit branded-drug company tactics that thwart generic competitors, such as licensing additional companies to sell their drugs and thus diluting the profits to be made from copying them."

House Intelligence Panel Reinstates Clearances For Democratic Aide. The Washington Post (11/21, A3, Pincus, 690K) reports Larry Hanauer, a Democratic staff member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, "has had his security clearances reinstated and yesterday resumed work for the panel, ending a pre-election drama during which senior House Republicans alleged he may have leaked an intelligence report that was politically embarrassing to the Bush administration." Hanauer had "signed an affidavit that he did not 'discuss, disclose or cause to be discussed or disclosed' a National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq to any person 'affiliated with the press.'" Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) "wrote on Friday to ranking Democrat Jane Harman (Calif.) that the affidavit and the results of the committee staff director's interview of Hanauer were enough for him to rescind the punishment."

GOP Said To Ignore Election Results In Retaining Blunt. In a New York Times op-ed (11/21), Thomas Edsall says, "Last Friday, the Republicans gave the Democrats a gift that will keep on giving: Roy Blunt of Missouri. After an election repudiating the politics of Jack Abramoff and Tom DeLay, Republicans elevated Blunt from the number three spot in the leadership to number two." But Blunt "embodies the insidious, half-legal corruption that has permeated the G.O.P. majority since 1995. Blunt's election as minority whip, by a 137-to-57 margin, was a defiant Republican rejection of calls to clean up their act. Warnings by Blunt's challenger, John Shadegg of Arizona — 'We ceded our reform-minded principles in exchange for a ...tighter grip on power' — went unheeded."

Democrats' House Majority Equals GOP's High Water Mark. The New York Times (11/21, Toner, 1.16M) reports the new House of Representatives "looks increasingly like a mirror image of the old: the Democrats are likely to have a majority close to 232, which was the Republicans' majority in the departing Congress." Though that "may seem small compared with the Democrats' glory days," the "new Democratic majority is comparatively comfortable; 232 was the high-water mark for the Republicans in the 12 years they held power." The "strength of the Democratic showing in the elections this month was underscored by one statistic: they did not lose a single seat. They have gained 29 and, in New England, left the Republicans with just one House seat — that of Representative Christopher Shays of Connecticut — out of 22 in the region."

DOJ_NMG_0096534

Gains In Mountain West Could Show Long Term Competitiveness. USA Today (11/21, Kasindorf, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports a "wave of Democratic blue is splashing the fast-growing Rocky Mountain West, which until recently was so Republican that all eight states in the region went red for President Bush in 2004." Democrats are "celebrating their Election Day seizure of a U.S. Senate seat, a governorship, three U.S. House seats and other major offices in Rocky Mountain states. That extends a trend started in 2002 with winning three governor seats. Now, Democrats are hoping to break the Republican lock on the inland West in the 2008 presidential race." But the "question is whether the Western shifts indicate a fluke, the normal turn of a cycle or a permanent realignment." Some Republicans "say their party should gird for long-term trouble." GOP strategist Eddie Mahe said, "The West is not going to be as definitively conservative and Republican as it has been. The Rocky Mountain West is probably trending to look more like a lot of the remainder of the country, not quite as unique as it once was." USA adds Randy Pullen, "a Republican National Committee member from Arizona, says the election was a one-shot loss." Pullen said, "This election was a referendum on the president. We'll fare better in two years."

McClatchy (11/21, Thomma) reports a "lot of states that were dependably Republican Red are now some other hue. Call them purple, striped or polka-dotted - the fact is they're now open to Democrats." Though they "haven't gone completely over. But they did elect some Democrats, signaling that they're in play. And that means a new center of gravity for the Democrats as they struggle to define themselves by governing in Congress the next two years and setting the table for 2008, hoping to consolidate this year's gains and win back the White House." Democrats "gained in states such as Colorado, where they picked up the governor's office," and "also picked up Senate seats in once-solid red states, such as Ohio and Virginia. And they gained U.S. House of Representatives seats in such red states as Arizona, Colorado, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Tennessee and Texas." In part that "reflects changes within those states. Migration of Democrats from the North to the Sun Belt continues to dilute the Republican red zone. Immigration brings new voters from Mexico and farther south, the majority of them Democrats once they vote." It also "reflects changes in the Democrats, who this year recruited centrists and moderates to compete in culturally conservative areas."

Democrats' Failure To Win Southern Seats Analyzed. The New York Times (11/21, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports the South "largely sat out the drama of the recent election, apparently confirming its reputation as the Democrats' graveyard. An influential book published in October predicted as much, saying the party could safely avert its gaze from a region that could not be of help." Thomas F. Schaller of the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, author of "Whistling Past Dixie: How the Democrats Can Win Without the South," said, "They don't need the South to win. Why would Democrats go after the most rural, least unionized, most racially polarized, most evangelized region in the country?" The Times adds, "But not so fast. The thundering silence from the South may prove nothing more than what should be obvious: when Democrats do not compete, or compete unequally, they lose." Democratic Party officials in Tennessee "acknowledged that Mr. Ford was not an ideal candidate for the state, and not just because he was a black politician trying to climb the steep mountain of a white electorate. His own political baggage added significantly to his burden."

Democrats' Control Of Senate Said To Be Precarious. USA Today (11/21, Kiely, 2.27M) reports that when Democrats "take over the Senate in January, the party's bare two-vote majority will include three senators whose history shows they heed their own views more than those of any political leader." Just how "precarious is the Democrats' grip on power? The 51 senators who will make up the party's Senate caucus beginning in January include two who aren't officially Democrats — independents Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont — and Jim Webb of Virginia, who used to be a Republican." The 110th Congress "will be the first since 1976 to have two people who don't belong to the two major parties serving in the Senate at the same time. Republicans will occupy 49 of the chamber's 100 seats." In the "new Senate, where every roll call could be a squeaker, political hybrids Lieberman, Sanders and Webb stand to be key players. No wonder incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid lavished plum committee assignments on the trio last week."

Democrats Have Expensive List Of Priorities. USA Today (11/21, Wolf, 2.27M) reports Democrats "will return to power in Congress with a lengthy list of expensive priorities and a pledge to pay for them. Some budget experts say the dual goals don't add up." Democratic leaders have "endorsed an ambitious agenda that includes fortifying the military, improving homeland security, helping veterans, making college more affordable, establishing energy independence and boosting private savings rates. Annual tab: at least $79 billion, according to the National Taxpayers Union, a group opposed to higher taxes." The Democrats also "want to protect 20 million upper middle-income taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax. It was originally designed to ensure the rich didn't avoid paying taxes, but it threatens to raise taxes on the less affluent unless it's indexed for inflation. Cost: $50 billion a year, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation." And they want to eliminate the coverage gap in Medicare's prescription-drug program, which forces those with big drug bills to pay at least $3,600 out of pocket. Price tag: about $30 billion a year and rising, according to the Congressional Budget Office." Democratic leaders also say "they will reinstate budget rules that expired in 2002. They want statutory caps on most domestic and defense spending. They also want new tax cuts or benefit increases offset by other tax increases or spending cuts to keep the deficit from growing." Former Clinton White House chief of staff Leon Panetta said, "They can't basically have all of those priorities … without deciding who's going to pay the bill, and that means either cuts in spending or increases in revenue. There's going to be a huge temptation here to borrow the Republicans' example of borrow and spend."

DOJ_NMG_0096535

Study Recommends TSP Not Include REITs. The Washington Post's Stephen Barr, in his "Federal Diary" column (11/21) writes, "Don't bet the mortgage that the Thrift Savings Plan will add a real estate investment fund, or any other option, soon. A consultant hired by the TSP said yesterday that the retirement savings program for government employees is generally comparable to 401(k) and similar plans offered in the private sector and did not recommend any changes. … About 200 House members are co-sponsoring a bill that would add a real estate investment fund to the TSP, which prompted the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board to order the $140,000 study. After the board signaled opposition to adding a real estate option and sought the study, the chief sponsors of the bill put it on hold."

WSJournal Accuses White House Of "Pandering" To Textile Industry. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "Congress's failure to pass Permanent Normal Trade Relations with Vietnam embarrassed President Bush on his visit to Hanoi last week," but "this failure is an even bigger fiasco than it appears because of the White House's pandering to the U.S. textile industry." The Administration "chose to make one more protectionist concession," and "is promising to protect the US yarn industry against a surge in imports of other textile products." The "trade precedent here is dangerous, and probably violates World Trade Organization rules." This "fiasco is another illustration that tactical protectionist concessions rarely yield the strategic free-trade gains that supporters claim."

OTHER NEWS:

Leading Indicators Up In October; Existing Home Sales Down. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, Derby, 2.04M) reports, "An indicator of future economic activity inched higher in October, a private research group said Monday, suggesting that recent weakness in the housing market hasn't been severe enough to offset lower gas prices and a rising stock market. Separately, the National Association of Realtors reported that existing home sales in the third quarter dipped to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.27 million units nationwide, down 12.7% from the same period a year ago." The Conference Board "said its composite index of leading economic indicators for October rose by 0.2% to 138.3, after a revised 0.4% advance the month before. The index was equal to 100 in 1996. October's rise matched forecasters' expectation."

Economists Believe "Worst Of The Housing Bust Is Over." The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A2, Izzo, 2.04M) reports, "The worst of the housing bust is over, economists said by nearly 2-to-1 in the latest WSJ.com economic forecasting survey. But they still predict that the average selling price of a house will fall next year. … The 49 economists responding to the WSJ.com forecasting survey expect home prices, measured by the government's Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight index, to rise 2.8% this year and to fall by 0.5% next year. That contrasts with a 13.4% increase in 2005." USA Today (11/21, Knox, 2.27M), meanwhile runs a story titled "Homes' Losing Streak To Continue," citing the National Association of Realtors' numbers.

Stocks Mixed Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (11/20, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today a mixed finish. The Dow was down 26 points [to close at 12,316.54]. NASDAQ gained almost 7 points [to close at 2,452.72] on the day." The Financial Times (11/21, Mackenzie) notes "the S&P 500 slid 0.70 points, or 0.05 per cent to 1,400.50, having reversed an early fall below the 1,400 threshold it closed above on Friday." The Wall Street Journal (11/21, C1, McKay, 2.04M) also reports the stock numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0096536

WSJournal Says Mergers Show Economy Is In Good Shape. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "Yesterday's tally was at least $52 billion in M&A activity before the market opened for the normally slow Thanksgiving week." This "is a sign that the animal spirits that give the U.S. economy its dynamism are alive and well." As an economic matter, "it is largely irrelevant whether the shares are publicly traded or not," and "we doubt the employees of such profitable closely held concerns as Cargill or Koch Industries fret much that their shares aren't listed on any public exchange. What they care about is that their companies are successful." Meanwhile, "a vibrant market for corporate control keeps managers alert and hunting for new opportunities," and "whatever the bad individual bets, the current merger wave is a sign of continuing economic vitality."

Utility Industry Markets Seen As Flawed. The New York Times (11/21, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "A growing chorus of large industrial power users, municipal utilities and consumer groups say there is a reason the price of electricity has not fallen since the federal government opened the heavily regulated utility industry to competition a decade ago. The new markets, they argue, do not work right." They identify "a variety of reasons. For one thing, when electricity producers offer to supply power for use the next day, utilities pay everyone the highest price accepted." Critics "also contend that producers can withhold power or limit production, with little risk of penalty, even when demand is at its highest, meaning prices soar." The Times adds, "A coalition of large industrial companies filed a complaint in September, arguing that [FERC] had failed to ensure proper competition and that it had stymied efforts by others to investigate allegations of improper conduct by withholding some of the data it collects." FERC "dismisses the critics, saying that where it has determined that a market for electricity exists, the prices in that market are assumed to be 'just and reasonable,' the standard set in federal law."

Venezuelan Discounted Heating Oil Program Comes To Washington DC. The Washington Post (11/21, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports that today, "Minnie Davis, a 65-year-old widow who lives with three of her grandchildren on North Capitol Street, is scheduled to get some unusual visitors -- the Venezuelan ambassador, the chief executive of Citgo Petroleum and former congressman Joseph P. Kennedy II. The occasion: The arrival of a Venezuelan-backed program to bring 7.5 million gallons of deeply discounted heating oil to as many as 37,000 low-income households in Maryland, Virginia and the District and free heating oil to some homeless shelters." The Post adds, "The program has the blessings of Venezuela's populist President Hugo Chavez, who has used it to demonstrate that he cares about the poor in the United States as well as Venezuela -- while tweaking President Bush."

Family Of Slain Journalist Sues DC For $20 Million. The Washington Post (11/21, B1, Cauvin) reports, "The children of slain New York Times reporter David E. Rosenbaum filed a $20 million lawsuit yesterday against the District and Howard University Hospital, claiming that their father was a victim of official negligence and medical malpractice." The Post continues, "Filed in D.C. Superior Court, the lawsuit comes less than a month after a jury convicted a 42-year-old man of murdering Rosenbaum during a robbery. The other suspect in the case had pleaded guilty shortly before the two were to go on trial." The Post adds, "The crime occurred on a quiet Northwest Washington street in a usually safe part of the city, stunning the neighborhood and many people who had known Rosenbaum. He was 63 and had just retired after three decades at the Times. Days later, questions surfaced about the emergency care he received at the scene on Gramercy Street and at Howard University Hospital, where he died Jan. 8, two days after the attack. … Those questions led to one damning revelation after another. Rosenbaum was misdiagnosed as a drunk. The ambulance bypassed the closest hospital because one of the emergency medical technicians had personal business to attend to near Howard. At Howard, Rosenbaum was not seen by a physician for more than 90 minutes and was not given a neurological evaluation until he had been there almost four hours, the lawsuit says. Daniel and Dorothy Rosenbaum say in their suit that these actions contributed to their father's death."

DOJ_NMG_0096537

The Washington Times (11/21, Cella) reports, "The first hearing in the case is scheduled for February before Superior Court Judge Robert Morin. … The lawsuit follows closely the findings of the city's inspector general, who issued a report in June citing an 'unacceptable chain of failure' in the response." The Times adds, "According to the report, responding D.C. police officers failed to recognize that a crime had occurred, did not search the victim for identification and did not write an incident report. … The report said firefighters who responded to the scene did not assess or treat Mr. Rosenbaum correctly. They detected the odor of alcohol and discounted other potential causes of Mr. Rosenbaum's symptoms because of it. … In addition, the ambulance was delayed when the crew got lost on the way to the scene from Providence Hospital in Northeast, and the ambulance driver decided to take Mr. Rosenbaum to Howard University Hospital instead of the closer Sibley Memorial Hospital because Howard was nearer to her home."

The New York Times (11/21) also reports on the suit.

Typos In Bills Can Invalidate Laws, Redirect Funding. USA Today (11/21, Heath) reports, "If you're reading this in New York, you're probably too drunk to drive. … That's because lawmakers accidentally got too tough with a get-tough drunken-driving law, inserting an error that set the standard for 'aggravated driving while intoxicated' below the amount of alcohol that can occur naturally." USA continues, "The one-word mistake makes the new law unenforceable, says Lt. Glenn Miner, a New York State Police spokesman. However, drivers with a blood-alcohol content of 0.08% or higher can still be prosecuted under other state laws." USA adds, "In the legislative world, such small errors, while uncommon, can carry expensive consequences. In a few cases around the nation this year, typos and other blunders have redirected millions of tax dollars or threatened to invalidate new laws. … In Hawaii, for instance, lawmakers approved a cigarette-tax increase to raise money for medical care and research. Cancer researchers, however, will get only an extra 1.5 cents next year — instead of the more than $8 million lawmakers intended. That's because legislators failed to specify that they should get 1.5 cents from each cigarette sold, says Linda Smith, an adviser to Gov. Linda Lingle. … When such mistakes happen, they often come during the last-minute rush of legislative sessions, says Bruce Feustel, a senior fellow at the National Conference of State Legislatures. What's important, he says, is that lawmakers can fix them before they cause any harm." USA notes, "Courts generally intercede only in the most obvious cases, says University of Notre Dame law professor John Nagle. If judges tried to change every legislative error, Nagle says, 'you get the courts trying to figure out what they think is a mistake that might not be a mistake at all.'"

Buchanan Named Winner Of Disputed Florida House Seat. The New York Times (11/21, Aguayo, 1.16M) reports Republican Vern Buchanan was "named the winner on Monday in a disputed race in Sarasota where thousands of votes may have been lost by electronic machines," and Democrat Christine Jennings "immediately sued for a new election." Buchanan "won by 369 votes in the Nov. 7 election, according to results confirmed by the Florida Elections Canvassing Commission, which is made up of Gov. Jeb Bush; Tom Gallagher, the state chief financial officer; and Senator Daniel Webster of Winter Garden, all Republicans." The results "were confirmed in a machine recount and a manual one." Jennings "argued in documents filed in Leon County Circuit Court in Tallahassee that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned and not registered votes for her."

The Washington Post/AP (11/21, A5, Kaczor) reports Jennings asked "a judge to order a new election because of problems in Sarasota County, where more than 17,000 voters who cast ballots in other races Nov. 7 failed to vote in the congressional contest. That rate is nearly six times higher than in the other counties in the congressional district or on Sarasota's paper absentee ballots, Jennings alleges in her legal challenge. Though she lost in the other four counties in the district, Jennings did well in Sarasota County, winning there by a 6 percentage point margin." The lawsuit is "not Jennings' final option. She also could appeal the results to the House, which will be under Democratic control next year." The AP adds three other House races remain in limbo – Ohio's 2nd and 15th CDs and North Carolina's 8th CD. The AP adds, "Late Friday, elections officials in New Mexico's 1st District released an unofficial tally showing that Republican Rep. Heather Wilson won her race against Democrat Patricia Madrid by a margin of 879 votes out of more than 210,000 cast."

Congressional Quarterly (11/21, Benenson) reports Jennings "defeated Buchanan in Sarasota County, 53 percent to 47 percent. Democrats argue that if the undervote rate in Sarasota County was comparable to the undervote rate in the other counties, Jennings surely would have beaten Buchanan." Kathy Dent, "the Republican supervisor of elections in Sarasota County, and others have suggested that the campaign's negative tone may have turned people away from participating in this race. Other analysts say that voters might have overlooked the 13th District contest because of where the candidates' names were placed on Sarasota County ballots." But Jennings' attorney Kendall Coffey "said Monday that the machines were at fault and needed to be examined. 'This is clearly a case of machine error — not ballot design error and not voter error,' Coffey said."

DOJ_NMG_0096538

USA Today (11/21, 2.27M) reports the story in a brief section.

Extent Of Clinton's Campaign Spending Concerns Some Democrats. The New York Times (11/20, Kornblut, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "had only token opposition," but she "still spent more on her re-election — upward of $30 million — than any other candidate for Senate this year. So where did all the money go?" The campaign expenditures helped Clinton "win a margin of victory of more than 30 points. It helped her build a new set of campaign contributors. And it allowed her to begin assembling the nuts and bolts needed to run a presidential campaign." But Sen. Clinton "also bought more than $13,000 worth of flowers, mostly for fund-raising events and as thank-yous for donors. She laid out $27,000 for valet parking, paid as much as $800 in a single month in credit card interest and — above all — paid tens of thousands of dollars a month to an assortment of consultants and aides. Throw in $17 million in advertising and fund-raising mailings, and what had been one of the most formidable war chests in politics was depleted to a level that leaves Mrs. Clinton with little financial advantage over her potential rivals for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination — and perhaps even trailing some of them." The campaign's "financial record has fueled some criticism among Democratic activists and prompted concern among Mrs. Clinton's supporters, including complaints from some of her fund-raisers that her top aides exercised a lack of discipline." Beyond the "level of spending, there is also some concern within the Clinton camp about the adequacy of the controls on what is being spent." A "close friend of Mrs. Clinton, Maggie Williams, received a $37,500 consulting fee, paid to her firm, Griffin Williams Critical Point Management, at the end of July." When asked what the "payment was for, Mrs. Clinton's campaign aides checked and subsequently responded that the payment had been a mistake. They said it should have been for less than $5,000 to reimburse Ms. Williams, who served as chief of staff to Mrs. Clinton in the White House, for travel costs. They said Ms. Williams would return the extra money."

Women Made Historic Gains In This Year's Elections. The Christian Science Monitor (11/21, Feldmann, 59K) reports that when the "winners of the Nov. 7 elections are sworn in in January, Democratic women - and some Republicans - will have cause to cheer: The House will have its first female speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D) of California. Congress will have its largest corps of women ever - 16 in the Senate and at least 71 in the House, from both parties." Women will also "hold nine governorships, tied with the record set in 2004, and other elective statewide jobs that could position them for higher office." For the "first time, the chair of the National Governors Association will be a woman, Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) of Arizona." In state legislatures, "a record 2,426 women were general-election candidates, and unofficial results show 1,735 winning, which would be a record. In addition, women appear set to build on their record number of top leadership spots in state legislatures." But "ultimately, women remain far from achieving equality. In the next Congress, the record 87 women members will represent 16 percent of the 535 seats.'

Brownback To Announce Decision On Presidential Run Next Month. The AP (11/21, Hananel) reports Sen. Sam Brownback, "who is considering a White House bid in 2008, said Monday the Republican field has room for a 'full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative' and pledged to make a final decision next month." Brownback said he "was not discouraged from running by the Democrats' strong gains in this month's midterm elections, including majority control of the House and Senate." Brownback, "who was elected in 1996, is a forceful foe of abortion and embryonic stem-cell research. He also has taken a prominent role in the fight against genocide in Sudan's Darfur region."

McCain, Romney Seek To Bolster Support On Right. The New York Times (11/21, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Sen. John McCain "seemed to struggle yet again to firm up his position with the right on Sunday, as he faces the prospect of a primary fight with, among others, Gov.

DOJ_NMG_0096539

Mitt Romney of Massachusetts." McCain, appearing on "This Week" on ABC, "said he thought Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that established a constitutional right to abortion, should be overturned. But he sometimes strayed from the orthodoxy of social conservatism," presenting himself "as a supporter of the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy imposed by President Bill Clinton in 1993 to allow gay men and lesbians to serve in the military." While he "said he opposed same-sex marriage, he seemed to countenance civil unions." The Times adds, "And how did Mr. Romney spend his Sunday? He announced that he would ask his state's highest court to order a question banning same-sex marriage onto the ballot if legislators failed to do so."

Romney's Opposition To Gay Marriage Emerges As His Signature Issue. Fox News' Special Report (11/20, Hume) reports, "Massachusetts republican Governor Mitt Romney has let it be known he will make a decision next year about whether he will run for president in 2008. He appears to be developing his domestic platform with a strong position on gay marriage." Fox's Carl Cameron went on to report, "For Romney, a Mormon hoping to launch his presidential bid in January, undoing the Massachusetts Supreme Court's 2004 decision legalizing gay marriage is becoming a signature issue for 2008." Romney "wants voters to decide state policy with a ballot question defining marriage as between a man and woman. 10 days ago lawmakers refused to approve the referendum. Romney is suing. … Romney's rally" opposing the court's ruling "capped a weekend strategy meeting of more than 150 backers for his 2008 White House bid including an impressive array of the GOP's top operatives and fundraisers."

The Financial Times (11/21, Knight) reports Gov. Romney "appears to be on the verge of confirming what many political observers have long speculated: he intends to seek the Republican party's presidential nomination in 2008." Romney "convened a meeting of his top advisers and leading supporters at the weekend to discuss the potential launch of his White House bid. According to an aide to his Commonwealth Political Action Committee, the gathering was 'to thank those who have been supporters' over the past year." An aide to the committee said that Romney "planned over the coming holidays to discuss a possible presidential run with his family and will 'make a decision one way or another after the first of the year.'" Romney "has recently added several influential political consultants to his roster."

Hunter Seen As Having Potential In GOP Presidential Primary. In a Washington Times op-ed (11/21), talk radio host Rick Amato says, "As the line of Republican candidates running for the White House in 2008 begins to form, there is one candidate making preparations to run whose name voters outside of San Diego and Washington will be hard-pressed to recognize, but that could change in time. I'm speaking of the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, California Rep. Duncan Hunter." Hunter "should not be overlooked. He is a social conservative in what is expected to shape up as a socially moderate Republican field. Historically, social conservatives have done very well with voters in early primary states such as Iowa and South Carolina." Hunter is "further to the right on social issues than either John McCain, Rudy Giuliani or Mitt Romney."

Doro Bush Koch Seen As Contrasting Bush 41 And 43. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Wallsten, 850K) reports, "Dorothy Bush Koch is only now stepping into the spotlight with a new book about the first President Bush and about her family. And she has a few gently pointed words to say about life as the lone daughter in the country's most powerful political family. … One intriguing element of Koch's presentation Sunday" at the Miami Book Fair International," was what she implied but did not directly state about the contrasting images of the family's two presidents, one of whom is known as the consummate diplomat and the other who has labeled himself the 'war president.' Twice on Sunday, she noted that among the accomplishments she most admired about her father was his ability to manage the end of the Cold War 'without a shot being fired.'" The Times adds, "The title of Koch's book, 'My Father, My President: A Personal Account of the Life of George H. W. Bush,' suggests that Koch does have her favorite between the family's two presidents."

Hatch Aide Is New CEO Of Liquor Lobby. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (11/21, McCaslin) reports, "Craig Wolf, who served as counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee and specifically its chairman, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, has become the new president and CEO of the Wine & Spirits Wholesalers of America."

Thousands Protest Bush's Visit To Indonesia. NBC Nightly News (11/20, story 3, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported President Bush "is on his way back to the United States now at this hour after the last stop in his Asia trip. A short visit to Indonesia, the most populous Muslim nation in the world where thousands of angry protesters filled the streets to denounce him during the visit and the invasion of Iraq. … There was a brief flurry of excitement on the way to Vietnam. Air Force One was grounded with a tire problem. An alternative aircraft was mustered for the President's use. But just then, a spare tire was found at Ho Chi Minh airport in Vietnam." ABC World News (11/20, story 2, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) said Bush "shrugged off protests that greeted him in Indonesia as sign of a healthy democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0096540

Fox News' Special Report (11/20, Hume) reported the Indonesian president "was clearly taking a risk domestically by welcoming…Bush. About a mile from the presidential retreat, thousands of anti-American protesters took to the streets, calling President Bush a terrorist, while thousands more protested the visit 30 miles north in Jakarta. In Indonesia the negative view of the U.S. can be traced to one thing -- the Iraq War. In 2002, 61% of Indonesians had a favorable view of the US One year later, after the war started, that percentage was 15%." Bush was shown saying, "It's to Indonesia's credit that it's a society where people are able to protest and say what they think. It's not the first time, by the way, where people have showed up and expressed their opinion about my policies, but that's what happens when you make hard decisions." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/20) said Indonesia is "seething over Bush's invasion's of Iraq and Afghanistan."

The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "About 2,000 protesters from Muslim, student, and labor groups showed up to protest U.S. policies in Iraq and Afghanistan, saying it was Bush who was spreading terror. In Surabaya, East Java, about 100 students were reported to have clashed with police at a McDonald's after staging a protest at the US Consulate. No arrests were reported."

The New York Times (11/21, Sanger, 1.16M) says Bush, "whose visit to Indonesia three years ago was consumed with talk of counterterrorism, this time appeared focused on fighting bird flu, bolstering a small program to aid Indonesian schools and promoting growth." Also, "in an afternoon of meetings at an ornate presidential palace that is a legacy of Dutch colonial rule, Mr. Bush held a closed-door session with what the White House called 'civic leaders' of Indonesia."

The Financial Times (11/21, Aglionby) headlines its report "Bush Brushes Off Protests Over Middle East," while USA Today (11/21, Jackson, 2.27M) titles its story "Bush Calls Indonesian Protests A Good Thing." Bush is quoted saying, "Indonesia is an example of how democracy and modernization can present an alternative to extremism."

Bush Tells Indonesian Boy About His Childhood Hobbies. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (11/21, McCaslin) reports, "We couldn't help but be amused yesterday when President Bush, visiting a pair of faux Indonesian classrooms in Jakarta, was asked by a small boy what his hobbies had been when he was growing up. Observed the White House pool report: 'Bush didn't miss a beat: 'Baseball. I liked baseball. That was my hobby. Sports.' Then, perhaps realizing that sports was the wrong thing to push in a classroom, even a fake one, the president added: 'The best thing that I did was to learn how to read.' Continuing in that vein, the last thing we heard before being pushed out was Bush cautioning the kids that 'there are people who watch TV too much.'"

US Approves Most IAEA Aid For Iran Nuclear Sites. The AP (11/21, Jahn) reports Washington "said Monday it would accept Iran's request for U.N. aid on seven nuclear projects but urged the [IAEA] to deny assistance for a plutonium-producing reactor that can be used to make a bomb." Those decisions "reflected U.S. recognition that it was futile to try to block IAEA help to Iran on all eight projects because of opposition by most of the agency's 35-nation board. It also appeared prompted by an IAEA ruling that neither the reactor nor the other projects posed a proliferation threat." The AP says diplomats "suggested it could reflect a U.S. decision to tread relatively lightly while Washington weighs the possibility of direct dialogue with Iran on reducing violence in Iraq."

Israeli Intelligence Reports Progress On Iran's Nuclear Testing. The Jerusalem Post (11/21) reports, "Iran has developed and tested a trigger device for a nuclear bomb, Israeli agents stationed there have told the White House, according to a report published in The New Yorker Monday morning." According to the report, "the White House received the information but did not pass it on to the CIA," and "in the past six months, Israel and the United States had been working together to support a Kurdish resistance group known as the Party for Free Life in Kurdistan." The Israeli intelligence "presented a stark contrast to recent CIA estimates on Iran's nuclear program, which claimed that Teheran was far from attaining a nuclear bomb." The New Yorker article "seemed to suggest that there was a difference of opinion between the CIA, the White House and the Pentagon regarding the progress of Iran's nuclear weapons program." The White House "reportedly was refusing to reveal to the CIA the source of the Israeli information, the location of the site of the experiments, or the number of tests that had been carried out."

DOJ_NMG_0096541

Gideon Rachman Blasts "Folly" Of Preventive War In Mideast. In his Financial Times (11/21) column, Gideon Rachman writes about thoughts of bombing Iran, "Military experts talk of the need for hundreds or thousands of bombing raids, stretched over many days – and even that might merely set back Iran's nuclear programme a few years. Iran would also certainly retaliate. It could unleash Shia militias on allied troops in Iraq, encourage Hizbollah and Hamas to stage new attacks on Israel and block the Strait of Hormuz, through which 40 per cent of the world's oil flows. ... If Iraq has taught America and its allies anything, it is that it is much easier to start a war in the Middle East than to finish one."

Israeli Military Chief Starts Investigation Of Cluster Bomb Use. The New York Times (11/21, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "The Israeli military chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, ordered an inquiry on Monday to determine whether the armed forces had followed his orders when it used large numbers of cluster bombs during the month long war with Hezbollah in Lebanon this summer." Many human rights groups "have criticized Israel's use of cluster bombs in the fighting, saying they were dropped in or near populated areas." The general "did not specify what orders he gave regarding cluster munitions, and it was not clear whether he prohibited them, or placed certain restrictions on their use." Israel "has received cluster munitions from the United States for many years," and also makes its own," and in August, the State Department "began investigating whether Israel used cluster bombs in Lebanon in violation of secret agreements that restrict their use." In "a separate development, an aide to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said the president's Fatah movement had suspended talks with the militant faction Hamas on a national unity government. "

Hariri Probe Said To Have Caused Rift In Lebanese Government. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) Michael Young, opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine, writes, "The Syrian regime is discovering what a nuisance Rafik Hariri, the late Lebanese prime minister, can be. Last Friday, the U.N. Security Council approved a draft plan for a mixed Lebanese-international court to try those responsible for Hariri's assassination on Feb. 14, 2005. Damascus, the main suspect in the crime, is palpably anxious. That anxiety played out in Lebanon 10 days ago, when six ministers named by pro-Syrian politicians resigned rather than take part in Beirut's formal endorsement of the tribunal proposal. … Five of the six ministers who resigned were appointed by or affiliated with the two main Shiite parties, Hezbollah and the Amal movement, while the sixth is Lebanese President Emile Lahoud's man. Their resignations came amid a struggle for power between pro-Syrian groups and the anti-Syrian parliamentary and cabinet majority -- dating back to the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah."

Postwar Lebanon Cynical About Future. The Washington Post (11/21, A22, Shadid, 690K) reports that in Beirut, "Lebanon has emerged from the 33-day war with Israel only to find itself lately in one of the most pronounced political crises it has experienced in a generation." On Sunday, Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, said "the government now faced a choice: either resign in favor of what he called a national unity government or hold early parliamentary elections," an "if neither demand is met, he said, his followers have planned days, even weeks, of protests to topple a government he said was beholden to the United States." Still "reeling from this summer's war and mired in economic troubles," Beirut shows "little sign of enthusiasm" for demonstrations and revival.

Palestinian Unity Government Talks Suspended. In a lengthy piece, the AP (11/21, Daraghmeh) reports Hamas and Fatah "froze talks Monday on forming a Palestinian unity government, Fatah officials said, a new setback in efforts to form a more moderate coalition acceptable to the West. The deep differences raised questions about the ability of the sides to reach a deal that could end months of painful economic sanctions." The AP notes the "sudden announcement of [the] breakdown," saying the two parties "appeared to be heading toward formation of a Cabinet of independent experts to replace the Hamas-led body." However, it was not "clear whether the suspension was the sign of a real crisis or simply a negotiating tactic by Abbas' weakened Fatah Party." The AP adds, "Even if the sides reach agreement, it remains unclear whether the 'division of labor' formula, with the moderate Abbas handling diplomacy while Hamas sticks to its hard line, would be acceptable to the West." Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni "said Monday that Syria was the reason talks between the Palestinian factions have been troubled."

DOJ_NMG_0096542

Israeli Maps Show Settlements In Land Owned By Palestinians. The New York Times (11/21, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports that yesterday in Jerusalem, "an Israeli advocacy group, using maps and figures leaked from inside the government, says that 39 percent of the land held by Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank is privately owned by Palestinians." The data "indicate that 40 percent of the land that Israel plans to keep in any future deal with the Palestinians is private," and the new claims regarding Palestinian property are said to "come from the 2004 database of the Civil Administration, which controls the civilian aspects of Israel's presence in the West Bank." Peace Now, an Israeli group that advocates Palestinian self-determination in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, "plans to publish the information on Tuesday." Miri Eisin, a spokesperson for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said that "Israeli officials would have to see the data and the maps and added that ownership is complicated and delicate."

Train Bombing In India Kill 8, Wound 60. The AP (11/21, Banerjee) reports, "A bomb exploded and tore through two cars of a passenger train Monday in a remote area of eastern India, killing at least eight people and wounding about 60 others, officials and Indian media said." The bomb "had been planted in one of train's cars and exploded about 6:20 p.m. near the Belacoba station, about 345 miles north of Calcutta." PTI, citing railway police official Tushar Bhattacharya, reported that "the death toll had climbed to eight with about 60 wounded." Prasad Ranjan Roy, Home Secretary of West Bengal state, said "initial suspicion pointed to either Maoist rebels or Assamese militants," and "he suggested the blast could be the work of the relatively small Kamtapur Liberation Organization, an Assamese group tied to the larger United Liberation Front of Asom." However, he "cautioned," and said, "We are trying to get details."

Natsios Says US Could Opt For "Plan B" To End Darfur Violence Next Year. The Washington Post (11/21, A24, Kessler, Boustany, 690K) reports President Bush's Darfur representative, Andrew Natsios, "said yesterday that the Bush administration will resort to an unspecified 'Plan B' if the Sudanese government does not agree by Jan. 1 to complete negotiations on an expanded international peacekeeping force for its troubled Darfur region." He "declined several times to explain what he meant by 'Plan B,' saying he was not trying to make a threat." The US and the UN recently "backtracked" on the concept of a UN-led force "and instead sought to win the government's agreement for a hybrid force of African Union and U.N. troops." Yesterday, Natsios "rejected Khartoum's claims that a U.N.-led international force would mean a return to colonialism."

AFP (11/21) says Natsios "warned Khartoum to meet a January 1 deadline for full acceptance of a UN plan to deploy international peacekeepers to Darfur or face tougher action." He also "said the Khartoum government had yet to give its approval for the timing, size and command structure of the peacekeeping operation." Natsios "refused to elaborate on what Plan B would entail if no response was forthcoming by January 1 beyond saying it's 'a different approach' to the negotiated deployment of peacekeepers."

The AP (11/21, Montesquiou) notes the Sudanese government "hailed a new agreement with the United Nations over peacekeepers in Darfur as a diplomatic breakthrough for Sudan, but said serious differences remain over the force's makeup and command." Despite the announcement, "there were signs the government might still resist hopes for a robust U.N. deployment to bring an end to the continuing bloodshed." Khartoum's "comments could signal that Sudan will try to reduce the U.N. role in the peacekeeping force. But they could also be part of an effort by the government to save face, after abandoning its earlier position that U.N. troops were unacceptable."

NYTimes Suggests Taking More Action For Darfur, Chad Genocide. In the New York Times (11/21, 1.16M), columnist Nicholas Kristof writes that the spread of genocide into Chad was not or is not "inevitable." There was no response "partly because of reluctance from the White House and Pentagon, and partly because of resistance from France and other countries," so the "genocide in Darfur has steadily expanded." Kristof suggests writing to "embassies of countries like France and Egypt that could play especially crucial roles," and also to China, "which provides Sudan the guns." In the news industry, "including Arab and European television networks, could use a few pokes to appreciate that genocide is newsworthy." The "heroic efforts of aid groups in Darfur and Chad — 13 aid workers have been killed in Darfur since May — deserve support as well," and "they can use our backup."

DOJ_NMG_0096543

LATimes Says Libyan Dictator's Statements Of Darfur Are "Absurd." The Los Angeles Times (11/21, 850K) editorializes that Libyan dictator Moammar Kadafi's statement that "Western countries and America are not busying themselves out of sympathy for the Sudanese people or for Africa but for oil and the return of colonialism to the African continent," is "absurd." Not only that, but the UN "already has 10,000 peacekeepers in southern Sudan sent in 2005 to stabilize a separate conflict there, and to date they haven't seized any Sudanese oilfields or founded any colonies," and it's "reckless." A "deal to finally end the atrocities in Darfur is teetering on a knife's edge," and before "an international force can be mobilized, there are still delicate political decisions to be made, such as whether it would be empowered to protect villagers or simply monitor the carnage." Resolving them will "require an unusual degree of unity among players as diverse as the Arab League and the UN Security Council."

Darfur Said To Highlight West's Inconsistency In Tackling "Totalitarianism." In her column in the Washington Post (11/21, 690K), Anne Applebaum says groups working to end the genocide in Darfur "have "made an impact. Indeed, it is fair to say that were it not for the Christian, Jewish, human rights, genocide-prevention groups and others that have been talking about Sudan with such dedication, the massacres of Darfur might not be on the international agenda at all." She says she "can offer no scientific explanation as to why the tragedy of Darfur conjures up the specter of history's judgment and why other tragedies do not." Applebaum posits that, "because it seems to be in no one's 'interest' to do so, a call for U.N. intervention in Darfur surely feels … like an act of real charity, and not more evidence of the West pursuing its interests." She continues, "Taking a stand against genocide in Sudan does not require anyone to take a parallel stand on communism, the war on terrorism or the war in Iraq." In short, "it is still possible to think of Darfur as an appropriate target for neutral humanitarianism." Applebaum says historians "will also judge us by the consistency with which Western and international institutions battled sophisticated totalitarianism in all its forms," and she concludes, "The creation of an international coalition to end genocide is a stunning achievement, but its goals are still not deep or broad enough."

Muslim Population Increases In Russia. The Washington Times (11/21, Mainville, 88K) reports, "Low domestic birthrates and rising immigration from the former Soviet republics are producing explosive growth in Russia's Muslim community, which is on a track to account for more than half the population by midcentury." Russia's overall population is "dropping at a rate of 700,000 people a year," but "Russia's Muslims, however, are bucking that trend." By 2015, Muslims "will make up a majority of Russia's conscript army and by 2020 one-fifth of the population." Four mosques in Moscow serve "a Muslim population of about 2.5 million," but "as in many countries with growing Islamic populations, tensions are also on the rise." "Most Muslims living in Russia are not immigrants, but natives of lands seized by the expanding Russian empire."

Muslim Women Gather In New York To Issue Fatwas. The Christian Science Monitor (11/21, Ben Arnoldy, 59K) reports that in a meeting in New York, "Muslim women from 25 countries began laying groundwork for the first international all-female council formed to issue fatwas," and their idea is "to ensure that women's perspectives on Islamic law become part of religious deliberation in the Muslim world - particularly on issues such as domestic violence, divorce, and inheritance." The New York gathering, "called the Women's Islamic Initiative in Spirituality and Equity, plans to seat the new council - perhaps seven members - within a year." The group "also plans to give scholarships for more women to pursue advanced training - open to women in places like Morocco, Egypt, and Iran - in an effort to broaden the qualified pool." Conference attendees say "a muftia council could prompt wider support for women's struggles" The meeting "used money from nongovernmental foundations, some based in the US."

Losing Candidate Declares Himself President Of Mexico. The AP (11/21, Stevenson) reports, "Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador launched a parallel government Monday and prepared to swear himself in as Mexico's 'legitimate' president, a ceremony the leftist hopes will keep alive protests to undermine the man who officials say defeated him at the polls." The "inauguration ceremony is the latest chapter in Lopez Obrador's unsuccessful battle for the presidency. He claims fraud and dirty campaign tactics were responsible for President-elect Felipe Calderon's narrow victory in the July 2 vote, and his parallel government could spend the next six years calling for street protests that have already dented the economy and prompted travel warnings from the U.S. Embassy." The New York Times (11/21, McKinley, 1.16M) headlines its story "Yes, He Lost Mexico's Vote, So He's Swearing Himself In," and begins its story saying, "Don Quixote, move over." The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Tobar, 850K) runs a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0096544

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) says, "The next test of Mexico's rule of law will come December 1 when president-elect Felipe Calderón is supposed to be sworn in. Hard liners are already pledging to crash the event. Perhaps this time Mexico's elected leadership will draw a line in the sand."

Researchers Find Unconventional Transmissions Of AIDS In Africa. The New York Times (11/21, Rosenthal, 1.16M) reports, "As researchers spend more time studying Africa's overwhelming pediatric AIDS problem, they are finding that the routes of transmission may be different than in the industrialized countries, and that strategies for preventing the disease's spread must be adapted to local realities." Researchers have agreed that "a host of traditional ceremonies and practices are creating transmission routes unique to Africa — dangers that have, up to now, been ignored." There are naming ceremonies "that require nursing," and also "a host of potentially even more hazardous moments, such as when body fluids of different people are mixed." Researchers "are just beginning to study the role of these common traditional practices of rural Africa, to determine if they account for a small or large portion of H.I.V. transmission."

Commission Blames Nepali King For Bloody Violence On Demonstrators. The Washington Times/AP (11/21, Gurubacharya) reports, "A government commission investigating Nepal's bloody crackdown on pro-democracy demonstrators blamed the violence on King Gyanendra and recommended punishing him, officials said yesterday." The commission "also found 201 officials in the king's administration responsible for the bloody crackdown," including "the chiefs of police and the armed forces." After receiving the commission's report, Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala "vowed to punish those held culpable for the crackdown, in which hundreds were injured and hundreds detained, with some claiming torture." The commission "did not recommend a punishment, and Nepal has no laws addressing crimes committed by a king." A yet-to-be elected constituent assembly "is expected to decide the monarchy's fate," and Gyanendra "has already been stripped of his powers, command over the army and his immunity from prosecution."

NYTimes Says UN Human Rights Council Needs Improvement. The New York Times (11/21, 1.16M) editorializes, "The new Human Rights Council now seems headed for a failing midterm grade." For the "world's worst and most consistent human rights violators, like China, Iran, North Korea, Myanmar and Sudan, there has been a tendency to muffle words and conclusions and shift the focus," but the council seems to "change personality turning harshly critical and uninterested in broader contexts." The UN should be "more than a self-protective club of sovereign states."

WPost Suspects Putin Is Behind Poisoning. The Washington Post (11/21, 690K) editorializes, "There's no concrete evidence as yet that the FSB" or Russian President Vladimir Putin "is behind the poison attacks -- but there is plenty of reason for suspicion." The Post adds, "Does Mr. Bush regret having given so much support to a leader who has dismantled his country's nascent democracy and whose opponents keep turning up in hospitals and morgues?"

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Iraq Considers Three-Way Talks With Iran And Syria."
"Navajos' Desert Cleanup No More Than A Mirage."
"Pelosi-Harman Friction Strains Democrats' Unity."
"No Prison For Weller, No Closure For Others."
"King Of The College Cowboys."
"Simpson Book, TV Plan Dropped."
"Private Cash Fuels Boom In Takeovers."

USA Today:

"Examples."
"Small Mistakes Cause Big Problems."
"Many DNA Matches Aren't Acted On."

DOJ_NMG_0096545

"Chemical Weapons' Disposal Delayed."
"Status Of Stockpiles."

New York Times:

"Israeli Map Says West Bank Posts Sit On Arab Land."
"New York Court Cuts Aid Sought By City Schools."
"In New Orleans, Rust In The Wheels Of Justice."
"In Web World, Rich Now Envy The Superrich."
"Clinton Won Easily, But Bankroll Shows The Toll."
"Under Pressure, News Corp. Pulls Simpson Project."

Washington Post:

"Ramsey Ally Named Chief."
"Flaws Cited In Effort To Train Iraqi Forces."
"News Corp. Pulls Plug On O.J. Book, Fox Special."
"Spoofer O Iraq's Chaos Becomes A Victim."
"Polygamists Out Of The Closet."
"Passing The Class But Failing The Test."

Washington Times:

"Fenty Taps Ramsey Replacement."
"Muslim Birthrate Worries Russia."
"Rangel's Call For New Military Draft Rebuffed."
"Iraq, Iran And Syria Set 3-Way Talks."
"Holiday Travelers Brace For Onslaught."
"Partisan Agony, Ecstasy Reflected In Hill Mood Swings."
"Simpson Book, TV Special Canceled."

Detroit Free Press:

"Bo's Spirit Lives At Big House."
"Suspect In 2 Homicides Was Let Go In '98 Killings."
"Expert A Magic Ride, Warn Temps On Route."
"Fox Chase Case On Simpson Plans."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"DA To Re-Examine Police Shootings."
"OJ Book, TV Show Called Off After Furor."
"Delta Recalls 700 Mechanics."
"Few In Congress Served In Military."

Houston Chronicle:

"Striking Janitors Ok Deal."
"Continental Keeps Wary Eye On Merger Bids."
"The Last Stand."
"After 20 Years, local Cold Case Gets Warm."
Street-Racing Danger Flares Up In Fatal Crash."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Iraq Summit-Iran; Bush In Indonesia; Former Russian Spy Poisoned; FOX Cancels OJ's Project; Michael Richards Yells Racial Slurs; Dropping Out Of High School; Deadly School Bus Accident; Ending Drinking & Driving; Kidney Transplant Triangle.

CBS: Deadly School Bus Accident; School Buses & Safety Belts; FOX Cancels OJ's Project; Iraq Summit-Iran; New Iraq Strategy; Iraq's Future; Kidney Transplant Triangle; Michael Richards Yells Racial Slurs; Giving Back.

NBC: New Iraq Strategy; Iraq Summit-Iran; Bush Returns Home; Rangel's Call For The Draft; Former Russian Spy Poisoned; Stock Market; Chinese Steeling Defense Secrets; Deadly School Bus Accident; FOX Cancels OJ's Project; Ambassador Hotel; The Emergency Room Wait.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Syria And Iraq-Diplomatic Ties; Duncan Hunter-Troop Redeployment; Barack Obama-Troop Redeployment; Bush-Iraq Troop Levels; Six-Party Talks With North Korea; Michael Richards Apologizes For Racial Slurs; Highway Safety-Car Rankings.

NPR: Pelosi-No Plan To Pursue Draft Proposal; Duncan Hunter-Troop Redeployment; Bush-Hawaii; Bush-Iraq Troop Levels; Bush-Indonesia; Houston-Janitor Strike Ends; Annan-Biological Weapons; Barry Bonds' Personal Trainer Refuses To Testify; Jennings-Disputing Election Loss in Florida; FL NAACP-Silent Protest Of Governor-Elect.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends breakfast with troops, Officers Club, Honolulu; attends briefing at the US Pacific Command, Honolulu.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: HOMELAND SECURITY _ 9 a.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a briefing on homeland security and improving state, local and federal coordination, with Susan Reingold of the Office of the Director of National Intelligence. Location: 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

IRAQ-OFFICER _ 9 a.m. Telephone news conference with Lt. Ehren Watada, the first Army commissioned officer to refuse to go to Iraq. Contacts: Trevor Fitzgibbon, 202-246-5303. Notes: Callin number: 877-7079628; passcode: Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0096546

HOLIDAY SPENDING _ 10 a.m. The Consumer Federation of America and the Credit Union National Association release their annual consumer survey on holiday spending plans and concerns about debt levels. Location: National Press Club.

SAVINGS-PENSIONS _ 10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The joint Brookings Institution-Georgetown Public Policy Institute Retirement Security Project (RSP) host a panel discussion of economic analysts who will address the next steps for Congress. Participants will consider the impact of the new pension law, the mechanics of the Automatic 401(k), and discuss a new paper from RSP that estimates that these and related proposals that would increase net national savings by around $75 billion. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

PORT-BORDER SECURITY _ 12 p.m. Equity International holds a briefing on border and port security. Location: National Press Club.

BIOFUEL-FARMERS _ 12:30 p.m. The Biotechnology Industry Organization holds a news conference to release a report outlining current and future feedstock supply challenges for the biofuel industry. Location: National Press Club.

LAZEAR-ECONOMIC FORECAST _ 1 p.m. CEA Chairman Ed Lazear will hold a conference call to discuss the Administration's economic forecast Notes: to participate, please call 866-207-9086. Chair is White House.

VEHICLES-FUEL EFFICIENCY _ 1:30 p.m. The Civil Society Institute holds a telephone news conference on a new poll showing that nearly all US consumers expect a sharp increase in gasoline prices in the near future and that, despite lower pump prices in recent months, there has been no slump in demand for hybrids and other fuel-efficient vehicles. Notes: To participate, dial 800-860-2442. Ask for ``The Washington Big 3 Survey'' news event.

MASSACHUSETTS V. EPA _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute Federalism Project hosts a panel disussion on the upcoming U.S. Supreme Court's hearing of an oral argument in Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). In this case, part of a broader campaign for the regulation of carbon dioxide, several states and environmental organizations have argued that the EPA must regulate CO2 under the Clean Air Act. Panelists: Joathan H. Adler, Case Western Reserve Law School; Lisa Heinzerling, Gorgetown University Law Center; Barry Rabe, University of Michigan; and Edward W. Warren, Kirkland & Ellis. Moderator: Michael S. Greve, AEI. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, AEI 1150 17th St. NW.

RUSSIA-WTO _ 3 p.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a seminar on Russia's accession to the WTP, with Assistant USTR Dorothy Swoskin, Nick Giordano of the National Pork Producers Council, Randi Levinas of the U.S.-Russia Business Council, others. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2006EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Defends Domestic Wiretapping 3
Judge Rejects PAWF Request For NSA Documents 4
Human Rights Groups Back Democrats On Detainee Law Overhaul 4
Reno Joins Other Former DOJ Officials In Challenging Terror Law 4
Islamic Charity Distances Itself From Sudanese Group With al-Qaida Links 4
Judge Rules US Not Required To Transfer Detainee For Medical Treatment 5
Second Man Charged In Hezbollah TV Station Access Case 5
Prodi Sacks Intelligence Chiefs Over Suspected CIA Kidnapping 5
Germany Detains Six, Releases Five In Suspected El Al Bomb Plot 5

Homeland Response:

ACLU To Release Documents Detailing Pentagon Records On Antiwar Groups 6
Six Imams Removed From US Flight 6
Hawley Urges Travelers To Learn Rules Before Going To The Airport 6
Pentagon Delays Chemical Weapons Destruction 6

War News:

Bush Says He Hasn't Decided On Changes To Iraq Strategy 7
Wolf, Rice Were Early Supporters Of Iraq Study Group Proposal 8
Cost Of Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan Nears $500 Billion 8
Iraqi President To Hold Talks With Iranian, Syrian Leaders 9
Army's Effort To Train Iraqi Forces Reportedly Beset By Setbacks 10
More Than 1200 Iraqi Civilians Have Been Killed This Month 11
Pro-Saddam TV Station Reemerges After Being Banned 11
Blair Meets With Karzai In Kabul, Visits British Troops 11
Taliban Reportedly Reliant On Profits From Opium Production .. 11

DOJ:

GAO Finds DOJ Making Progress On Information Classification 12

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ Drops Appeal Of Lay Ruling 12
Cyberonics Head Resigns Amid Expanding Options Probe 12
Former Capital One CFO Settles Insider Trading Charges For $1.8 Million 13
South Korean Prosecutors Indict Lone Star, KEB On Stock-Manipulation Charges 13
Coehlo's Stock Options Draw SEC Scrutiny 13
Redstone's Nephew Sues Over Family Trust Management 13
Insiders Made Millions Trading In Money-Losing Firm's Stock ... 14
Paulson Criticizes Sarbanes-Oxley Law 14
Senate Hearing To Examine SEC's Effectiveness 15

Criminal Law:

FBI Expanding Global Presence To Fight Cyber Crime 15
Three Gang Members Sentenced To Life For Targeting Black Victims 15
US Backs Off Prison Restrictions For Aryan Brotherhood Members 15
Ohio Republican Fundraiser Sentenced For Embezzlement 16
Pennsylvania Man Charged In West Virginia Death Could Face Death Penalty 16
FBI Recovers Stolen Goya 16
Judge Rules Accused Cuban Spy's Alleged Confession Admissible At Trial 16
Former Daley Patronage Chief Sentenced To Four Years In Prison 17
NYC Bus Driver's Union President Charged With Racketeering, Extortion 17
Jeffs Evidence Hearing Begins Today 17
USA Today Finds Inaction On Many DNA Matches 18
New Orleans Defendants Freed Because Of Evidence Problems After Katrina 18
WPost Praises Outgoing Police Chief Ramsey 18

Civil Law:

Attorneys Argue Validity Of 1998 Law Aimed At Curbing Online Pornography 19
Smokers Sue Phillip Morris For Lung Scans 19
Judge Strikes Down Bank Of America Ruling 20
Court Rules Internet Users, Providers Not Liable For Posted Defamatory Material 20

Civil Rights:

Democrats Will Target Election "Robo Calls." 20
Georgia Prosecutors Launch Review Of Excessive Force Cases21
UCLA Officer In Taser Video Has Been Subject Of Two Other Use-Of-Force Complaints 21

Judge Strikes Las Vegas Ban On Feeding Homeless In Parks .. 21
WPost Says Both Parties Should Embrace Ryan Abortion Bill ... 21

Antitrust:

Suspected Municipal Bond Abuses Raise Tax Questions 22
Private Equity Firms Fuel Takeover Boom 22
Freeport To Acquire Phelps Dodge In Copper Merger..... 22
Mattel Lays Claim To MGA Entertainment's Bratz Line 23
Probe Finds Cephalon Used Questionable Tactics To Sell Actiq 23
LSE Rejects Nasdaq's Offer 23

Environment/Indian Affairs:

National Park Service Proposes Snowmobile Plan For Yellowstone..... 24
Marine Protection Sought For Northwest Atlantic..... 24
Conrad Defends Agricultural Disaster Assistance Funding..... 24
Navajo Tribe's Efforts At Desert Radiation Cleanup Thwarted By Delays, Disputes 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senate Appropriations Bill Might Order FBI To Recover VCF Funds From SAIC 25
Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation 25
Texas Man Caught With 1,700 Pounds Of Marijuana Pleads Guilty 25
More Than 100 Charged In Kentucky Prescription-Drug Investigation 25
Trainer Returns To Prison For Refusing To Testify Against Barry Bonds 25
"Operation Central Hub" Reveals Links To Drug Organizations In 5 States, Mexico 26
ATF Finds Bomb, Components In Texas 26

Immigration:

Texas Legislators Propose Stripping Benefits From Children Of Illegals 26

Tax:

IRS Says More Audits Lead To Increased Tax Revenue..... 27

Congress-Administration:

GOP Leadership Plans To "Punt" Spending Bills Until Next Congress..... 27
Pelosi Stresses "Pocketbook" Issues, Pledges To Work With GOP 27
Gates Meets With Levin..... 28
Democrats Distance Themselves From Rangel's Support For Draft 29
Democrats Expected To Boost Generic Drugs..... 29
House Intelligence Panel Reinstates Clearances For Democratic Aide 29
GOP Said To Ignore Election Results In Retaining Blunt..... 30
Democrats' House Majority Equals GOP's High Water Mark..... 30
Democrats' Control Of Senate Said To Be Precarious..... 30
Democrats Have Expensive List Of Priorities 31
Study Recommends TSP Not Include REITs 31
WSJournal Accuses White House Of "Pandering" To Textile Industry 31

Other News:

Leading Indicators Up In October; Existing Home Sales Down .. 31
Utility Industry Markets Seen As Flawed 32
Venezuelan Discounted Heating Oil Program Comes To Washington DC..... 32
Family Of Slain Journalist Sues DC For $20 Million..... 32
Typos In Bills Can Invalidate Laws, Redirect Funding..... 33
Buchanan Named Winner Of Disputed Florida House Seat 33
Extent Of Clinton's Campaign Spending Concerns Some Democrats..... 33
Women Made Historic Gains In This Year's Elections 34
Brownback To Announce Decision On Presidential Run Next Month 34
McCain, Romney Seek To Bolster Support On Right 34
Hunter Seen As Having Potential In GOP Presidential Primary.. 35
Doro Bush Koch Seen As Contrasting Bush 41 And 43..... 35
Hatch Aide Is New CEO Of Liquor Lobby..... 35
Thousands Protest Bush's Visit To Indonesia 35
US Approves Most IAEA Aid For Iran Nuclear Sites 36
Israeli Military Chief Starts Investigation Of Cluster Bomb Use... 36
Hariri Probe Said To Have Caused Rift In Lebanese Government 36
Palestinian Unity Government Talks Suspended 37
Train Bombing In India Kill 8, Wound 60..... 37
Natsios Says US Could Opt For "Plan B" To End Darfur Violence Next Year 37
Muslim Population Increases In Russia..... 38
Muslim Women Gather In New York To Issue Fatwas..... 38
Losing Candidate Declares Himself President Of Mexico 39
Researchers Find Unconventional Transmissions Of AIDS In Africa 39
Commission Blames Nepali King For Bloody Violence On Demonstrators 39
NYTimes Says UN Human Rights Council Needs Improvement 39
WPost Suspects Putin Is Behind Poisoning 39

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 39

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 40

DOJ_NMG_0096549

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Defends Domestic Wiretapping. The Denver Post (11/21, Cardona) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales reiterated his support for a domestic wiretapping program to fight terrorism during a visit Monday with The Denver Post editorial board. … 'We've done a lot to make America safer, but it's not safe,' Gonzales said when asked about the need for warrantless eavesdropping. 'Fundamentally, the world is different today. My 14-year-old son will grow up in a different world than I grew up in. It's much more likely there will be a terrorist attack in this country. I never worried about a terrorist attack as a boy.'" The Post continues, "Gonzales said the Bush administration would not be deterred by the Democratic takeover in Congress but that he hoped new congressional leaders would be as willing to avoid a confrontation on national security as he is. … 'I'm not going to prejudge,' Gonzales said of the possibility of trying to convince the new Congress. 'We are going to work as hard as we can to avoid the kind of crisis you referred to.'" The Post adds, "Gonzales said the Bush administration's anti-terrorism efforts since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks have improved intelligence gathering, especially between nations. … 'The unsung story of this is our relationships with our foreign partners,' Gonzales said. 'The level of cooperation is outstanding, and it's made a big difference now that we are able to analyze plots. We have to be right 100 percent of the time; they (terrorists) only have to be right one time.' … Gonzales also spoke about the issues with security at the Supermax prison in Florence and said he considered the problems 'a priority.'"

Gonzales Says Supermax Prison Is Safe. The Rocky Mountain News (11/21, Burnett) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged today there have been problems at Supermax prison in Florence but said steps have been taken to improve security and make sure the community is safe. … 'I think it's a safe facility,' Gonzales said during a meeting with the Rocky Mountain News editorial board. 'Have mistakes been made? Have there been some problems there? No question about it, like there are at every facility. But we've taken steps to address them.'" The News continues, "Gonzales said the Department of Justice has added 11 new employees at Supermax, and that seven more positions will be filled 'as soon as we can.' The 18 new employees would bring the facility to 208 — still short of the 240 employees it had when the prison opened in 2004." The News adds, "Supermax, the nation's highest-security prison and home to inmates such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, also has addressed problems with inmate mail and phone calls not being monitored, Gonzales said. … He said a 'large portion' of phone calls are being monitored as they occur, and others are recorded and later reviewed by translators. All mail is being viewed, he said. … In September, a Justice Department inspector general's report criticized the prison for not properly screening terrorists' mail and other communications. Gonzales today called that situation 'intolerable' and said steps were taken to correct it."

More Commentary. The Rocky Mountain News (11/21) editorializes, "In a meeting with News editors and writers on Monday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales delivered both good news and bad news about the security of communications flowing to and from inmates at the Supermax lockup in Florence." The News continues, "On the plus side, Gonzales said that every communication with prisoners, by mail or telephone, is now reviewed. Mail is read and telephone messages are either monitored on the spot or recorded and eventually translated. … That's a dramatic improvement. A report by the department's inspector general published earlier this fall found that less than half of inmate phone calls at Supermax were monitored, and during a test period a mere 1.8 percent of mail to and from the prisoners was checked by law enforcement officials." The News adds, "The 'eventually translated' part, however, is the bad news. While the AG asserted that the goal was to monitor all communications in 'real time,' it's not happening now. The Bureau of Prisons lacks enough translators to interpret messages as they come and go. Which means that instructions to terror networks or outside criminal enterprises could be flowing freely for days, weeks or months (more like months, as we'll explain below) before potentially lethal plans are derailed. … Until recently, however, deciphering those messages was a low priority for the feds. The IG report said the FBI attempted to produce translations from intercepted letters within 60 days, which is already far too long. In actuality, it could take between six and 18 months to get a useful translation, the report added. … Given the wide latitude Congress has granted the administration to wage the war on terror, not to mention the expansive surveillance powers the White House has asserted on its own, such delays are indefensible. … In our conversation Monday, Gonzales agreed. But he still needs to push his department to finish the job of ending the security risk at SuperMax."

DOJ_NMG_0096550

Judge Rejects PAWF Request For NSA Documents. The AP (11/21) reports, "The National Security Agency is not required to release details about its secret wiretapping program, a federal judge said Monday." The AP continues, "The People for the American Way Foundation, a liberal advocacy group, sued to obtain records under the Freedom of Information Act. The group sought to find out how many wiretaps were approved and who reviewed the program. … President Bush has acknowledged the existence of the program, which he calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program. The National Security Agency monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the U.S. and people in other countries when a link to terrorism is suspected." The AP notes, "Civil liberties group criticize it as an expansion of presidential power, and a federal judge has said it is unconstitutional. The Justice Department says it is a necessary tool to fight terrorism. … The NSA denied the request for documents, saying the records would jeopardize national security. The advocacy group argued that the law can't be used to protect the government from disclosing details about illegal programs. … U.S. Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle disagreed, saying that even if the program is ultimately determined to be illegal, it doesn't change the fact that the materials are classified and are not covered by the Freedom of Information Act."

Human Rights Groups Back Democrats On Detainee Law Overhaul. The Hill (11/21, Tiron) reports, "Some human-rights groups are hoping that the Democrats' takeover of Congress will provide the necessary momentum to overhaul the controversial new legislation governing military tribunals. One of the groups' main goals is to restore habeas corpus rights to military detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." However, "Senate Democrats could have a tough time gathering enough support to stave off a White House veto. The Senate passed the military commissions bill by a vote of 65 to 34. ... House Democrats may face larger hurdles than their Senate colleagues in trying to change the tribunal legislation. The House passed the Military Commissions Act by a vote of 253 to 168."

WPost Blasts "Alternative" Interrogation Tactics. The Washington Post (11/21, 690K) editorializes, "Magid Khan was one of the al-Qaeda suspects who was detained in a secret prison of the CIA and subjected to 'alternative' interrogation tactics -- the administration's chilling phrase for methods most people regard as torture. Now the government is arguing that by subjecting detainees to such treatment, the CIA gives them 'top secret' classified information -- and the government can then take extraordinary measures to keep them quiet about it. If this argument carries the day, it will make virtually impossible any accountability for the administration's treatment of top al-Qaeda detainees. And it will also ensure that key parts of any military trials get litigated in secrecy."

Reno Joins Other Former DOJ Officials In Challenging Terror Law. The AP (11/21, Apuzzo) reports, "Former Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials filed court papers Monday arguing that the Bush administration is setting a dangerous precedent by trying a suspected terrorist outside the court system." The AP continues, It was the first time that Reno, attorney general in the Clinton administration, has spoken out against the administration's policies on terrorism detainees, underscoring how contentious the court fight over the nation's new military commissions law has become. Former attorneys general rarely file court papers challenging administration policy." The AP adds, "Suspected al-Qaida sleeper agent Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri is the only detainee being held in the United States. … The former prosecutors challenged the Justice Department's right to bring al-Marri before a military commission. … A citizen of Qatar, he was arrested in 2001 while studying in the United States. He had faced criminal charges until authorities designated him an enemy combatant and ordered him held at a naval base in South Carolina." The AP notes, "The Justice Department said in court papers last week that a new anti-terrorism law strips detainees such as al-Marri of the right to challenge their imprisonment in court. … 'The government is essentially asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute those people criminally — perhaps because it would be too difficult to obtain a conviction, perhaps because a motion to suppress evidence would raise embarrassing facts about the government's conduct, or perhaps for other reasons,' the former Justice Department officials said."

Islamic Charity Distances Itself From Sudanese Group With al-Qaida Links. The AP (11/21, Apuzzo) reports, "A Missouri-based Islamic charity accused of being part of an international terrorist organization tried to distance itself in federal court Monday from a Sudanese group suspected of financing al-Qaida." The AP continues, "The Treasury Department considers the Islamic American Relief Agency, of Columbia, Mo., to be an arm of the Islamic African Relief Agency, a Sudanese group accused of providing financial support to Osama bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas." The AP adds, "The FBI raided the charity's office in Missouri and the homes of people affiliated with the group nationwide. Since then, the 20-year-old charity has been unable to raise money. … Attorney Shereef Hadi Akeel told the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that the charity was not part of the Sudanese group. The organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts, he said. … If the two groups were the same, Akeel said, when the Missouri group wanted to move money into Sudan, it would have simply transferred it. Instead, he said the charity sought U.S. permission." The AP notes, "A federal judge rejected the group's lawsuit in 2005, finding enough evidence to support the Treasury Department's decision. The three-judge appeals panel seemed hesitant to reject that finding Monday, asking few questions and noting that it would need to see clear evidence to overturn the agency's decision. … The Justice Department pointed to the Missouri charity's own tax and corporate documents, which list the charity as a chapter or affiliate of the Sudanese group."

DOJ_NMG_0096551

Judge Rules US Not Required To Transfer Detainee For Medical Treatment. The AP (11/20, Apuzzo) reports, "The U.S. military is not required to send a Guantánamo Bay detainee to a civilian hospital for medical treatment, a federal judge said Monday, leaving the prisoner to choose between having a heart procedure performed at the military base or not at all." The AP continues, "Saifullah A. Paracha, a 59-year-old multimillionaire Pakistani businessman and television producer, argued that the procedure was too risky to be handled anywhere but in a cardiac unit. He asked to be transferred to a hospital in the United States or Pakistan. .. .The procedure, called cardiac catheterization, is used to detect heart problems such as blockages. A doctor inserts a plastic tube into a vein and slides it into the heart or nearby coronary arteries to measure blood pressure or oxygen levels. … If something goes wrong, Paracha's attorney said, doctors could need to perform emergency heart surgery." The AP adds, "Doctors successfully completed an identical procedure at Guantánamo Bay in 2003, the Justice Department said. Special medical equipment and personnel were available, attorneys said, making transferring Paracha an unnecessary security risk. … U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman agreed, saying the government regularly decides how best to treat civilian prisoners inside the United States and judges rarely intervene."

Second Man Charged In Hezbollah TV Station Access Case. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/21, Neumeister) reports Saleh Elahwal of Matawan, N.J., "was charged Monday with supporting terrorists by enabling customers to obtain satellite broadcasts of a Hezbollah television station, the second person accused in a case that has drawn scrutiny over how far the government can go in claiming someone is aiding terrorist groups." Elahwal and Javed Iqbal of Staten Island "could each face up to 110 years in prison if they are convicted of all 11 counts in a rewritten indictment unsealed Monday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. They pleaded not guilty." The AP notes, "As part of their probe, FBI agents searched two storefronts in Brooklyn where Iqbal worked and at his residence, where multiple satellite dishes helped him distribute the broadcasts to New York-area customers through a Brooklyn company called HDTV Limited, prosecutors said."

Prodi Sacks Intelligence Chiefs Over Suspected CIA Kidnapping. The Financial Times (11/21, Barber) reports, "Three top intelligence officials were removed on Monday in the most abrupt shake-up of Italy's espionage community since the current structures were established almost 30 years ago. The government of Romano Prodi removed the chief of the national military intelligence agency, whom prosecutors want to put on trial for involvement in the suspected kidnapping by CIA agents of an Egyptian imam in February 2003. It also replaced the head of the domestic secret service and the chief of an intelligence co-ordinating committee that reports to the political authorities. ... Since the creation of Italy's democratic political system in the late 1940s, the intelligence services have played a prominent and often bitterly criticised role in battling home-grown terrorism, of the extreme-left and extreme-right varieties."

FT Inveighs Against Rendition. The Financial Times (11/21) editorializes about rendition, "a capitulation by liberal societies to their enemies, a surrender of the rule of law to jihadi totalitarianism, to sink into such practices - whatever semantic evasions are used to describe them. As the Financial Times has persistently argued: we should not need to make the case against torture. It is morally depraved. It corrodes the society that condones it. It elicits largely worthless information. ... A start might be made if those high up the chain of command - such as Donald Rumsfeld, the now defenestrated US defence secretary - were called to account for their actions. Italy may have started this process."

Germany Detains Six, Releases Five In Suspected El Al Bomb Plot. The New York Times (11/21, Landler, 1.16M) reports, "German authorities, investigating an alleged plot to hide an explosive device aboard a passenger jet" in Frankfurt "last summer, detained six men on Friday on suspicion of belonging to a terrorist group. All but one of the men was released the following day, the federal prosecutor in Karlsruhe said on Monday. But German authorities said they are investigating additional people whom they believe sought to bribe an employee at Frankfurt Airport to place a bomb aboard the plane in luggage. The plot was in its very early stages, the prosecutor said." The Times notes, "German news organizations…reported that the men were from the Middle East, possibly from Jordan. The newspaper, Die Welt, said on its Web site that the target was the Israeli state airline El Al."

DOJ_NMG_0096552

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

ACLU To Release Documents Detailing Pentagon Records On Antiwar Groups. The New York Times (11/21, Lichtblau, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports, "An antiterrorist database used by the Defense Department in an effort to prevent attacks against military installations included intelligence tips about antiwar planning meetings held at churches, libraries, college campuses and other locations, newly disclosed documents show." Pentagon Counterintelligence Field Activity Unit Acting Director Daniel J. Baur "said that those operating the database had misinterpreted their mandate and that what was intended as an antiterrorist database became, in some respects, a catch-all for leads on possible disruptions and threats against military installations in the United States, including protests against the military presence in Iraq. … Once the problem was discovered, he said, 'we fixed it,' and more than 180 entries in the database related to war protests were deleted from the system last year." However, the ACLU plans to release documents today which detail the data that was collected, "and officials with the group said they would push for Democrats, newly empowered in Congress, to hold formal hearings about the Talon database."

Six Imams Removed From US Flight. The AP (11/21, Karnowski) reports, "Six Muslim imams were removed from a US Airways flight at Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport on Monday and questioned by police for several hours before being released, a leader of the group said. … A passenger initially raised concerns about the group through a note passed to a flight attendant, according to Andrea Rader, a spokeswoman for US Airways. She said police were called after the captain and airport security workers asked the men to leave the plane and the men refused. 'They took us off the plane, humiliated us in a very disrespectful way,' said Omar Shahin, of Phoenix." The imams "were returning from a conference in Minneapolis of the North American Imams Federation, said Shahin, president of the group." Shahin said that "three of them stood and said their normal evening prayers together on the plane," and "he attributed any concerns by passengers or crew to ignorance about Islam." The AP notes, "Shahin said they went as far as notifying police and the FBI about their meeting in advance."

Hawley Urges Travelers To Learn Rules Before Going To The Airport. TSA chief Kip Hawley, in an op-ed in USA Today (11/21, 21A, 2.27M) writes that the TSA's "primary mission is to ensure the security of air travel. … TSA and our partners in law enforcement, airlines and airports handle the security work, but we also depend on travelers to be active participants by being prepared when they arrive at the airport." Hawley continues that air travelers "can have a huge impact in making the process go smoothly and quickly for everyone" if they spend a minute learning "the rules before going to the airport (www.TSA.gov)." Meanwhile, security officers are doing "a demanding job," and checkpoints are "not the place to debate the merits of various security measures."

Meanwhile, in an editorial under the headline "Fliers Aren't Giving Thanks For Fickle TSA Rules, Screeners," USA Today (11/21, 21A, 2.27M) offers a warning for those planning to fly this Thanksgiving week: "Be prepared. Since a plot to bomb jetliners with liquid explosives was broken up in London last August, flying has proved a little less convenient and a lot more confusing." USA Today says the rules, which were relaxed in September, have become "so complicated that they aren't applied consistently." After providing examples of inconsistent carry-on rules, USA Today writes, "While TSA screeners must make judgment calls — and fliers must comply — screeners should be reading from the same playbook, and that playbook needs to be simple enough that it's easily understood. It isn't." USA Today states that "whether everyone is ready for the busiest travel weekend of the year is very much in doubt. Passengers and screeners alike will have to give a little."

Poster Advises Screeners On Dealing With Daggers Worn By Sikhs. The Washington Post (11/21, A6, Boorstein, 690K) reports a "centuries-old requirement" that Sikhs "always wear a dagger" has "collided with beefed-up, post-Sept. 11 rules that no longer allow people to leave legal weapons and other banned items with security guards working in such buildings as courthouses and federal offices. … In an effort to bridge the culture-security gap, the Homeland Security Department and the Sikh legal group yesterday unveiled a poster meant to help screeners through these interactions." The poster advises screeners to be respectful when asking "if a Sikh is carrying a kirpan" and to "handle the kirpan with respect and care" if it must be confiscated.

Pentagon Delays Chemical Weapons Destruction. The USA Today (11/21, Eisler, 2.27M) reports, "The Pentagon has extended its timeline to destroy its aging chemical weapons arsenal until 2023, despite concerns by Congress and watchdog groups that the stockpiles raise the risk of an accident or theft by terrorists." The new schedule "means the military won't eliminate its stocks of deadly nerve gases and skin-blistering agents until 11 years after the 2012 deadline set by the international Chemical Weapons Convention." Pentagon spokesman Chris Isleib said the delay "is the result of several factors, including technological challenges in developing and building disposal plants, regulatory delays, and safety and security issues." Critics said "the plan to slow spending and stretch construction at the remaining disposal plants will raise costs and create needless risks of an accidental chemical release or terrorist attack."

DOJ_NMG_0096553

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says He Hasn't Decided On Changes To Iraq Strategy. The Financial Times (11/21, Sevastopulo) reports, "George W. Bush said he had made no decisions on altering troop numbers in Iraq on Monday following reports that the Pentagon was considering a temporary boost to curb sectarian violence in Baghdad. … 'I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases,' Mr Bush said in Indonesia." The AP (11/21, Hunt) notes that "asked specifically whether there were any risks in increasing US troops," Bush said, "There's no need to comment on something that may not happen. But if it were to happen, I will tell you the upsides and downside."

Bush's comments in Indonesia are being reported in the context of a story in yesterday's Washington Post. That story, which outlined three possible Pentagon strategies for Iraq, sparked extensive media commentary last night and this morning – much of it highly negative. NBC Nightly News (11/20, lead story, 3;10, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the "apparent leak from inside the Pentagon has revealed what appear to be the three possible options for the US in Iraq." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "As outlined first by the Washington Post, the options reportedly include go big: A large increase in US forces to try to bring down the level of violence, rejected by senior military officials who say that could take several hundred thousand more troops and the military's already stretched too thin. Go home: The rapid withdrawal of American forces, rejected because it could ignite a full-blown civil war. The most viable option: Go long a compromise that would temporarily increase the US force by 20,000 to 30,000 troops to try to quell the violence, then gradually reduce the total force from 140,000 troops now to 60,000 who could remain in Iraq for five to 10 years." But "military experts contend even a temporary increase in troops will not change the course of the war." General Barry McCaffrey (ret): "I think the notion of bubbling up 20,000 to 40,000 US forces to demonstrate our political will before we do the drawdown is nonsense." NBC added "senior Pentagon and military officials aren't putting much stock in these specific three options laid out publicly, saying that if that's the best we can do, we're in brig trouble."

The CBS Evening News (11/20, story 5, 2:10, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "A team of military advisors has developed one option which includes a temporary troop buildup as prelude to the start of a withdrawal. A measure of the quandary the Bush Administration faces, that was rejected just last week by the top military commander for Iraq." General John Abizaid, Commander US forces: "I do not believe that more American troops right now is the solution to the problem." CBS (Couric) continued, "Meanwhile…I know Henry Kissinger weighed in on the BBC today and he wasn't very optimistic, either."

Fox News' Special Report (11/20, Hume) noted "the option the Pentagon is calling 'go big,' a short-term increase in troops, is favored by Sen. John McCain among others." Sen. McCain: "No, we're not winning in Iraq. That's why we have to have more troops there and we have to do it quickly."

The New York Times (11/21, Cloud, 1.16M) says "Pentagon officials conducting a review of Iraq strategy are considering a substantial but temporary increase in American troop levels and the addition of several thousand more trainers to work with Iraqi forces, a senior Defense Department official said Monday. The idea, dubbed the 'surge option' by some officials, would involve increasing American forces by 20,000 troops or more for several months in the hope of improving security, especially in Baghdad." That "would mark a sharp rise over the current baseline of 144,000 troops." But "some officials and senior military officers are arguing against the idea, saying that it could undercut a sense of urgency for Iraqi units to take on a greater role in fighting the insurgency and preventing sectarian attacks."

The Washington Post (11/21, A23, Fletcher, 690K) reports, "Even with the endorsement of a Pentagon panel, or that of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), any increase in troops would be controversial, particularly because Democrats in recent months campaigned on the need for a plan to decrease US exposure in the country."

McClatchy (11/21, Hutcheson) reports, "Of the three obvious options -- sending significantly more US troops to Iraq, staying the course or withdrawing immediately - only one has much support, however." The US "doesn't have enough troops to increase its presence significantly, and there's wide agreement that a hasty retreat would only leave a bigger mess. So support is coalescing around alterations to the current strategy, perhaps adding 20,000 to 50,000 more troops for a limited time, then beginning a drawdown."

The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A6, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports, "Both supporters and opponents of the war agree there are few easy -- or bloodless -- ways of winding down the troubled US effort. Leading Democrats have rallied around a proposal from Michigan Sen. Carl Levin that calls for beginning troop withdrawal within four to six months. A rising number of Republicans also have begun arguing US forces should start returning home next year."

DOJ_NMG_0096554

USA Today (11/21, Kelley, Slavin, 2.27M), under the headline "Bush Pressured To Come Up With New Iraq Strategy," says "increased pressure from Congress and high level studies commissioned by the Pentagon and the White House are prodding President Bush to significantly change strategy in Iraq for the first time since the war began in March 2003."

Obama Calls For Regional Dialogue, Troop Reduction. The Chicago Tribune (11/21, Parsons, Mendell, 617K) reports, "Amid intense speculation about whether he will run for president, Sen. Barack Obama on Monday used the spotlight to showcase his strategy for the war in Iraq, excoriating the Bush administration for its 'misguided' war and describing a solution that includes dialogue with hostile nations in the region." In his speech to the Chicago Council on Global Affairs, Obama "said the US should end its 'coddling' of the Iraqi government by beginning a reduction of troops in the next four to six months and pressuring Iraqis to work out agreements among their warring factions." The senator offered "few new specifics." The AP (11/21, Bellandi) also says Obama "was careful not to set a specific timetable for withdrawal of troops or suggest troop levels."

The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Huffstutter, 850K) notes Obama also "criticized President Bush for pushing forward with a war that 'would require an occupation of undetermined length, at undetermined cost, with undetermined consequences.'"

More Commentary. On the CBS Evening News (11/20, story 6, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M), NYTimes columnist Thomas Friedman said, "I'm rather despondent that anything can really solve the situation in Iraq right now." Iraq "is so broken…that it can't even have a proper civil war. It's so broken. You know, to have a proper civil war, you need two sides, basically. There are now 15 sides there." He added, "Our choice in Iraq is…ten weeks or ten years. That is, either we're going to conclude this thing is so broken and therefore we're just going to have to get out -- or we're going to say this thing is so broken we basically have to start over. And that is a ten-year project. Because the idea that there's some kind of middle ground where we kind of stand up the Iraqi army and then we kind of quietly leave, I think that's an illusion."

In his Washington Post (11/21, 690K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "Defections, recrimination and finger-pointing among the people who got us into this mess provide an amusing sideshow. But the main event is the mandate that midterm voters imposed this month, in no uncertain terms: Find a way out. ... If American troops begin pulling out tomorrow, Iraq surely will suffer a terrible spasm of bloody violence. But if we wait a year and then pull out, there is no reason to expect any different outcome."

In his Washington Post (11/21, 690K) column, Richard Cohen writes, "As with Vietnam, we are fighting now merely not to lose -- to avoid a full-fledged civil war (it's coming anyway) or to keep the country together, something like that. But not for victory. Not for democracy. ... This, above all, is how Iraq is like Vietnam: older men asking younger men to die while they try to figure something out."

Wolf, Rice Were Early Supporters Of Iraq Study Group Proposal. The Washington Post 911/21, A25, Layton) reports, "On his third trip to Iraq, in September 2005, Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) knew the American mission was imperiled. … That's when" Wolf "first began to think about the need for 'fresh eyes' to scrutinize U.S. policy regarding Iraq. Quietly, he went to the White House and presented his plan: a bipartisan commission of well-respected policymakers to bore deeply into the Iraq dilemma and recommend solutions." According to the Post, "The result is the Iraq Study Group, though "initially, the White House was cool to the idea, Wolf said. But he was able to win over Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld followed, as did national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. 'Rice's support was key,' Wolf said. 'But I had to have the support of everybody or there would be no way to do this.'

Cost Of Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan Nears $500 Billion. The Christian Science Monitor (11/21, Grier, 59K) reports, "The cost of combat in Iraq has now surpassed $300 billion, according to government estimates. Add in activities in Afghanistan, and the total price of the global war on terror is about $500 billion, making it one of the most monetarily costly conflicts in which the nation has ever engaged. Now the Department of Defense is in the process of drawing up its follow-on request for the remainder of FY 2007. Reports indicate that the Pentagon could ask for $120 billion to $160 billion, which would be its largest funding request yet for the global war on terror." The Monitor notes, "Before the invasion of Iraq, the White House estimated that combat operations there would cost about $50 billion. … Three years later, Iraq alone is costing the US some $8 billion a month."

UK Think Tank Predicts War On Terror Will Continue For Thirty More Years. AFP (11/21) reports, "The fight against terrorism could last 30 years or more, according to a report published by a British think tank that specialises in international security. 'There is every prospect of the 'war on terror' extending for 30 years or more,' said the report by the Oxford Research Group. … 'Most people believe that the recent elections mark the beginning of the end of the Bush era but that does not apply to the war on terror,' said Professor Paul Rogers, who wrote the report, in a statement. 'In reality there will be little change until the United States faces up to the need for a fundamental re-think of its policies'."

DOJ_NMG_0096555

Iraqi President To Hold Talks With Iranian, Syrian Leaders. USA Today/AP (11/21) reports, "Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad invited his Iraqi and Syrian counterparts to a weekend summit in Tehran to tackle the chaos in Iraq, Iraqi lawmakers said Monday." Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's spokesman Kamaran Qaradaghi "said in a statement late Monday that the Tehran meeting will include Talabani and Ahmadinejad. He said Syrian President Bashar Assad would not attend, but that Talabani had accepted an invitation to meet with Assad in Damascus. No date was set." The AP adds, "A close parliamentary associate of Talabani told the Associated Press that the summit represents an attempt by Tehran to strengthen its position in the region and prevent the United States from dividing Syria, a predominantly Sunni Arab country, from its ally of convenience, Shiite Iran. The associate spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with the media." The State Department "reacted with skepticism about Iran's intentions in Iraq, but said it was up to Iraq. 'It's their call,' spokesman Tom Casey said in Washington. 'We have seen statements like this many times,' and there have been several high-level contacts between Iran and Iraq, Casey said. But Iran's statements of a desire to reduce violence in Iraq "have not been backed up by facts," he said."

The New York Times (11/21, Tavernise, 1.16M) notes Baghdad "re-established diplomatic relations with Syria on Monday, agreeing to restore an embassy in Baghdad after more than 20 years with no formal avenues of communication." The Times adds, "As the United States undertakes a broad review of its role in Iraq, the neighboring countries of Iran, Turkey and Syria have stepped forward to try to position themselves in case of a major change in policy, leading to a recent flurry of diplomatic efforts. The countries are also concerned about the possibility of a political collapse as the Iraqi government sinks into paralysis with its two main sects stuck in a deadlock."

ABC World News (11/20, lead story, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M) refers to "a move with potentially stunning implications." Fareed Zakaria, ABC News consultant, said, "What Iran is saying to Iraq is, "Look, if you want stability in your country, you think we can help you. Don't go through Washington, come directly to us.'" ABC (Karl) said, "It's a move designed to limit US influence in the region." Zakaria: "It's a very clever move on Iran's part."

NBC Nightly News (11/20, story 2, 2:10, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "It's clear that Iran and Syria are already adjusting to the new reality in the Middle East: That Iraq has collapsed, that there is potential for oil development, there's a potential to contain the situation within Iraq. The US helped create this situation by launching the war and now has backed away and is not really engaged in any kind of diplomatic process at all. The US must get engaged very quickly, it seems, or Iran and Syria are simply going to redefine the region according to their own terms."

The CBS Evening News (11/20, story 4, 1:00, Palmer, 7.66M) said "a pledge of help has come to the increasingly desperate Iraqi government directly from the Syrians and it's considered a diplomatic breakthrough."

The Washington Post (11/21, A23, Trejos, 690K) says Damascus and Tehran "have offered to help bring stability to Iraq's fractured government, but the Bush administration has long-standing concerns about Iran's support for Shiite Muslim militias and Syria's failure to stop foreign fighters from joining the Iraqi insurgency."

The Financial Times (11/21, Negus, Smyth, Dombey) reports UK sources indicate "Iran was keen to host three-way talks, but Iraqi sources said there were no plans for such a meeting." Some analysts believe Tehran "is trying to ensure that it has the capacity to cause severe problems for US forces in Iraq as a possible deterrent to US-led military efforts against its own territory."

The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Moore, 850K) reports Syria "has served as an entry point and refuge for Sunni Arab insurgents who have waged a steady stream of attacks on US forces and the fledgling Iraqi government since the American-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. Iran, a Shiite Muslim nation, holds strong sway over the Shiite militias that have increasingly attacked Iraq's minority Sunnis in retaliation." However, says the Washington Times (11/21, Sands, 88K), "there has been intense speculation about a change of course in Washington since the midterm elections and about the pending report from an independent panel looking into US alternatives in Iraq." The State Department "said yesterday the United States did not feel 'snubbed' in being excluded from the Tehran gathering, and that it was up to Iraq to determine its relations with its neighbors."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, 850K) editorializes, "Iran has invited top Iraqi and Syrian leaders to Tehran this weekend, but there are no Americans on the guest list. The omission is hardly a snub -- US diplomats probably wouldn't have much fun there anyway --- but the talks underline the absurdity of the White House position, which is essentially to wait for a bipartisan commission to give it permission to sit down with some friends and enemies. Regional discussions about the future of Iraq are already happening. The US should send out some invitations of its own." President Bush "need not wait for the release of a commission report to convene a conference and invite all of the key players in Iraq's future: Iraq, Iran, Syria, Turkey, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, as well as representatives of the Gulf Coordination Council, the European Union and the UN Agreeing on a mutual duty to respect and uphold Iraq's territorial integrity would be the first goal."

DOJ_NMG_0096556

In an op-ed for USA Today (11/21, 2.27M) Wesley Clark, former Supreme Commander of NATO, writes, "Instead of cutting and running or staying the course, it is time for us to begin to redeploy. The right approach is a coordinated diplomatic, legal, economic and security campaign drawing upon broader dialogue in the region and intensified political work inside Iraq. Here is how to do this…begin talks within Iraq, and with all its neighbors, based on a clear set of principles outlined by the team. The goal would be to seek the commitments necessary to achieve our aims inside Iraq and also advance U.S. interests in the region. … A permanent Gulf regional security dialogue could emerge that includes Syria and Iran, and the United States could undertake a role as regional security guarantor. Preliminary discussions should lead to a more intensive dialogue with Iran in which security assurances and nuclear programs are discussed."

In a column titled "Syria Lends A Hand," Bret Stephens writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/21, A17, 2.04M), "At a simplistic level, the argument is: Where's the harm in talking? Oddly, the people who say this about Syria rarely make it in connection to, say, al Qaeda. A more sophisticated view is that the administration is anyway not seriously interested in overthrowing Mr. Assad -- the Muslim Brotherhood might well end up taking over -- so it will need carrots as well as sticks to improve his behavior. The largest of those carrots, supposedly, is a promise not to seek regime change; another is to abandon the cause of a truly independent Lebanon; a third is to lean on Israel to abandon the Golan Heights in return for a peace treaty. In exchange, it is hoped, Damascus will start playing a constructive role in Lebanon, abandon its support for terrorist groups in Iraq and Palestine, and begin to step away from its alliance with Iran." Stephens adds, "In the summer of 2005, a senior administration official smugly noted that the Syrian regime was sinking on its own weight, as if on quicksand. Now the countries have traded places, and some would urge the administration to grasp the offered hand of the likes of Mr. Moallem. They should consider what that hand has done, and whether it will pull us up -- or sink us."

Dick Morris writes in The Hill (11/21), "A consensus seems to be developing that only a 'regional solution' embracing Iran and Syria can extract the United States from Iraq without jeopardy to those who have stood with us and without damage to both our reputation and Bush's place in history. But at what price? Nobody seems willing to say what 'engagement' with Iran for a regional solution would entail. We cannot ask Iran's help while we bomb its nuclear reactors or impose tough sanctions on the country." Morris adds, "The price of Iranian cooperation will be complicity in Tehran's nuclear ambitions. Iran will gladly assure Bush it does not intend to develop an atomic weapon. But we shouldn't believe it." Israel "will have only one course -- to bomb Iran in hope of delaying its acquisition of nuclear weapons. … An Israeli strike would produce waves of nationalist sentiment in Iran and inflame Arab hatred of the Jewish state. It is precisely what we don't need now in the Middle East."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/21, 1.16M) Mark Moyar, an associate professor at the United States Marine Corps University, writes, "Iraq's prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, is now saying that he wants the United States to stand back and let him use Iraqi forces to restore order. Within six months, he asserts, the bloodletting will cease. The United States must give this proposal very serious consideration. Critics of America's current Iraq policy, particularly among the Congressional Democrats, have tended to concentrate on international diplomatic remedies. Experience, however, suggest that only the Iraqis themselves can end the chaos and violence." Moyar goes on to draw parallels between present-day Iraq and Vietnam in the mid fifties. According to Moyar, "South Vietnam's history recommends the pursuit of two objectives that American officials are now urging upon Prime Minister Maliki: subduing the Shiite militias and transferring control of the police from Shiite partisans to Iraqi nationalists."

Army's Effort To Train Iraqi Forces Reportedly Beset By Setbacks. The Washington Post (11/21, A1, Ricks, 690K) reports, "The U.S. military's effort to train Iraqi forces has been rife with problems, from officers being sent in with poor preparation to a lack of basic necessities such as interpreters and office materials, according to internal Army documents. … A Pentagon effort to rethink policies in Iraq is likely to suggest placing less emphasis on combat and more on training and advising, sources say. In dozens of official interviews compiled by the Army for its oral history archives, officers who had been involved in training and advising Iraqis bluntly criticized almost every aspect of the effort. Some officers thought that team members were often selected poorly. Others fretted that the soldiers who prepared them had never served in Iraq and lacked understanding of the tasks of training and advising. Many said they felt insufficiently supported by the Army while in Iraq, with intermittent shipments of supplies and interpreters who often did not seem to understand English. The Iraqi officers interviewed by an Army team also had complaints; the top one was that they were being advised by officers far junior to them who had never seen combat." The Post adds, "Despite its central role in Iraq, the training and advisory program is not well understood outside narrow military circles. Congress has hardly examined it. … The Army has done some studies but has not released them. Even basic information, such as how many of the 5,000 U.S. military personnel involved are from the National Guard and Reserves, is unusually difficult to obtain."

DOJ_NMG_0096557

US Advised To Embed More Combat Advisors Into Iraqi Battalions. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) Hans Binnendijk, a professor at National Defense University, and author Bing West write, "The reassessment of U.S. strategy in Iraq should radically alter the combat mission of the American troops serving there. The key policy change is to embed five times as many U.S. combat advisers into Iraqi battalions. This will, on the one hand, reduce the size and casualties of U.S. forces, and on the other, strengthen the Iraqi army -- the only institution that can stop the creeping civil war. … Currently the U.S. has about a dozen military advisers working in each Iraqi battalion. These advisers spend their time as managers. They are too few to give combat advice and moral reassurance out on the streets during daily operations."

More Than 1200 Iraqi Civilians Have Been Killed This Month. The AP (11/21, Wagner) reports, "In all, 25 Iraqis were killed Monday in a series of attacks in Baghdad, Ramadi and Baqouba, police said. The bodies of 75 Iraqis who had been kidnapped and tortured also were found on the streets of the capital, in Dujail to the north of Baghdad and in the Tigris River in southern Iraq. The Iraqi death toll this month is already well above the 1,216 who died in all of October, which had been the deadliest month in Iraq since the AP began its count. The actual totals are likely considerably higher because many deaths are not reported. Victims in those cases are quickly buried according to Muslim custom and never reach morgues or hospitals to be counted."

Prominent Iraqi Television Personality Killed. The Washington Post (11/21, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "For the last three years, Walid Hassan had an impossible task. He had to make war-weary Iraqis laugh. Week after week, the comedian and broadcaster found inspiration in the turmoil and bloodletting. On his weekend television show, 'Caricature,' he poked fun at the poor security, the long gas lines, the electricity blackouts and the ineffective politicians. … On Monday, Hassan, 47, a father of five children, became a victim of the war and chaos from which he drew his inspiration. A Shiite Muslim, he was found in the majority-Sunni neighborhood of Yarmouk in west Baghdad with multiple bullet wounds to his back and head, according to police." The Post notes that Hassan, "who also produced a political show, was the latest casualty in the Iraqi media world. … So far, 133 reporters, cameramen and other media workers have been killed in Iraq, the vast majority of them Iraqi, according to Reporters Without Borders."

Pro-Saddam TV Station Reemerges After Being Banned. McClatchy (11/21, Allam) report, "When Iraqi government officials pulled the plug on al Zawraa TV earlier this month, they thought they'd finally stamped out a channel known for reporting live from 'occupied Baghdad' and declaring Saddam Hussein's death sentence 'a sad day for Iraq.' Two weeks later, however, the Sunni-owned station is back, and bloodier than ever. … Saddam-era martial music boomed as an insurgent video montage began: a sniper hitting an American soldier snacking on a sandwich, a U.S. Humvee bursting into flames as it hit a roadside bomb, Sunni Muslim militants vowing to overthrow Shiite leaders who are portrayed as agents of Iran." Al Zawraa "is the station of choice for nostalgic Baathists, militant Islamists, Iran-hating Sunnis and anti-American Arab nationalists. Driven underground by a court order on Nov. 5, the day Saddam was sentenced to death, the satellite news channel has re-emerged in recent days, broadcasting from an unknown location and devoid of any pretense of neutrality." Al Zawraa "was launched in November 2005, the brainchild of Mishaan al Jubouri, a Sunni member of the Iraqi parliament who fled to Syria recently amid allegations of corruption." Jubouri "said the new pro-resistance format has increased the number of viewers '100 times over.'"

Blair Meets With Karzai In Kabul, Visits British Troops. The AP (11/21, Stringer) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair visited Afghanistan and met with President Hamid Karzai "following a visit to meet hundreds of troops in the country's restive southern Helmand province — a former Taliban stronghold and hub of Afghanistan's heroin trade. Blair paid tribute to the troops at Camp Bastion — Britain's main southern base." The AP notes, "The visit was the British leader's first to Afghanistan since 2002. Britain has around 6,000 soldiers deployed in Afghanistan." The AP adds, "A total of 41 British soldiers have died in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 — including 36 killed since Britain's deployment to Helmand province in July, Blair's office said." The Washington Times/AP (11/21, Stringer) reports Blair "pledged his nation's commitment in Afghanistan 'for as long as it takes,' telling British soldiers fighting the resurgent Taliban that success would help establish global security."

Taliban Reportedly Reliant On Profits From Opium Production. The Christian Science Monitor (11/21, Peters, 59K) reports, "As Afghanistan's narcotics trade explodes past $3 billion a year, there is concern that the Taliban is becoming another FARC, Colombia's notorious leftist insurgent group that draws much of its funding from the drug trade. The Taliban and FARC - the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia - both got their start protecting peasants from corrupt governments. There's evidence both initially fought narcotics traffic but then levied taxes on the trade for much-needed cash. … Evidence is growing that the Taliban and their allies are moving beyond taxing the trade to protecting opium shipments, running heroin labs, and even organizing farm output in areas they control. 'It's reached the point where about half of the opium we seize in the provinces has some link to the Taliban,' says Gen. Ali Shah Paktiawal, director of the anticriminal branch of the Kabul police." The Monitor notes, "Many experts believe the Taliban has always been dependent on the poppy trade. Declassified US State Department records show that two major narcotraffickers now in US custody, Baz Mohammed and Bashir Noorzai, sat on the original five-member Taliban shura, or leadership council.

DOJ_NMG_0096558

DOJ:

GAO Finds DOJ Making Progress On Information Classification. Federal Computer Week (11/21) reports, "A report from the Government Accountability Office says the Justice Department has significantly improved the way it handles classified information, but the agency has not corrected one of the most glaring problems: staff shortages." FCW continues, "Increased staffing was one of the recommendations made by the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which reviewed security procedures at DOJ in July 2004 and April 2005. GAO was brought in this year to assess how well DOJ and its FBI component were following the recommendations. … The agencies have made a lot of progress in a lot of areas, according to GAO's report. 'DOJ, however, has taken no action on the most important recommendation, addressing staff shortages, which continue to place its program at risk,' the document states." FCW adds, "Justice said it does not have the resources to address the staff shortages, according to the report. The department said it 'is trying to address its resources constraints, a longstanding problem that GAO identified as early as 1993, by requesting additional funds from an administrative account in fiscal year 2007.' … But Justice officials acknowledged they do not know precisely how many new employees they would need because they have not fully assessed those needs, the report said. 'It also does not have a strategy that identifies how it will use additional resources to address remaining deficiencies,' the report added. … Justice had taken action on five of 10 recommendations, 'including fixing problems with outdated and insufficient training and insufficient monitoring of components' programs,' GAO said. … The report found that five department components — the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Criminal Division; the Drug Enforcement Administration; the FBI; and the U.S. Marshals Service — were experiencing problems designating sensitive but unclassified information."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Drops Appeal Of Lay Ruling. The Houston Chronicle (11/21, Hays) reports, "Federal prosecutors on Monday had this to say about their intent to challenge a judge's decision to wipe out former Enron Chairman Ken Lay's convictions: Never mind." The Chronicle continues, "Last week the Justice Department filed notice it would appeal U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's October decision to clear Lay's name. That filing came the same day two senators introduced a bill to allow crime victims to seek restitution when a convicted defendant dies before exhausting appeals. … Lake had based his ruling on precedent set by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — the same court that would have heard a challenge. But prosecutors filed court papers Monday that said the government would withdraw its appeal notice." The Chronicle adds, "Monday's filing explained that last week's action came as the deadline for filing notice of appeal was about to expire. … Even though the Justice Department acknowledged helping draft the proposed legislation, prosecutors said in Monday's filing that last week's move was "protective" to ensure they met the deadline and could then review the bill to determine if it could help support an appeal. … 'Having concluded that review, the government now moves to withdraw its notice of appeal,' the filing said."

Cyberonics Head Resigns Amid Expanding Options Probe. The New York Times (11/21, Feder) reports, "The tumultuous tenure of Robert P. Cummins as chairman, president and chief executive of the medical device maker Cyberonics has ended, the company disclosed yesterday." The Times continues, "Mr. Cummins, 52, who is known as Skip, is a former venture capitalist who joined the board of Cyberonics in 1988 and became chief executive in 1995. He gained a reputation as one of nation's most passionate and intimidating business leaders in dealing with critics, regulators and investors." The Times adds, "Mr. Cummins had been under growing pressure since questions arose in June about the timing of stock options for 100,000 shares that were granted to him in 2004 just hours after a regulatory panel recommended approval of a Cyberonics implant to treat depression. Although none of the options vested immediately, their potential value soared when trading in the stock resumed the next day. … Scrutiny of the timing of the 2004 options grant expanded into internal and government investigations of whether Cyberonics was among the scores of technology companies that improperly manipulated options grants to ensure that executives would profit from them. … Cyberonics stock, which has been battered by the accounting questions and by the company's problems getting insurance coverage for its depression implant, soared yesterday after the company disclosed before trading began that Mr. Cummins resigned on Friday. The shares climbed as high as $26.45 before retreating to close at $24.17, up 12 percent for the day."

DOJ_NMG_0096559

USA Today (11/21, Smith, 2.27M) reports, "A USA TODAY investigation reveals that Cyberonics' board has engaged in a series of questionable practices to reward Cummins, certain directors and some executives with stock and options almost from its inception as a public company in February 1993. Among its practices, the company frequently issued stock options just before market-moving events that insiders participated in, including merger talks, regulatory milestones and earnings advisories. It also repeatedly issued options at the lowest or second-lowest monthly trading price, SEC filings show. On one occasion, management, including Cummins, and a director who serves on the compensation committee, bought company stock at a discounted price in which Cummins represented himself both as the CEO selling the shares and as an individual buying them."

Former Capital One CFO Settles Insider Trading Charges For $1.8 Million. The Washington Post (11/21, D01, Hilzenrath) reports, "A former chief financial officer of credit card issuer Capital One Financial Corp. agreed to pay more than $1.8 million to settle insider trading charges, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday." The Post continues, "David M. Willey was accused of exercising Capital One stock options and cashing in shares after learning in 2002 that a regulatory examination of the company was likely to end unfavorably. After the results of the examination were made public, Capital One's stock price plunged by about 40 percent." The Post adds, "Without admitting or denying wrongdoing, Willey agreed to give up $801,434 in alleged ill-gotten gains, plus $218,180 in interest and a penalty of $801,434. The SEC dismissed a related claim against Willey's wife, Joy S. Willey, a former Capital One vice president. The agency had previously named her as a defendant alleging that some of the proceeds of the insider trading were in her possession. … Willey, who joined McLean-based Capital One in 1989, earned more than $1.2 million in salary and bonus in 2001, according to a company report. … The following year, Federal Reserve examiners found serious management problems in areas under his authority, the SEC alleged in a 2004 complaint. The lead examiner told Willey of the Fed's concerns in a private meeting and warned that they could lead to formal supervisory action, the complaint said."

South Korean Prosecutors Indict Lone Star, KEB On Stock-Manipulation Charges. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A3, Santini, Yoon) reports, "South Korean prosecutors indicted Dallas private-equity firm Lone Star Funds and Korea Exchange Bank on stock-manipulation charges related to the bank's credit-card unit, part of a nine-month investigation that the U.S. firm has blamed on antiforeign sentiment in Korea." The Journal continues, "The chief prosecutor in the case, Chae Dong Wook, vowed to continue a separate probe into whether Lone Star illegally purchased the bank in 2003. Prosecutors have been examining whether government and bank officials conspired to understate KEB's financial health when Lone Star acquired control of the bank. Lone Star's role in that transaction is also under scrutiny." The Journal adds, "Korean lawmakers have threatened to nullify Lone Star's original purchase of KEB if wrongdoing is discovered, jeopardizing a $7 billion sale of the firm's controlling stake to Korea's Kookmin Bank that would secure a $4.5 billion profit for Lone Star. … In recent months, prosecutors have turned their focus to KEB's credit-card unit, leading some foreign investors watching the investigation to speculate that the prosecution had reached an impasse with the broader probe into the KEB purchase. Regarding KEB itself, prosecutors still haven't provided any evidence of wrongdoing by Lone Star in the transaction. … Last week, the Korean court issued arrest warrants for Lone Star's vice chairman, Ellis Short, and Michael Thomson, the firm's general counsel. Both men have refused to travel to Korea."

Coehlo's Stock Options Draw SEC Scrutiny. USA Today (11/21, Smith, 2.27M) reports, "Former U.S. congressman Tony Coelho received below-market stock options from Cyberonics in early 1994, three years before he joined the board, at a much deeper discount to the market price than the company's stock-option plan provided for at the time, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings. On Monday, Coelho was named chairman of the medical device maker after its former chairman and CEO, Robert Cummins, resigned under pressure." USA Today notes Coelho "resigned from Congress in June 1989 after failing to disclose on his congressional financial statement a 'junk' bond investment he had obtained on favorable terms. In recent years, Coelho and Appel cashed out their below-market options from Cyberonics at different times, reaping nearly $1.1 million in combined profits, SEC filings show. … Cyberonics is now under investigation by the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan, which are looking into the company's history of awarding lucrative stock options to company officers and directors."

Redstone's Nephew Sues Over Family Trust Management. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, B5, Angwin) reports, "Viacom Inc. Chairman Sumner Redstone, already facing a lawsuit from his son, now faces a suit from his nephew who claims he and other family heirs were bilked out of an approximately $4 billion stake in the Redstone family's business empire." The Journal continues, "The suit, coming nine months after Mr. Redstone's son Brent filed suit against his father seeking to gain direct control of the son's personal stake in the empire, is likely to add to questions about the strength of Sumner Redstone's hold on Viacom and CBS Corp., both of which are controlled by the Redstone family." The Journal adds, "In a lawsuit filed in a Massachusetts court this month, Michael Redstone alleges his father Edward Redstone and his uncle Sumner Redstone engaged in 'self-dealing,' 'breaches of fiduciary duty' and 'unjust enrichment as trustees of certain Redstone family trusts' when they bought his stake and that of other heirs in the family company, National Amusements Inc., in a series of transactions in 1972 and 1984. … Michael Redstone's suit against his father, uncle and the family company is joined by the trustees for trusts representing his late sister Ruth Ann and a trust set up for the four children of Edward Redstone and Sumner Redstone -- Michael, Ruth Ann, Brent and Shari. Michael Redstone and the trustees are asking for the 1972 and 1984 transactions to be rescinded or for damages 'in an amount equal to the present value of those shares.' … In a statement, National Amusements called the allegations 'baseless' and said it would defend itself vigorously."

DOJ_NMG_0096560

Insiders Made Millions Trading In Money-Losing Firm's Stock. USA Today (11/21, Smith) reports, "Cyberonics said Monday that its chief executive and chief financial officer had resigned after an internal investigation found that unnamed insiders had incorrectly reported the dates of company stock options for years." USA continues, "Cyberonics general counsel David Wise said in a filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission that the company had under-reported its executive compensation expense by about $10 million and would have to restate its financial statements going back to 1999. … The company's disclosures came at a time when one of the biggest financial scandals in years is sweeping U.S. corporate boardrooms. Federal authorities are examining at least 130 companies to determine whether insiders manipulated options-award dates to illegally profit from market gains, principally by backdating the options to an earlier date than issued to give themselves a head start on rising prices. To date, dozens of companies have announced executive departures or restatements after internal investigations. Two criminal cases are pending." USA notes, "A USA TODAY investigation reveals that Cyberonics' board has engaged in a series of questionable practices to reward Cummins, certain directors and some executives with stock and options almost from its inception as a public company in February 1993. Among its practices, the company frequently issued stock options just before market-moving events that insiders participated in, including merger talks, regulatory milestones and earnings advisories. It also repeatedly issued options at the lowest or second-lowest monthly trading price, SEC filings show. On one occasion, management, including Cummins, and a director who serves on the compensation committee, bought company stock at a discounted price in which Cummins represented himself both as the CEO selling the shares and as an individual buying them."

Paulson Criticizes Sarbanes-Oxley Law. USA Today (11/21, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "US Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said Monday that the tough, costly rules put in place to combat corporate frauds such as Enron need to be enforced in a more flexible manner if U.S. financial markets are to retain their competitive edge around the globe." In "his first major speech on market regulation," Paulson "said regulators' decision to 'impose rule upon rule upon rule' was making it more difficult for US markets to attract business from abroad. … 'When it comes to regulation, balance is key,' Paulson said. 'The right regulatory balance should marry high standards of integrity and accountability with a strong foundation for innovation, growth and competitiveness.'" The speech "comes amid increasing criticism from businesses that the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, designed to reduce accounting fraud and make corporate CEOs more accountable, is too costly and time consuming to implement."

The Financial Times (11/21, Grant, Guha) notes that "turning to enforcement, Mr Paulson said that a combination of enforcement and guidance was likely to be more effective and more efficient than relying on enforcement alone." The Washington Post (11/21, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports Paulson "rejected wholesale revisions to a corporate accountability law under attack from business groups. … 'I don't think there is a single principle in [Sarbanes-Oxley] that is ill-founded,' Paulson said after the speech." Paulson also "sought to take the debate beyond recent corporate reforms and into broader terrain. He singled out class-action lawsuits as an Achilles' heel in the legal system, which he contended have "gone beyond protection" of investors and now hamper business competition."

More Commentary On Sarbanes-Oxley. Former Labor Secretary Robert Reich, on CNBC's Kudlow & Company (11/20, Caruso-Cabrera), commented, "The question is, are the benefits to the public, to investors outweighing the costs and I think that any fair assessment of Sarbanes-Oxley would say that, it probably does have to be reformed," Sarbanes-Oxley "probably imposes greater costs than benefits" on small businesses.

Stephen Moore of the Wall Street Journal editorial board, on CNBC's Kudlow & Company (11/20, Carusi-Cabrera), said, "We are losing…our competitiveness in the financial markets which has to be one of the hallmarks of America's progress in the twenty-first century. We need to be the world's leader here and Secretary Paulson talked about the overregulation and many of the other problems imposed on small businesses, but…we have got to do something fundamentally in my opinion about Sarbanes-Oxley. We have CEOs of major companies, almost every week come to our editorial board at the Wall Street Journal and this first two words out of their mouth are Sarbanes-Oxley."

DOJ_NMG_0096561

Senate Hearing To Examine SEC's Effectiveness. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, C5, Scannell, 2.04M) reports the Securities and Exchange Commission, "already under fire for its handling of a suspected insider-trading case, will receive more congressional scrutiny next month when the Senate Judiciary Committee holds a hearing on the agency's effectiveness." Current Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter "has scheduled an oversight hearing on the SEC for Dec. 5." The hearing "comes as the SEC has been on the defensive since Sen. Specter and Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) said they were investigating the agency's handling of an insider-trading investigation involving hedge fund Pequot Capital Management and John Mack, the chief executive of Morgan Stanley. The matter, which was brought to their attention by a former SEC attorney, was referred to the Government Accountability Office for a thorough review of the SEC's enforcement division."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Expanding Global Presence To Fight Cyber Crime. Under the headline "To Catch Crooks In Cyberspace, FBI Goes Global," the Wall Street Journal (11/21, Bryan-Low, 2.04M) reports in a front-page story, "The 98-year-old FBI, which has traditionally focused on domestic crime, is extending its reach beyond U.S. borders and boosting cooperation with other law-enforcement agencies in pursuit of cybercriminals, much as the agency has done in tracking down terrorists overseas. … The FBI now ranks cybercrime as its third priority behind terrorism and espionage," and "building relationships with police in other countries is 'the only way we are going to effectively get a handle on the problem,' says Christopher Painter, deputy chief of the Justice Department's Computer Crime Section." Although "the FBI is running into limits fighting international computer crime," it "is making some headway, thanks partly to a diplomatic offensive to enlist help from foreign agencies. It now has about 150 agents deployed in some 56 offices around the world, including in Iraq and China," and "during the past two years or so, the FBI has also built up Cyber Action Teams, or CATs -- a group of about 25 people that includes agents, computer forensic experts and specialists in computer code, according to David Thomas, the deputy assistant director of the FBI's science and technology branch." The Journal goes on to report in detail on the 2005 Zotob attack and the bureau investigation that led to the apprehension and prosecution of the hackers who unleashed it.

Three Gang Members Sentenced To Life For Targeting Black Victims. The AP (11/21) reports, "Three members of a Hispanic gang were sentenced Monday to life in prison without the possibility of parole for using murder and other violent acts to intimidate blacks in their neighborhood." The AP continues, "Federal prosecutors had accused Gilbert Saldana, Alejandro Martinez and Fernando Cazares of targeting blacks in the largely Hispanic community of Highland Park, east of downtown Los Angeles. They were found guilty of conspiring to use violence, including the shooting deaths of two black men in 1999 and 2000." The AP adds, "Authorities said it was one of the first prominent cases in which the U.S. Justice Department targeted a street gang with laws normally used to prosecute white supremacist groups. … 'These were horrific offenses that have had far-reaching consequences,' U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson said during sentencing. … Each defendant received two consecutive life sentences. They were convicted in August."

US Backs Off Prison Restrictions For Aryan Brotherhood Members. The AP (11/21, Flaccus) reports, "Prosecutors have dropped plans to ask a federal judge to prevent leaders of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang from communicating with anyone but their attorneys, officials said Monday, but they may ask U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to do so instead." The AP continues, "Prosecutors will probably ask the Bureau of Prisons to impose the bans on Barry 'The Baron' Mills, T.D. 'The Hulk' Bingham, Edgar 'The Snail' Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson, said U.S. attorney's office spokesman Thom Mrozek. … The change means defense attorneys wouldn't be able to fight the restrictions until after they have been imposed, which would delay the appeals process, said Mark Fleming, an attorney representing Mills." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe filed papers Friday in federal court withdrawing a request for a federal judge to impose the restrictions. … An order would also keep writing implements, paper and previously viewed reading material out of the inmates' cells." The AP notes, "Mills, Bingham and Hevle are to be sentenced Tuesday for murder, conspiracy and racketeering. Gibson, who recently had back surgery, won't be sentenced Tuesday because he can't be present. .. Similar bans have been imposed only 11 times in the history of the federal prison system. Inmates Zacarias Moussaoui, the suspected '20th hijacker' in the Sept. 11, 2001, World Trade Center attack, and convicted Unabomber Ted

DOJ_NMG_0096562

Kaczynski are among those with restrictions on their prison contacts."

Ohio Republican Fundraiser Sentenced For Embezzlement . The AP (11/20) reports from Toledo, "A Republican fund-raiser who embezzled from a state investment in rare coins was sentenced Monday to 18 years in prison for his role in a scandal that helped bring down Ohio's ruling Republican Party. … The fund-raiser, Tom Noe, 52, was also fined $139,000." The AP continues, "Mr. Noe spent money as if he had 'a bottomless cup of wealth and luxury' at his disposal, 'when in fact it was at the state's expense,' Judge Thomas Osowik of Common Pleas Court said Monday. .. .The sentence is on top of the more than two years Mr. Noe was ordered to serve after pleading guilty earlier this year to illegally funneling $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign." The AP adds, "Mr. Noe was the central figure in a scandal that dogged the Ohio Republican Party for more than a year. On Election Day, the Democrats won the governor's office, a Senate seat and other major offices after 12 years of Republican rule. … Until Monday, prosecutors did not say whether Mr. Noe had used any of the money to make campaign contributions, but after the sentencing, the prosecutor, Ron O'Brien, said, 'You can make those inferences.' … Also for the first time, prosecutors on Monday calculated that Mr. Noe had stolen a total of $13.7 million. … Mr. Noe was hired by the state workers' compensation agency and given $50 million to invest in an unorthodox and risky effort by a state government to make money buying and selling rare coins. A furor erupted when the investment in rare coins became public and when it was learned that millions of dollars were missing."

Pennsylvania Man Charged In West Virginia Death Could Face Death Penalty. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/21, Simonich) reports, "Eugene Talik Jr., a married man accused of killing his girlfriend to hide their illicit affair, yesterday abandoned any hope of getting out of jail before he stands trial. … He waived his right to a bail hearing and to a second proceeding that would have forced federal prosecutors to reveal some of their evidence." The Post-Gazette continues, "Less than a minute after his court session began, Mr. Talik ended it by saying he did not want to go through either hearing. … U.S. marshals took him back to jail, where he will await his indictment in the death of 28-year-old Kelly Jo Elliott." The Post-Gazette adds, "Prosecutors say the victim and Mr. Talik, 38, were having an affair that soured after she learned he was married. … The government alleges that Mr. Talik and an accomplice killed Ms. Elliott to stop her from telling his wife. … Grand jurors will consider a murder-for-hire charge against Mr. Talik when they hear the case against him, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert McWilliams said in a motion opposing bail." The Post-Gazette notes, "After the indictment, Mr. Talik could face the death penalty, Mr. McWilliams said. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has the final decision on whether the government will pursue a capital case or try to imprison Mr. Talik for the rest of his life."

FBI Recovers Stolen Goya. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/21, Parry) reports, "The FBI said Monday that it has recovered a 1778 painting by the Spanish artist Francisco de Goya that was stolen as it was being taken to an exhibition earlier this month. … Steven Siegel, a spokesman for the FBI, said the bureau recovered the painting Saturday in New Jersey, but would not be more specific about where or how it was located. No arrests were made, but the case remains under investigation, he said. The FBI said extensive news coverage of the theft led to tips that enabled the agency to recover the painting." The AP adds, "Siegel said the thieves apparently did not know what was inside the truck when they broke into it. 'It was a target of opportunity. They probably thought it was a truck full of PlayStations,' he said." The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/21, Boyer, 385K) notes, "The FBI turned to the public for help after the insurer of the painting offered a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to its recovery. The FBI said the media attention led to tips and recovery of the painting, which appeared to be in good condition and not damaged."

The New York Times (11/21, Kennedy, 1.16M) reports, "Officials said the painting was recovered unharmed Saturday in central New Jersey after a lawyer called the F.B.I. and told investigators where they could find it while saying that he could not tell them anything else about the theft. … Contrary to earlier law enforcement theories that the theft was carried out by insiders, they did say it appeared that the thieves probably had no idea what kind of art-historical loot they had stumbled upon." Siegel noted, "There are literally predators — for lack of a better word — who when they see a tractor-trailer or a cargo vehicle parked for any length of time start snooping around." The Times adds, "One law enforcement official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said charges in the case could be filed as early as next week in United States District Court in Newark." The New York Sun (11/21, Hope) notes, "A spokeswoman for the FBI's Philadelphia office, Jerri Williams, said no arrests had been made and no one is in custody for the theft. 'A tip came in that allowed us to recover the painting,' she said."

The New York Daily News (11/21, Moritz, 729K) also reports on the FBI recovery of the painting, as did ABC News' The Blotter (11/20, Walter, Kjellman, 4:06 p.m.) and CNN.com (11/20, Brunswick, 8:22 p.m.).

Judge Rules Accused Cuban Spy's Alleged Confession Admissible At Trial. The Miami Herald

DOJ_NMG_0096563

(11/21, Weaver, 286K) reports, "A professor who acknowledged he was a Cuban government agent to the FBI has incurred a huge blow to his upcoming trial with a federal judge's ruling that his 'confession' to agents was not obtained illegally. U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Garber rejected…Carlos Alvarez's bid to throw out his statements on grounds that he only spoke with the FBI because of alleged promises not to prosecute if he cooperated as a 'double agent.' Garber said two FBI agents made no such promises during three days of interviews in a hotel last year, nor did they have that authority. The judge also found that the agents did not place him in custody, nor did Alvarez make his statements involuntarily." The Herald notes, "Either side has 10 days to object to the judge's ruling, issued last Wednesday."

Former Daley Patronage Chief Sentenced To Four Years In Prison. The Chicago Tribune (11/21, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 617K) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief stood defiant Monday as he was sentenced to almost 4 years behind bars for his central role in a political hiring scheme at City Hall." Robert Sorich "pointedly refused to apologize for his crimes before the judge slapped him with a 3-year, 10-month sentence. … 'I tried to do my best, and I tried to be fair,' Sorich said of his 12 years as a top aide in Daley's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs. U.S. District Judge David Coar rejected that, saying Sorich sat near the top of a hiring system that amounted to 'corruption with a capital "c."'" The Tribune notes, "Monday's sentencing almost certainly is not the final chapter of an investigation that has reached into the mayor's office. … On Monday, prosecutors again suggested that they have developed evidence against higher-ranking former city officials in Daley's administration." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/21, Robinson) adds Coar "said that 'for people to owe their jobs to political advancement rather than performance on the job stinks.' 'I don't give a hoot whether this has been going on for 200 years - it still stinks,' Coar said."

The Chicago Sun-Times (11/21, Korecki, O'Donnell) also notes Coar's harsh criticism of Sorich and reports, "Sorich lawyer Tom Durkin argued for no prison time, saying his client didn't take bribes or otherwise gain anything personally. Durkin criticized a legal system in which another corrupt former city official, former water czar Donald Tomczak, got a prison sentence just one month longer than what Sorich got, though Tomczak admitted taking $400,000 in bribes. Durkin criticized the U.S. Attorney's Office for its role in a system he said punishes those who fight charges and take their case to trial and rewards those who cooperate, even if they're more corrupt. … But prosecutors said they wouldn't apologize for a system that allows wrongdoers to make amends and help fix a criminal system."

NYC Bus Driver's Union President Charged With Racketeering, Extortion. The New York Times (11/21, Rashbaum, 1.16M) reports, "Federal prosecutors announced racketeering, extortion and bribery charges yesterday against the president of the 15,000-member city school bus drivers' union, who is already facing trial on charges that he tried to hide Mafia involvement in the union." The indictment against Salvatore Battaglia also "says he is a member of the Genovese crime family. The new charges came just weeks after the union's longtime secretary-treasurer, Julius Bernstein, pleaded guilty to federal racketeering charges and began cooperating with prosecutors and the F.B.I., law enforcement officials said. The new charges said that over at least two years, Mr. Battaglia and others agreed with the owners of a number of school bus companies not to organize their workers, in exchange for tens of thousands of dollars in payoffs from the owners."

Under the headline "FBI Busts Union's Boss On School Bus Shakedown Rap," the New York Daily News (11/21, Smith, 729K) reports, "Battaglia was arrested at dawn by the FBI at his Staten Island home, officials said. … The arrest comes two months after Matthew (Matty the Horse) Ianiello, a Genovese captain, pleaded guilty to charges of shaking down Local 1181. During his plea, Ianiello contended he'd arranged payments to the union from several city school bus companies.

Jeffs Evidence Hearing Begins Today. The Salt Lake Tribune (11/21, Adams) reports, "Word by word, every lesson, sermon and pronouncement polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs ever made is likely to be dissected and offered as evidence -- both against him and in his favor -- as his prosecution begins today." Jeffs "is to appear for a preliminary hearing in 5th District Court as the state of Utah makes its case that he should stand trial on two first-degree felony counts of being an accomplice to rape." The Tribune notes, "Of particular interest will be the FLDS version of premarital advice Jeffs gave in home economics classes for junior-high age girls and in priesthood history classes for boys. The teachings draw on the Bible and standard works of the mainstream Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which publicly disavowed plural marriage in 1890."

The Deseret Morning News (11/21, Winslow) reports, "A judge is expected to decide today whether there is enough evidence to make…Jeffs stand trial on charges he forced a 14-year-old girl into a marriage with a 19-year-old man who is also her first cousin. The young woman is expected to be the prosecution's star witness when she testifies against the Fundamentalist LDS Church leader today." The Morning

DOJ_NMG_0096564

News notes, "Washington County Attorney Brock Belnap said he intends to prove that Jeffs 'enticed (the victim) into submitting to sexual intercourse' with the man she had just married." However, "Defense attorney Walter Bugden Jr. says the state is confusing the culpability of the alleged rapist and Jeffs."

Meanwhile, under the headline "Polygamists Fight To Be Seen As Part Of Mainstream Society," the Washington Post (11/21, A1, Pomfret, 690K) notes the Jeffs hearing and reports that "among the estimated 40,000 men, women and children in polygamous communities are part of a new movement to decriminalize bigamy. Consciously taking tactics from the gay-rights movement, polygamists have reframed their struggle, choosing in interviews to de-emphasize their religious beliefs and focus on their desire to live 'in freedom,' according to Anne Wilde, director of community relations for Principle Voices, a pro-polygamy group based in Salt Lake." The Post adds that their "efforts… are paying off. Utah's attorney general, Mark L. Shurtleff, no longer prosecutes bigamy between consenting adults, though it is a felony."

FLDS Insiders Say Nevada Hotel Room Often Served As Wedding Chapel. The AP (11/21, Dobner) reports, "Room 15 at the Caliente Hot Springs Motel seems like an unlikely place for a wedding. … But it was in Room 15 that dozens of weddings took place between underage girls and men" from Jeffs' FLDS, "church insiders say. … Carolyn Jessop, a former sect member who used to run the motel, said that once or twice a month, beginning in the spring of 1999, she would get a telephone call telling her to plan for a weekend of weddings. Some insiders say as many as 10 such weddings were held in a single day." The AP notes that "sect leaders believed Caliente was a safe place — 'a way to go under the radar screen' — because Utah and Arizona were passing legislation to address underage marriage and threatening prosecution, Jessop said."

USA Today Finds Inaction On Many DNA Matches. USA Today (11/21, Willing) reports, "In a March 2003 speech arguing for $1 billion in new spending on DNA-based crime fighting, then-attorney general John Ashcroft singled out the FBI's DNA database for its many successes. … In Virginia, for example, he said authorities 'have been able to solve 90 homicides and 196 non-homicide sexual assaults' by matching the DNA left at crime scenes to the DNA of prior offenders." USA continues, "What Ashcroft didn't explain was that a DNA match — a crime 'solved' by the FBI's database — does not mean that an arrest was made, that a criminal was prosecuted or even that detectives considered a case closed. Just how many DNA matches lead to an arrest isn't known; no government agency keeps track. … But a USA TODAY investigation found almost three dozen cases during the past five years — including a rape in Virginia — in which investigators failed to pursue potential suspects whose DNA matched evidence found at crime scenes." USA adds, "DNA matches that could have closed cases weren't pursued because of basic police foul-ups, such as overlooking a telephone message reporting the match. Backlogs of unsolved "cold cases" that threaten to overwhelm some big-city police departments caused matches to be ignored, the newspaper found. In some jurisdictions — Richmond, Va., Cincinnati, and DeKalb County, Ga. — police offered no explanations for why matches were not pursued. … The suspects in two such cases, one a rape and the other the attempted sexual assault of a child, were later charged with committing subsequent sex crimes that might have been prevented had the first DNA match been pursued." USA notes, "USA TODAY reviewed hundreds of pages of court documents and local media reports and interviewed police, prosecutors, defense attorneys and lab officials to look for cases in which matches were made but police departments were slow to react."

New Orleans Defendants Freed Because Of Evidence Problems After Katrina. The New York Times (11/21, Drew, 1.16M) reports that as New Orleans' "criminal justice system slowly gears back up after Hurricane Katrina, as many as 500 defendants, mostly in drug, theft and assault cases, have been freed because of problems with evidence, including difficulty in finding the witnesses who have moved away. Law-enforcement officials say a few of those who were freed could potentially be violent, a cause for concern in a city battling a surge in drug-related killings." After the storm, "the evidence rooms at the Orleans Parish Criminal District Court sat in chest-high water for two and a half weeks. Only recently have court officials begun to realize the extent of the evidence problems within the old Beaux-Arts courthouse, which was closed for nine months and is still not quite back to full operations."

WPost Praises Outgoing Police Chief Ramsey. The Washington Post (11/21, A26) reports, "News that Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty has decided to turn to someone else to head the D.C. police department comes as no surprise. For some time, Mr. Fenty and D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey have not seen eye to eye on the department's performance, a fact that Mr. Fenty never kept secret. Under the circumstances, and given the incoming mayor's determination to be hands-on with the police force and other city agencies, it probably is best that he have a person of his choice leading the department when the Fenty administration gets started on Jan. 2. … The departure of Chief Ramsey is, however, a development that many District residents and this page receive with regret. The D.C. police force that the chief bequeaths to his successor is in far better shape than the one Mr. Ramsey inherited upon his arrival in Washington eight years ago. The credit goes to him. As the longest-serving police chief since the start of home rule three decades ago, Chief Ramsey, the record will show, made the best use of his time. In every major category of offense -- homicides, rapes, robberies, aggravated assaults, burglaries, larcenies and vehicle thefts -- rates are down. He took a department that was loosely run and staffed with poorly trained, quick-triggered officers and converted it into a better managed and more disciplined force. From scout cars to technology, police officers now do their jobs with 21st-century resources. … Mr. Fenty, in deciding to appoint police Cmdr. Cathy L. Lanier as the next chief, has drawn from within the ranks of the department. It is reassuring that Chief Ramsey spoke well of Ms. Lanier's appointment and that she also has the background and qualifications that Mr. Fenty seeks in a chief. They apparently agree on community policing, and she appears to be in sync with his leadership style. It will soon fall to the new leadership in the John A. Wilson Building and in police headquarters to maintain and expand on the advances achieved by Chief Ramsey. As for the departing chief, any police jurisdiction in the country would be fortunate to have him."

DOJ_NMG_0096565

CIVIL LAW:

Attorneys Argue Validity Of 1998 Law Aimed At Curbing Online Pornography. The AP (11/21, Dale) reports, :Justice Department attorneys, defending a law aimed at keeping online pornography from minors, argued that software filters often block valid sites — on gay rights or sexual health, for example — that teens might seek out. … 'Filters are hindering minors from learning about the world around them. That's a huge problem,' government lawyer Joel McElvain said Monday. 'There may be reasons the teenagers have problems speaking to their parents about these (issues).'" The AP continues, "Under the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, commercial Web publishers who fail to keep material 'harmful to minors' away from children could face fines and even prison time. The law has never taken effect, because of a long-running legal challenge filed by Salon.com, the Philadelphia Gay News and other groups represented by the American Civil Liberties Union. … Closing arguments concluded Monday before Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell Reed Jr., ending four weeks of testimony." The AP adds, "Justice attorneys evoked problems with the software filters even as they had defended their use in a 2000 law requiring schools and libraries to block porn if they receive certain federal funds. The high court upheld that law in 2003. … Opponents say the 1998 law is overly vague and would have a chilling effect on their work. They also say it would not apply to foreign Web operators or streaming video and audio. The ACLU argues that filters are more effective than legislation, because they let parents set limits based on their own values and their children's ages. … 'If you're a parent who doesn't want sexually explicit material slipping through, then set it (the filter) strictly,' ACLU lawyer Chris Hansen told the judge Monday. … The U.S. Supreme Court, indicating the government was unlikely to prevail, granted the ACLU a temporary injunction in 2004."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/21, Gambardello) reports, "A never enforced federal law aimed at protecting children from Internet porn is vague, threatens free speech, and will not achieve its intended goal, opponents of the measure argued today. … But the federal government countered that the Children's Online Protection Act, known as COPA, is needed because Internet filters are not foolproof and parents cannot be expected to supervise their children's Web surfing at all times." The Inquirer continues, "U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. heard those opposing positions as both sides made closing arguments at the end of a four-week trial in Philadelphia that had been ordered by the U.S. Supreme Court to determine whether technology developed since Congress passed COPA in 1998, such as commercially available filtering, offered effective ways to protect children. … The law would authorize jail time and heavy fines for online porn merchants who do not require adult-access codes, personal identification, or credit cards to access their Web sites." The Inquirer adds, "Plaintiffs, including the American Civil Liberties Union and a group of Internet artists, merchants and magazines, maintain that having parents use Internet filters and personal control and educate children on Internet usage is the least restrictive way to protect youngsters from porn and ensure the free flow of speech online. … The government pointed to credit cards and emerging online identification services as ways to ensure that only adults - those 17 or older - are accessing Internet porn."

Smokers Sue Phillip Morris For Lung Scans. The National Law Journal (11/21, Geier) reports, "A group of long-term Marlboro smokers has filed an action in federal court in New York to force Marlboro maker Philip Morris USA Inc. to give them regular low-dose CT scans to catch possible early signs of lung cancer." The Journal continues, "The action is unusual because it seeks only medical screenings for people whose smoking habit has put them at increased risk of lung cancer, said plaintiffs attorney Jerome H. Block of Levy Phillips & Konigsberg in New York. … 'The sole relief we are seeking is that Philip Morris pay for a program of CT scans,' Block said. The scans should be annual, or 'more frequent if something looks suspicious.' He noted that a recent article in the New England Journal of Medicine suggests that such a program would increase dramatically one's chances of surviving lung cancer." The Journal adds, "Block represents Marcia L. Caronia and four other named plaintiffs on behalf of a class of New York residents 50 years of age or older who have smoked Marlboro-brand cigarettes for at least 20 'pack years' -- an average of a pack a day for 20 years. Caronia v. Philip Morris USA Inc., No. 06-224 (E.D.N.Y.). … Generally speaking, early diagnoses of lung cancer now occur by happenstance, when doctors administering CT scans to patients with pneumonia or a broken rib, for instance, discover lesions and nodules that could be lung cancer, he said."

DOJ_NMG_0096566

Judge Strikes Down Bank Of America Ruling. The California Recorder (11/21, Scheck) reports, "Earlier this year, talk about the big class action against Bank of America was all about money -- the billion dollars or so in statutory damages, the $284 million in compensatory damages, and of course the correspondingly large contingency fee due the plaintiffs lawyers. … That all changed Monday when California's 1st District Court of Appeal struck down a trial court's ruling that the bank may not withdraw Social Security funds from customer accounts to pay for overdrafts and overdraft penalties." The Recorder continues, "In a trial presided over by San Francisco Superior Court Judge Anne Bouliane, plaintiffs lawyers James Sturdevant and Thomas Brandi had successfully argued that Bank of America's practice of debiting government benefit fees was illegal. … Central to their arguments -- and to Bouliane's jury instructions -- was a 1974 case that said a bank couldn't take public benefit money out of an account to cover a credit card debt. They said the case, Kruger v. Wells Fargo Bank, 11 Cal 3d 352, presented an analogous situation to that of lead plaintiff Paul Miller." The Recorder adds, "In 1998, after Miller had spent money that Bank of America mistakenly credited to his account, the bank withdrew money from Social Security benefits to cover the overdraft. … While the bank eventually returned the money, it repeated the pattern on two other occasions. Miller eventually sued, arguing that government-directed deposits shouldn't be subject to such seizures. … In a unanimous, 14-page opinion Monday, Justice Peter Siggins disagreed with verve."

Court Rules Internet Users, Providers Not Liable For Posted Defamatory Material. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Dolan) reports, "Internet users and providers cannot be held liable for posting defamatory material written by someone else, the California Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday. … 'The prospect of blanket immunity for those who intentionally redistribute defamatory statements on the Internet has disturbing implications,' Justice Carol Corrigan wrote for the court. Immunity 'serves to protect online freedom of expression and to encourage self-regulation.'" The Times continues, "Monday's decision was consistent with holdings by many federal appeals courts and one other state supreme court. … 'The courts are now uniform,' said Ann Brick, who represented the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California in the case. … But attorneys on both sides of the case said the California Supreme Court went further than other courts by giving immunity to all Internet users except the original author. … 'What you couldn't put in your print newspaper, you can put in your Internet newspaper,' said Christopher E. Grell, who represented two doctors who said they were defamed. 'The notion of fact checking and verifying things doesn't apply to the Internet./" The Times notes, "Mark Goldowitz, the lawyer for the defendant, cited a line in the ruling that the decision brought 'the law of libel from the Gutenberg era to the cyberspace era.' … Unlike hard-copy publications, the Internet allows users to 'immediately respond and correct any harm,' Goldowitz said. 'Not everyone has a printing press, but everyone can start a blog or post on a news group.'"

The Wall Street Journal (11/21, B5, Delaney) reports, "Legal experts say the decision1 is in line with prior court rulings on immunity for transmitting content online originating from someone else, who themselves may still be held liable for defamation or other claims." The Journal adds, "The California court ruling came in the case of Stephen J. Barrett et al. v. Ilena Rosenthal. The case concerned an article Ms. Rosenthal received via email and posted on two Web newsgroups that the plaintiffs argued was defamatory. … 'This opinion reinforces the broad reach of federal statutory immunization for content published by third-parties online,' said Eric Goldman, Assistant Professor at Santa Clara University School of Law and Director of the school's High Technology Law Institute. 'This case is significant because it shuts down all of the workarounds people have been trying to find.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Democrats Will Target Election "Robo Calls." USA Today (11/21) reports, "Senate Democratic leaders say they'll push legislation next year to make it a federal crime, punishable by fines and jail time, to use automated 'robo calls' and other tactics to mislead and discourage voters. … 'We're going to find some way to stop this,' says Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the incoming majority leader." USA continues, "Civil rights and watchdog groups say some voters complained this year of being barraged by automated recorded campaign calls. Though many were only annoying, some gave misleading information, directing voters to the wrong polling site or raising questions about whether a voter was registered. … 'We definitely think it's a good idea for Congress to investigate and hold hearings on these issues and to consider carefully targeted legislation focused on outright deception,' said Elliot Mincberg of the liberal People for the American Way, which helped operate a national hotline for voter complaints." USA adds, "Tova Wang of the Century Foundation says misinformation in flyers and calls, practices employed by Democrats and Republicans, aim to suppress voter turnout. … New York Sen. Charles Schumer, who is helping to draft Democratic legislation, plans to call for a separate division within the Justice Department to deal with such problems. Penalties could include up to 10 years in jail. … In a letter to Justice officials Thursday, Schumer said he was disappointed with the department's response to voter complaints. … Justice officials defended their record in a letter responding to Schumer, noting that investigations recently have been launched into alleged voter deception and intimidation in Arizona, Maryland, Virginia and elsewhere."

DOJ_NMG_0096567

Georgia Prosecutors Launch Review Of Excessive Force Cases. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/21, Weber) reports suburban Atlanta prosecutors "will extensively review at the police chief's request 14 shootings by police, including eight that were fatal, this year following concern about the high number of killings compared to the nation's two largest cities. Prosecutors also have received a request to investigate the death of another person who died in police custody but was not shot, and they expect to be asked later to look into four other fatal shootings by police in September and since then, Adora Andy, a spokeswoman for the DeKalb County District Attorney's Office, said Monday. The review request comes as police released details of an internal probe into the shootings in which a police review board has found that an officer in one fatal shooting was unjustified in using deadly force. Officers involved in three nonfatal shootings were found to be unjustified."

UCLA Officer In Taser Video Has Been Subject Of Two Other Use-Of-Force Complaints. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Proctor, Winton) reports, "The UCLA police officer videotaped last week using a Taser gun on a student also shot a homeless man at a campus study hall room three years ago and was earlier recommended for dismissal in connection with an alleged assault on fraternity row, authorities said." The Times continues, "UCLA police confirmed late Monday that the officer who fired the Taser gun was Terrence Duren, who has served in the university's Police Department for 18 years. … Duren, who was named officer of the year in 2001, also has been involved in several controversial incidents on campus." The Times adds, "In an interview with The Times on Monday night, Duren, 43, defended his record as a campus police officer and urged people to withhold judgment until the review of his Taser use is completed. … 'I patrol this area the same way I would want someone to patrol the neighborhoods where I live,' he said. 'People make allegations against cops all the time. Saying one thing and proving it are two different things.' … While he would not directly talk about why he used the Taser on the student, he said a videotape of any arrest doesn't necessarily tell the whole story. … 'If someone is resisting, sometimes it's not going to look pretty taking someone into custody,' he said. 'If you have to use some force, it's not going to look pretty. That's the nature of this job.' … A student's cellphone video of the incident has been broadcast around the world and focused much criticism on the officer."

Judge Strikes Las Vegas Ban On Feeding Homeless In Parks. The AP (11/21, Ritter) reports, "A federal judge ruled Monday that the city cannot make it illegal to feed poor people in city parks." The AP continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones issued an injunction prohibiting enforcement of a City Council ordinance passed in July that prohibits "providing food or meals to the indigent for free or for a nominal fee" in a city park and defines indigent as a person whom a reasonable ordinary person would believe to be entitled to public assistance." The AP adds, "Las Vegas Mayor Oscar Goodman said handouts discourage homeless people from seeking help from social service providers set up to handle mental health and substance abuse problems. Neighbors had complained of large numbers of homeless people congregating at downtown parks, drawn by groups providing meals. … Jones told lawyers for the city and the American Civil Liberties Union of Nevada that he intends to issue an order killing the measure. No date was set for final action."

WPost Says Both Parties Should Embrace Ryan Abortion Bill. Columnist E.J. Dionne, Jr. from The Washington Post (11/21, A27, 690K) writes that "the politics of abortion began to change," when in September, "a group of 23 pro-choice and pro-life Democratic House members introduced what they called the Reducing the Need for Abortion and Supporting Parents Act." The Ryan bill, one of several congressional initiatives to reduce the abortion rate," both "favors programs that encourage effective contraception," and "emphasizes helping women who want to carry their children to term." It includes "a remarkably broad set of programs aimed at reducing teen pregnancy, promoting contraception and encouraging parental responsibility. But it also includes strong measures to offer new mothers full access to health coverage, child care and nutrition assistance," and both parties should "embrace this approach."

DOJ_NMG_0096568

ANTITRUST:

Suspected Municipal Bond Abuses Raise Tax Questions. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, D5, Connor) reports, "The latest outcropping of suspected U.S. municipal-bond-related abuses, including bid-rigging on guaranteed investment contracts used in some muni transactions, has cast a cloud of potential taxability on billions of dollars of bonds sold to investors as tax-exempt securities." The Journal continues, "One federal official familiar with the situation said the amount of bonds in question remains to be determined but that a conservative estimate could be between $10 billion to $15 billion. He added that the final tally likely will be far larger than that." The Journal adds, "Wide-ranging criminal and civil probes of suspected muni-related illegality are now under way, with the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission investigating suspected violations unearthed initially by the Internal Revenue Service. A number of firms, including leading providers of guaranteed investment contracts, or GICs, have received federal subpoenas recently. .. .The IRS's probe of bid-rigging on GICs -- which are insurance contracts that pay a fixed interest rate over a set period of time, and are often used in retirement plans and in connection with certain muni deals -- has been under way for some time. In early 2005, Mark Scott, then head of the IRS's muni enforcement program, said that "we have a lot of evidence pointing to bid-rigging for GICs in municipal-bond transactions.""

Private Equity Firms Fuel Takeover Boom. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Petruno, Friedman) reports, "Elite private investors are buying up major companies at a record pace, in a wave of deals that is raining riches on Wall Street but also may be raising the risk of a financial bust." The Times continues, "Investors led by Blackstone Group announced late Sunday the biggest takeover ever by a so-called private equity fund, a $36-billion deal to buy Equity Office Properties Trust, the largest U.S. owner of office buildings. … The proposed purchase follows announcements in recent months of buyouts that would put firms including radio giant Clear Channel Communications Inc., casino titan Harrah's Entertainment Inc. and food-service company Aramark Corp. in private hands, taking their shares off the stock market." The Times adds, "Takeovers are nothing new in American business, but historically the largest deals have involved companies whose shares are publicly traded buying other companies. … This year, the buyers behind the biggest deals are private equity funds — run by generally secretive investment firms that raise money from pension funds, wealthy individuals and other investors who are hungry for double-digit returns on their capital."

Debt Is Common Element In Recent Spate Of Mega-mergers. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, C1, Ng, Zuckerman, Hudson) reports, "Wall Street's cash spigots are turned wide open. … That means the recent deluge of merger and buyout deals could keep rising even though signs are emerging that some target companies are being loaded with increasingly risky levels of debt in the process." The Journal continues, "More than $60 billion in deals were consummated in the past 48 hours of frantic merger and buyout activity, not including the debt assumed from target companies in these transactions, according to Dealogic, a research firm. The deals included a $20 billion private-equity bid for real-estate giant Equity Office Properties Trust and stretched from Europe to Canada to the U.S. More than 35 deals were announced globally, leaving bankers looking broadly to other sectors -- including health care, technology, gambling and home building -- for the next megatransactions." The Journal adds, "One important factor behind the year's takeover boom is a well-oiled financial machine: buyout firms searching out prey and raising cash with bonds and loans that are then sold off to investors around the world. Leveraged buyouts account for some 17% of the $3.4 trillion in transactions announced globally so far this year. … The overall pace of deal making already surpasses the $3.3 trillion record set in 2000. Almost $1.3 trillion of mergers have been announced in the U.S. alone, though that is still off from the 2000 pace, which was driven by the tech boom and included many transactions in which companies were acquired in stock swaps." The Journal notes, "The common denominator now is debt. In the U.S., corporations have sold $109 billion in 'high yield,' or junk, bonds and raised an additional $593 billion in junk-rated bank loans so far this year, according to Dealogic. Last year they raised $707 billion in bonds and loans in the U.S."

Freeport To Acquire Phelps Dodge In Copper Merger. The New York Times (11/20, Sorkin, Austen) reports, "Phelps Dodge, the world's second-largest copper producer, will be acquired by Freeport-McMoRan Copper and Gold, a smaller rival that has been embroiled in environmental and human rights controversies, in a cash and stock deal worth $25.9 billion, the companies said yesterday." The Times continues, "The transaction, if approved by shareholders, would create the world's largest copper producer and the largest mining company based in North America. It is the latest move in a series of mining and metals mergers. Like companies involved in other mining mergers, Freeport-McMoRan promoted the idea that increased size has become an important competitive factor." The Times adds, "The chairman and chief executive of Phelps Dodge, J.

DOJ_NMG_0096569

Steven Whisler, said yesterday that the two companies have talked about a possible merger for about a decade. The premium of about 33 percent being offered by Freeport-McMoRan, Mr. Whisler said, was a decisive factor in Phelps Dodge's decision to end its 172-year history as an independent company. … The boards of both companies have approved the transaction. Under its terms, stockholders in Phelps Dodge will receive $88 a share in cash plus 0.67 of a Freeport-McMoRan share. Based on Friday's closing, the deal is offering Phelps Dodge shareholders a 33 percent premium."

Mattel Lays Claim To MGA Entertainment's Bratz Line. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, B1, Binkley) reports, "Barbie has a new tactic in her battle against the rival Bratz doll clan: If you can't beat 'em, own 'em." The Journal continues, "Mattel Inc., maker of Barbie, is attempting to lay legal claim to the Bratz fashion-doll empire created by its rival MGA Entertainment Inc. The El Segundo, Calif., toy maker yesterday filed documents with U.S. District Court in California arguing that the Bratz dolls rightfully belong to Mattel, whose Barbie franchise has been dented by competition from the saucy, big-headed dolls that appeared on the market in 2001." The Journal adds, "The argument is based in part on Mattel's claim that the designer of Bratz was employed by Mattel when he did initial drawings for the dolls several years ago. Recently, Mattel's lawyers quietly applied for copyright protection on a number of early Bratz drawings, according to the documents. … Moreover, the documents claim that closely held MGA Entertainment hired away a number of key Mattel employees in Mexico, the U.S. and Canada. Mattel says those employees 'stole' confidential sales information, documents, plans, and other Mattel secrets -- copying the information onto hard drives or using other means to transfer the intelligence to MGA over the past six years or so. … Among other sources of information, including depositions of witnesses, the documents cite emails that appear to have been recovered from the personal computers of several former employees."

Probe Finds Cephalon Used Questionable Tactics To Sell Actiq. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, B1, Carreyrou) reports, "From setting unrealistically high sales quotas to pushing larger prescriptions at higher doses, drug maker Cephalon Inc. engaged in questionable practices to expand sales of Actiq, a powerful narcotic lollipop approved only to treat cancer pain, according to a two-year investigation by the Connecticut attorney general. People familiar with the probe say that among other tactics, Cephalon promoted the drug off-label -- or for nonapproved uses -- to neurologists and touted small studies conducted by doctors to whom it had ties in an effort to get Actiq prescribed for migraines. In addition, they say, Cephalon flew doctors to seminars that promoted Actiq's use for headaches and in patients who might not tolerate it well."

LSE Rejects Nasdaq's Offer. The Financial Times (11/21, Cohen) reports, "London Stock Exchange on Monday batted away a £2.7bn ($5.1bn, €4bn) 'final' offer to be acquired by US-based Nasdaq, saying the bid so undervalued the company its board was not even willing to meet for further discussions." The Times continues, "Posturing by both parties is likely to be played out in coming weeks." Under the UK takeover code, "Nasdaq cannot raise its offer unless either its board recommends a bid or a competing bidder emerges. If it fails to acquire the company, it cannot bid for another 12 months." Nasdaq's latest offer is the second it has made for LSE "and the fifth approach LSE has received in the past two years."

Offer Price An Issue. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, Lucchetti, MacDonald) reports that early on Monday, "Nasdaq took another run at the London Stock Exchange, proposing to buy the approximately 71% of the company it doesn't own for £12.43 a share, or $23.55, valuing the LSE at £2.7 billion, or $5.1 billion." Nasdaq "will likely have to increase its offer price if it wants a chance of taking over" LSE. The Journal adds, "Nasdaq has a 60-day period under British takeover rules in which to convince LSE shareholders and its board to negotiate. Nasdaq billed its latest approach as its 'final offer.'" A "combined company would be home to Britain's giants such as Vodafone Group PLC and BP PLC, and Nasdaq's technology-oriented giants such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Intel Corp. but also thousands of smaller companies that have chosen Nasdaq in the U.S. and LSE's AIM exchange to list." The Washington Post (11/21) also publishes this story this morning.

Nasdaq Planning To Make Another Run. The New York Times (11/21, Timmons, Kanter) reports, "Nasdaq officials said that while they still hoped to reach a friendly deal" with the LSE, "they planned to go ahead with their offer." Nasdaq's chief executive, Robert Greifeld, said during a call with investors that he would like to reach a deal to take over LSE with the approval of the London exchange's board. Nasdaq "expects to post an official offer this week, at which time London Stock Exchange holders have 28 days to tender their shares. That period can be extended to 60 days. In addition, 30 days after posting a formal offer, Nasdaq can buy more shares of the London exchange on the market." The Times adds, "On Monday, the British government said it was open to foreign ownership in London but stressed that any takeover must not threaten the current regulatory framework."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Financial Times (11/21) discusses recent attempts by various entities to take over the LSE, the latest one being the US exchange Nasdaq. The Times says Nasdaq "should not be turned down because it is American. The LSE is a profitable, private business and there is no public interest in protecting it from foreign ownership. It is important to ask, however, if the US authorities would allow a deal if the LSE were trying to buy Nasdaq." The Times adds that for users, the "real prizes would be mergers among Europe's national exchanges and the merger of Deutsche Börse's clearing and settlement arm with LCH.Clearnet, which performs that function for the LSE and Euronext. A Nasdaq deal with the LSE brings such outcomes no closer. Shareholders in the LSE are likely to accept an offer at the right price," but "stock exchange users will still sigh about the handsome Europeans the LSE turned away" before Nasdaq came along.

DOJ_NMG_0096570

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

National Park Service Proposes Snowmobile Plan For Yellowstone. The AP (11/21, Jalonick) reports, "The National Park Service wants to maintain snowmobile regulations allowing 720 snowmobiles per day to enter Yellowstone National Park." The plan "would limit snowcoaches in Yellowstone to 78 per day and require those vehicles to meet sound and emissions requirements." The drafted plan would also "allow 140 snowmobiles a day to enter Grand Teton National Park and the John D. Rockefeller Jr. Parkway, which connects the two parks." The plan "was issued to other government agencies," and park officials "stressed that the report is only a draft and that the plan is the agency's preferred alternative out of several proposals." A final plan "is expected to be issued in time for the 2007-2008 winter season."

The New York Times (11/21, Robbins, 1.16M) reports, "Officials are seeking comments from the states and counties that border the park and will release another draft document for public comment early next year," and "the new plan will go into effect for the winter of 2009." Snowmobile in Yellowstone has been "hugely controversial and political." The Clinton administration proposed "banning snowmobiles; the Bush administration proposed a limit of 1,000 a day."

Marine Protection Sought For Northwest Atlantic. The AP (11/21) reports, "Parts of the northwest Atlantic Ocean stretching from Cape Cod in Massachusetts to the northeastern tip of Nova Scotia in Canada should be declared off-limits to fishing and other human activities in order to protect threatened marine species, two environmental groups said Monday." The AP continues, "The Boston-based Conservation Law Foundation and the World Wildlife Fund-Canada recommended creating 30 marine reserves extending 10 miles to 200 miles from shore. … The proposed zones include productive fishing areas, however, and creating the reserves in U.S. waters would require federal authorization." The AP adds, "A fishing industry official worried that closing large areas permanently could make it harder for fishermen to earn a living. … 'They have to be very careful not to close an area that is producing a lot of net benefit to the nation,' Vito Giacalone of the Northeast Seafood Coalition told The Boston Globe newspaper. … The groups said they used computer technology to identify offshore areas where a large number of species could be protected while imposing the fewest restrictions."

Conrad Defends Agricultural Disaster Assistance Funding. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (11/21), Sen. Kent Conrad responds to a November 15 Journal editorial that criticized the North Dakota Senator for seeking funding for agriculture assistance. Conrad said the Journal "editorial 'Fargonomics' misrepresents the facts on agriculture disaster assistance. My bipartisan legislation would bring badly needed federal aid to the thousands of farm and ranch families whose livelihoods were destroyed by natural disasters including drought, flood, frost and disease." To "represent the deepening drought of the Great Plains as anything but a national disaster is an affront to every farm family in the Midwest. This is the third worst drought in U.S. history, searing millions of acres of crops and livestock forage, and driving producers and the small town businesses that rely on them to the brink of foreclosure. If we do not respond, the drought will be followed by economic disaster across the plains."

Navajo Tribe's Efforts At Desert Radiation Cleanup Thwarted By Delays, Disputes. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Pasternak) reports from Church Rock Mine, NM, "Most of the mining companies that drilled, dug and blasted for uranium on the Navajo reservation during the Cold War did nothing to repair the environmental damage they left behind. For a time, tribal leaders staked their hopes for a cleanup on Superfund, the landmark legislation that forces polluters to pay for remediation of toxic sites." The Times continues, "More than 1,000 abandoned mines are scattered across the Navajo homeland, which covers 27,000 square miles in Arizona, Utah and New Mexico. … Such a comprehensive cleanup is 'exactly what Superfund was designed for,' said Paul Connor, a lawyer who once directed Superfund enforcement policy for the Environmental Protection Agency." The Times adds, "It hasn't happened. Bureaucratic delays and misunderstandings between the tribe and the EPA have prevented the Navajos from tapping Superfund's deep pockets and broad legal authority. … Instead, the tribe reluctantly settled for a partial cleanup under a separate program. That effort left many hazards untouched. … One of them is in Church Rock Mine, a Navajo community named for an abandoned uranium site. A 30-foot-high heap of grit and dynamited stone from the mine looms over a cluster of 15 homes. The wind roars for hours at a time, scattering radioactive dust throughout the settlement. … For years, residents appealed to tribal leaders and the U.S. government for help. In 2003, tired of waiting, they joined forces with Navajo activists who were using a foundation grant to conduct radiation testing. … In a dry wash where generations of children had played catch and tag, they discovered elevated radiation levels. .. As word spread of the citizen effort, authorities stirred at last. Under pressure from the tribe, the EPA opened negotiations with the mine's operator, United Nuclear Corp., and its parent, General Electric Co., to clean up the mess."

DOJ_NMG_0096571

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senate Appropriations Bill Might Order FBI To Recover VCF Funds From SAIC. Government Computer News (11/20, Dizard) reported, "The Senate's draft of the appropriations bill for the Justice Department and the FBI would order the bureau to use 'all means necessary' to try to recover funds from the vendor of its failed Virtual Case File project. In an unusual action, according to several sources, the draft legislation…directs the bureau to retrieve as much as $104 million from the defaulted VCF contract. … The Senate's reference to 'the VCF contractor' especially singles out SAIC." GCN noted, "If the FBI were to try to take legal action to recover the VCF funds, it would be stepping into a legal and political minefield," and "sources close to the project said that some of the senior officials in place during the VCF fiasco — including director Robert Mueller — still hold powerful jobs in the bureau, and their reputations could suffer if a public lawsuit or civil trial unveiled the details of their roles." A "federal official involved in the VCF incident said, "The world's greatest investigative body slowed this down. The answer is culpability of the FBI officials who are still there. Mueller says he takes the responsibility. I still think there is accountability and culpability."

Philadelphia Inquirer Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation. In a continuing report on the DEA's "first global Internet pharmacy case," the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/21) today reports Akhil Bansal, "smuggling a half-million pills a month from India, prepares for the biggest business meeting of his young life. It is July 2004." The Manhattan meeting Bansal's father, Brij Bansal, "had set up from India was too important to ignore any detail. A Costa Rican client sought an exclusive deal to buy 500,000 generic pills a month. Millions of dollars were at stake." The Inquirer continues, "Like most law enforcement agencies in Philadelphia, DEA liked to keep cases in the family. When other agencies got involved, DEA worried about losing control. Or sharing the credit - what feds called 'the stat' - or sharing cash, cars and property seized in the arrests. … This case was different. DEA had never conducted an Internet pharmacy case on such a scale. It needed help." So far, DEA "had identified suspect Web pharmacies in Australia, India, Germany, New York, Virginia and Philadelphia. The pharmacies bought generic drugs for pennies a pill, then sold them online, without requiring a prescription, for a dollar apiece."

Texas Man Caught With 1,700 Pounds Of Marijuana Pleads Guilty. In Louisville, Kentucky, the AP (11/20) reports a Texas man "pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy to distribute marijuana after he was caught driving a semi-trailer truck loaded with about 1,700 pounds of pot hidden among broccoli, authorities said. Erasmo Castillo, 27, of Starr County, Texas, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to distribute marijuana and one count of possession of marijuana with intent to distribute. … Castillo was arrested by DEA agents on June 27, 2005."

More Than 100 Charged In Kentucky Prescription-Drug Investigation. The Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal (11/20) reports more than 100 people "have been charged in connection with a joint federal and state investigation into illegal prescription-drug trafficking in Eastern Kentucky. State arrest warrants were issued Monday for 103 people in Eastern and Southeastern Kentucky, people that authorities described as street-level dealers. … The drugs in most of the cases involved prescription painkillers such as OxyContin, authorities said."

Pharmacists Arrested. The Lexington (KY) Herald Leader (11/21) reports, "Two licensed Kentucky pharmacists were among nearly 70 people arrested yesterday afternoon in a huge crackdown on prescription drug abuse in Eastern Kentucky. David Gregory Jones, who owns RX Express in Ashland, and Dan Daffron, owner of Quick Script in Monticello, face federal indictments charging them with unlawful distribution of controlled narcotics. … U.S. Attorney Amul Thapar said law enforcement officials were still searching for more than 30 others suspected of trafficking prescription drugs."

The AP (11/21) reports police "are still looking for about 50 more alleged street-level drug dealers named in indictments. They also are looking for black market distributors from Georgia, Indiana, Ohio and Tennessee."

Trainer Returns To Prison For Refusing To Testify Against Barry Bonds. The AP (11/21) reports Barry Bonds' personal trainer "returned to prison Monday afternoon for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury investigating Bonds' steroid use. Greg Anderson has twice been freed on technicalities. He was ordered to report after an appeals court last week upheld the entirety of his contempt-of-court citation. … The Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal has netted five convictions, including Anderson's, and one pending indictment."

DOJ_NMG_0096572

"Operation Central Hub" Reveals Links To Drug Organizations In 5 States, Mexico. The Washington Times (11/21) reports DEA agents in Mississippi "assisted by local law-enforcement authorities, have arrested 27 persons, confiscated more than $15 million in cocaine and marijuana and seized cash and property worth $3 million as part of a lengthy undercover investigation. 'Operation Central Hub targeted and successfully dismantled one of the largest drug-trafficking operations ever known to operate in the state of Mississippi,' said DEA Assistant Special Agent Stephen Luzinski in the agency's Jackson, Miss., field office." Rusty Payne "said yesterday that the investigation also yielded criminal links to drug organizations in Dallas; Atlanta; Little Rock, Ark.; Detroit; and Laredo, Texas." Payne "said Operation Central Hub also produced important connections to Mexico, revealing direct criminal links and associations between select Mississippi organization heads and Mexican drug sources of supply."

The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (11/21) reports federal authorities "credit Gulfport-area narcotics agents with starting an investigation that has dismantled one of the largest drug-trafficking operations in Mississippi. The investigation has resulted in 27 arrests and the seizure of $15 million in drugs and $2.9 million in cash and other assets, said Stephen Luzinski, assistant special agent in charge of the DEA in Jackson. … Once the drug shipments crossed the U.S. borders, they were shuttled to various cities, primarily in 18-wheelers driven by employees of Mexican drug bosses. The drugs often were hidden in compartments or commingled with legitimate cargo loads."

ATF Finds Bomb, Components In Texas. The Nacogdoches (TX) Daily Sentinel (11/21, Taravella) reports, "The components of an explosive device and a psilocybin mushroom/marijuana-growing operation were discovered early Monday in a unit at Lakewood Village Apartments, by Nacogdoches police officers investigating an assault." The Sentinel continues, "One resident of the apartment unit was undergoing psychiatric evaluation Monday. At press time, no arrests had been made." The Sentinel adds, "Nacogdoches police and fire, along with University police officials and ATF agents cordon off a section of apartments where they say they found 'components' that could be used to craft an explosive device. … A joint investigation is being conducted by the Nacogdoches Police Department and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, according to Sgt. Greg Sowell, NPD community relations officer. … Although Sowell did not release the nature of the components seized by the ATF, he said the ATF is describing them as 'components that could be assembled as an improvised explosive device.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Texas Legislators Propose Stripping Benefits From Children Of Illegals. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/20) reported, "Children of illegal aliens who are awarded American citizenship because they were born in this country -- there is a rising movement to change that practice." CNN continued, "The Texas state legislature is considering a law to deny welfare and other benefits to the American citizen children of illegal aliens. … Sponsors hope it leads to a review of the 14th amendment to ensure citizenship to former slaves. Today it's widely interpreted as a guarantee of citizenship to virtually anyone born in this country." CNN adds, "Some lawmakers are trying to change the 14th amendment by granting automatic citizenship only to children with at least one parent who's a U.S. citizen or legal permanent resident. 88 lawmakers co-sponsored a Bill in the US House last year that would have made that change but it stalled in committee. The proposed Texas law is another example of local governments trying to crack down on illegal immigration because the federal government has failed to do it."

Immigration Enforcement May Be Causing Shortage Of Harvest Laborers. USA Today/Arizona Republic (11/21, Gonzalez) reports on C.R. Waters, "farm manager for a major vegetable distributor" who "is worried that when the vegetables are ready, there won't be enough laborers to get crops out of the fields to market." Waters, president of the Yuma Fresh Vegetable Association, says that "if growers can't find enough workers, some crops may go unpicked. That could increase prices at the supermarket, and create substantial financial losses for farmers." The shortages "are not limited to the Yuma region. Vegetable growers in Colorado, pear growers in northern California, and apple growers in Washington, all have lacked workers." Immigrants "have served as the backbone of the labor force in Yuma. Many farmworkers, however, have been drawn by steady jobs at housing developments and construction sites sprouting up around Yuma that pay better. The increased presence of Border Patrol agents also has scared some illegal workers already in the USA away from Arizona. In the past year, the Border Patrol also doubled the number of agents assigned to the Yuma sector to 551. Another 200 are on the way. T he buildup is having an effect, the Border Patrol reports. Arrests for the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 declined 14%, to 118,549 from 138,438 the year before."

DOJ_NMG_0096573

TAX:

IRS Says More Audits Lead To Increased Tax Revenue. The AP (11/21, Abrams) reports, "A taxpayer who made more than $1 million had a one-in-16 chance of being audited by the IRS in the fiscal year just ended, up slightly from the year before." The AP continues, "Commissioner Mark W. Everson said in a telephone news conference Monday that the Internal Revenue Service also paid more attention to the filings of small businesses that tend to underreport incomes and to the records of tax-exempt organizations." The AP adds, "Overall, enforcement revenues for fiscal 2006 were $48.7 billion, up from $47.3 billion. Revenues in fiscal 2005 had jumped 10 percent because of collections from a crackdown on improper tax shelters. … The 'tax gap,' the difference between what taxpayers owe and what is collected, has been estimated as $345 billion annually, and congressional Democrats coming to power see closing this gap as an important way to raise revenue without raising taxes. … Everson said that audits of individuals making $1 million or more increased to 17,015 from 12,835. That was an increase only from 6.1 percent to 6.3 percent because of the growing number of millionaires. About 1 percent of all taxpayers face audits.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Leadership Plans To "Punt" Spending Bills Until Next Congress. The AP (11/21, Taylor) reports, "Republicans vacating the Capitol are dumping a big spring cleaning job on Democrats moving in. GOP leaders have opted to leave behind almost a half-trillion-dollar clutter of unfinished spending bills. … The bulging workload that a Republican-led Congress was supposed to complete this year but is instead punting to 2007 promises to consume time and energy that Democrats had hoped to devote to their own agenda upon taking control of Congress in January for the first time in a dozen years. The decision to drop so much unfinished work in Democrats' laps demonstrates both division within Republicans ranks and the difficulty in resolving so many knotty questions in so short a time." According to the AP, "Driving the decision to quit and go home rather than finish the remaining budget work is a determined effort by a group of conservative Republicans to prevent putting a GOP stamp on spending bills covering 13 Cabinet Departments — and loaded with thousands of homestate projects derided as 'pork' by critics."

GOP To Challenge Application Of Pay-Go Rules. The Hill (11/21, Schor) reports, "Democratic leaders vowed even before their decisive Election Day victories to demonstrate their commitment to fiscal responsibility by restoring the pay-as-you-go statute, also known as pay-go, should they win back the majority. Pay-go under law, which expired in 2002, required any new mandatory spending or tax breaks to be offset or risk automatic across-the-board spending cuts. While budget analysts often point out that the hefty Democratic agenda for the 110th Congress would present an immediate challenge to pay-go, Republicans blast pay-go as a tax hike in budget-cutting clothing. … Though they have little hope of defeating a Democratic pay-go plan next year — the vice president cast a tiebreaking vote to stave one off in March — Republicans are poised to put up a fight for a pay-go rule that treats taxes and entitlements equally." The Hill notes, "The Congressional Budget Office treats reauthorized entitlements as pre-existing programs, relieving lawmakers of the need to find offsets under pay-go, but Democrats could tweak their new pay-go rule to apply to more entitlement spending."

Meanwhile, in an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/21, 2.04M) Roger C. Altman, deputy secretary of the Treasury in the first Clinton administration, and Alan S. Blinder, former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, write, "Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi has promised to restore pay-as-you-go financing -- a bipartisan set of budget rules that were originally adopted under the first President Bush, but then brushed aside under his son. Unfortunately, when paygo went, so did any pretense of fiscal discipline. A coincidence? We think not. The new Congress should bring back paygo immediately."

Pelosi Stresses "Pocketbook" Issues, Pledges To Work With GOP. The AP (11/21, Abrams) reports House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi "said Monday her new Democratic majority will extend a hand to Republicans in moving the agenda of relieving the 'middle-class squeeze.'" Pelosi, "following a strategy meeting with the next House majority leader, Steny Hoyer…said she will meet with incoming House Minority Leader John Boehner and 'we'll find our common ground for the American people.'" Pelosi and Hoyer "repeated that in the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress that convenes in January, they will try to pass bills that directly affect the pocketbooks of working-class and middle-class people, including raising the minimum wage, cutting interest rates for student loans and allowing the Medicare program to negotiate lower drug prices. Other top priorities for January are lobbying reform, implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and rolling back subsidies to the oil industry."

The Washington Times (11/21, Fagan, 88K) reports Pelosi and Hoyer "said they expected bipartisan backing for their efforts to lessen the 'squeeze' on the middle class, specifically increasing the minimum wage, lowering Medicare prices and cutting interest rates on student loans. But Mrs. Pelosi said Democrats can pass those measures on the strength of their new majority alone, if need be."

DOJ_NMG_0096574

The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A1, Wessel, 2.04M) reports, "By almost every measure, the gap between winners and losers in the American economy has widened over the past 20 years. In this month's election, anxiety about that gap was not far behind voter anger over Iraq and congressional corruption in driving Democrats to victory. 'We will make our economy fairer' vowed House Democrats, in a campaign manifesto. Now they're in a position to try, raising a big question: What can Democrats do to resist inequality in a way that doesn't choke off economic growth? Can government slice the economic apple more evenly without shrinking it?" The Journal add, "High on Democrats' to-do list is lifting the federal minimum wage. … But its potential to shrink the gap between the wealthiest and poorest wage-earners is limited, especially when wages at the top are soaring far away from the middle and bottom. Limiting pay at the top has proven tough." Rep. Barney Frank, in line to chair the House Financial Services Committee, "vows to push legislation that would force companies to provide more and clearer details of CEO pay, devise policies to recapture incentive pay if earnings are later restated, and require shareholder approval of 'golden parachute' payments to dismissed executives.'

Economists Predict "Gridlock" In New Congress. The Wall Street Journal's web-only "Washington Wire" column (11/21) reports, "Forty-six of 48 economists in the latest WSJ.com economic forecasting survey said they believe an increase in the federal minimum wage is very or somewhat likely to be passed in Congress and signed by the President. As for the raft of other economic issues at hand — tackling the finances of entitlement programs, dealing with foreign trade, addressing the tax code — the economists expect gridlock. Entitlement programs, such as Social Security and Medicare, should be the top priority for Congress when Democrats take control next year, the economists said. But 44 of the 48 economists believe it is somewhat or very unlikely any reform will be signed into law. The story is little different on other fronts: On ensuring that trade negotiations move forward, 31 say unlikley. On revising the Medicare drug benefit, 30 say unlikely. On extending tax breaks for the wealthiest: 37 say unlikely. Rescinding the breaks? Thirty-six."

Pelosi's Handling Of Intelligence Committee Could Undermine Her Leadership. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Neuman, Finnegan, 850K) reports that the "relationship" between Reps. Nancy Pelosi and Jane Harman "has been deteriorating since Harman returned to the House in 2001, according to those who know them, and the tension now threatens to complicate Pelosi's role as House speaker when the 110th Congress convenes in January. Pelosi indicated as early as last year that she intended to oust Harman from the Intelligence Committee — where Harman expected to become chairwoman once the Democrats won control of the House -- in favor of someone more to Pelosi's liking. The move has created dissension within the party. Some Democrats and foreign policy experts argued that Harman, a centrist on national security, is the most credible person for the job. … The coming battle over the Intelligence Committee leadership is turning into a showdown where the political has turned personal. And it could undermine the unity that the Democratic Party had hoped to show as it prepares to take the reins of power."

House Democrats Putting Together Multifaceted Ethics Reform Package. The Washington Post (11/21, A4, Weisman, 690K) reports, "Despite divisions among Democrats over how far to go in revising ethics rules, House leaders plan a major rollout of an ethics reform bill early next year to demonstrate concern about an issue that helped defeat the Republicans in the midterm elections. But they will do it with a twist: Instead of forwarding one big bill, Democrats will put together an ethics package on the House floor piece by piece, allowing incoming freshmen to take charge of high-profile issues and lengthening the time spent on the debate. The approach will ensure that each proposal -- including banning gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists as well as imposing new controls on the budget deficit -- is debated on its own and receives its own vote. That should garner far more media attention for the bill's components before a final vote on the entire package. … Under that plan, freshmen would offer, over as many as five days in January, separate amendments to ban gifts, meals and travel financed by lobbyists, said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), incoming chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. New rules mandating the disclosure of all contacts with lobbyists would be another vote, as would a rule requiring that the sponsors of funding for home-state pet projects be identified."

Gates Meets With Levin. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/20) reported, "Robert Gates, named to replace Donald Rumsfeld as Secretary of Defense, went back to Capitol Hill today to seek support from both parties. Gates met with democratic Senator Carl Levin, the ranking Democrat and soon to be chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. He met with other Senators last week. He's expected to testify to the Armed Services Committee early in December. Democrats, as of now, are not opposing his nomination."

Gates Critic Accuses Him Of Being Blinded By Ideology. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (11/21, 850K) Jennifer Glaudemans, a former CIA analyst, writes, "fifteen years ago, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence asked me to testify at the confirmation hearings for Robert M. Gates, who had been nominated to be director of Central Intelligence. … I was asked to testify because of my knowledge about the creation of a May 1985 special National Intelligence Estimate on Iran that had been used to justify the ill-fated deals known as Iran-Contra." According to Glaudemans, "It was well known among analysts at the time that we would have a hard time getting Gates to sign off on analyses that did not fit his ideological preconceptions. All one had to do was look at his margin comments on controversial papers to know what was going on. Fortunately for him, classification and layers of bureaucracy kept those comments from public view. Today, however, many cases of politicized intelligence are a matter of public record. The National Security Archive, a not-for-profit organization, has posted many documents on its website that tell the story. … The nomination of Robert Gates to become secretary of Defense is an opportunity for him to demonstrate that he has learned from his mistakes and for Congress to reassert its constitutional authority."

DOJ_NMG_0096575

Democrats Distance Themselves From Rangel's Support For Draft. NBC Nightly News (11/20, story 4, 2;05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Veteran New York Democratic Congressman Charlie Rangel says if the United States reinstated the draft, the American people would demand a swift end to the Iraq war. Rangel is himself a decorated veteran of the Korean War and is a critic of the Iraq war. His comments were meant to attract attention and today they did." NBC added Rangel "argues that today's all-volunteer military, with all its economic incentives, draws too heavily from low-income communities. A point the Pentagon disputes." NBC noted, "every key Democrat who has weighed in is opposed. … Rangel concedes there's no chance his proposal for a draft will become law. He's pushing it, he say, to make a point about a war he opposes."

The Washington Post (11/21, A4, Babington, White, 690K) reports, "The new Democratic-controlled Congress will not seriously consider reinstating the draft, even if concerns about the military's strength and resiliency grow, party leaders said yesterday. Key Democrats, including the incoming House speaker, House majority leader and chairmen of the House and Senate armed services committees, said they do not support a resumption of the draft. They predicted that the idea will gather little momentum in the 110th Congress. … Pentagon officials also restated their opposition to a draft." The Washington Times (11/21, Scarborough, Fagan, 88K) reports Rangel "periodically has urged a draft revival as a mechanism to criticize President Bush's handling of military deployments in the war on terrorism. He renewed his call again on Sunday, saying on CBS' 'Face the Nation' that 'if we're going to challenge Iran and challenge North Korea and then, as some people have asked, send more troops to Iraq, we can't do that without the draft. ... I will be introducing that bill as soon as we start the new session.'"

NYTimes Criticizes Rangel's Proposal. The New York Times (11/21, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "There are many reasons why we are distressed to hear that Representative Charles Rangel of New York plans to reintroduce his annual measure aimed at resurrecting the draft when the Democrats take control of the House in January. We don't favor military conscription in general. And in this particular case, compelling military service won't achieve the things Mr. Rangel says he wants, either."

Democrats Expected To Boost Generic Drugs. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A4, Mathews, 2.04M) reports congressional Democrats' "vow to cut health-care costs might spell bad news for the brand-name pharmaceutical industry, but their efforts could provide new momentum for the generic-drug rivals' agenda." Boosting the "generics industry may prove to be a politically palatable way to follow up on the party's campaign promises. That's because making more room for generics is meant to cut prices through increased competition -- a solution that is easier to sell as pro-market than other proposals Republicans will portray as precursors to federal price controls." Laws "providing vital funding to the Food and Drug Administration and encouraging studies of drugs' use in children," which are up for renewal in 2007, "could provide gridlock-proof vehicles for generics provisions." The "most important question will likely be how and whether to create a legal pathway for the FDA to approve generic versions of biotechnology drugs." An "array of other measures aimed at smoothing the way for traditional generic drugs will also get attention, and could well be tucked into broader bills next year. Among them are proposals to limit branded-drug company tactics that thwart generic competitors, such as licensing additional companies to sell their drugs and thus diluting the profits to be made from copying them."

House Intelligence Panel Reinstates Clearances For Democratic Aide. The Washington Post (11/21, A3, Pincus, 690K) reports Larry Hanauer, a Democratic staff member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, "has had his security clearances reinstated and yesterday resumed work for the panel, ending a pre-election drama during which senior House Republicans alleged he may have leaked an intelligence report that was politically embarrassing to the Bush administration." Hanauer had "signed an affidavit that he did not 'discuss, disclose or cause to be discussed or disclosed' a National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq to any person 'affiliated with the press.'" Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) "wrote on Friday to ranking Democrat Jane Harman (Calif.) that the affidavit and the results of the committee staff director's interview of Hanauer were enough for him to rescind the punishment."

DOJ_NMG_0096576

GOP Said To Ignore Election Results In Retaining Blunt. In a New York Times op-ed (11/21), Thomas Edsall says, "Last Friday, the Republicans gave the Democrats a gift that will keep on giving: Roy Blunt of Missouri. After an election repudiating the politics of Jack Abramoff and Tom DeLay, Republicans elevated Blunt from the number three spot in the leadership to number two." But Blunt "embodies the insidious, half-legal corruption that has permeated the G.O.P. majority since 1995. Blunt's election as minority whip, by a 137-to-57 margin, was a defiant Republican rejection of calls to clean up their act. Warnings by Blunt's challenger, John Shadegg of Arizona — 'We ceded our reform-minded principles in exchange for a ...tighter grip on power' — went unheeded."

Democrats' House Majority Equals GOP's High Water Mark. The New York Times (11/21, Toner, 1.16M) reports the new House of Representatives "looks increasingly like a mirror image of the old: the Democrats are likely to have a majority close to 232, which was the Republicans' majority in the departing Congress." Though that "may seem small compared with the Democrats' glory days," the "new Democratic majority is comparatively comfortable; 232 was the high-water mark for the Republicans in the 12 years they held power." The "strength of the Democratic showing in the elections this month was underscored by one statistic: they did not lose a single seat. They have gained 29 and, in New England, left the Republicans with just one House seat — that of Representative Christopher Shays of Connecticut — out of 22 in the region."

Gains In Mountain West Could Show Long Term Competitiveness. USA Today (11/21, Kasindorf, Kenworthy, 2.27M) reports a "wave of Democratic blue is splashing the fast-growing Rocky Mountain West, which until recently was so Republican that all eight states in the region went red for President Bush in 2004." Democrats are "celebrating their Election Day seizure of a U.S. Senate seat, a governorship, three U.S. House seats and other major offices in Rocky Mountain states. That extends a trend started in 2002 with winning three governor seats. Now, Democrats are hoping to break the Republican lock on the inland West in the 2008 presidential race." But the "question is whether the Western shifts indicate a fluke, the normal turn of a cycle or a permanent realignment." Some Republicans "say their party should gird for long-term trouble." GOP strategist Eddie Mahe said, "The West is not going to be as definitively conservative and Republican as it has been. The Rocky Mountain West is probably trending to look more like a lot of the remainder of the country, not quite as unique as it once was." USA adds Randy Pullen, "a Republican National Committee member from Arizona, says the election was a one-shot loss." Pullen said, "This election was a referendum on the president. We'll fare better in two years."

McClatchy (11/21, Thomma) reports a "lot of states that were dependably Republican Red are now some other hue. Call them purple, striped or polka-dotted - the fact is they're now open to Democrats." Though they "haven't gone completely over. But they did elect some Democrats, signaling that they're in play. And that means a new center of gravity for the Democrats as they struggle to define themselves by governing in Congress the next two years and setting the table for 2008, hoping to consolidate this year's gains and win back the White House." Democrats "gained in states such as Colorado, where they picked up the governor's office," and "also picked up Senate seats in once-solid red states, such as Ohio and Virginia. And they gained U.S. House of Representatives seats in such red states as Arizona, Colorado, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Tennessee and Texas." In part that "reflects changes within those states. Migration of Democrats from the North to the Sun Belt continues to dilute the Republican red zone. Immigration brings new voters from Mexico and farther south, the majority of them Democrats once they vote." It also "reflects changes in the Democrats, who this year recruited centrists and moderates to compete in culturally conservative areas."

Democrats' Failure To Win Southern Seats Analyzed. The New York Times (11/21, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports the South "largely sat out the drama of the recent election, apparently confirming its reputation as the Democrats' graveyard. An influential book published in October predicted as much, saying the party could safely avert its gaze from a region that could not be of help." Thomas F. Schaller of the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, author of "Whistling Past Dixie: How the Democrats Can Win Without the South," said, "They don't need the South to win. Why would Democrats go after the most rural, least unionized, most racially polarized, most evangelized region in the country?" The Times adds, "But not so fast. The thundering silence from the South may prove nothing more than what should be obvious: when Democrats do not compete, or compete unequally, they lose." Democratic Party officials in Tennessee "acknowledged that Mr. Ford was not an ideal candidate for the state, and not just because he was a black politician trying to climb the steep mountain of a white electorate. His own political baggage added significantly to his burden."

Democrats' Control Of Senate Said To Be Precarious. USA Today (11/21, Kiely, 2.27M) reports that when Democrats "take over the Senate in January, the party's bare two-vote majority will include three senators whose history shows they heed their own views more than those of any political leader." Just how "precarious is the Democrats' grip on power? The 51 senators who will make up the party's Senate caucus beginning in January include two who aren't officially Democrats — independents Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont — and Jim Webb of Virginia, who used to be a Republican." The 110th Congress "will be the first since 1976 to have two people who don't belong to the two major parties serving in the Senate at the same time. Republicans will occupy 49 of the chamber's 100 seats." In the "new Senate, where every roll call could be a squeaker, political hybrids Lieberman, Sanders and Webb stand to be key players. No wonder incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid lavished plum committee assignments on the trio last week."

DOJ_NMG_0096577

Democrats Have Expensive List Of Priorities. USA Today (11/21, Wolf, 2.27M) reports Democrats "will return to power in Congress with a lengthy list of expensive priorities and a pledge to pay for them. Some budget experts say the dual goals don't add up." Democratic leaders have "endorsed an ambitious agenda that includes fortifying the military, improving homeland security, helping veterans, making college more affordable, establishing energy independence and boosting private savings rates. Annual tab: at least $79 billion, according to the National Taxpayers Union, a group opposed to higher taxes." The Democrats also "want to protect 20 million upper middle-income taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax. It was originally designed to ensure the rich didn't avoid paying taxes, but it threatens to raise taxes on the less affluent unless it's indexed for inflation. Cost: $50 billion a year, according to the Joint Committee on Taxation." And they want to eliminate the coverage gap in Medicare's prescription-drug program, which forces those with big drug bills to pay at least $3,600 out of pocket. Price tag: about $30 billion a year and rising, according to the Congressional Budget Office." Democratic leaders also say "they will reinstate budget rules that expired in 2002. They want statutory caps on most domestic and defense spending. They also want new tax cuts or benefit increases offset by other tax increases or spending cuts to keep the deficit from growing." Former Clinton White House chief of staff Leon Panetta said, "They can't basically have all of those priorities … without deciding who's going to pay the bill, and that means either cuts in spending or increases in revenue. There's going to be a huge temptation here to borrow the Republicans' example of borrow and spend."

Study Recommends TSP Not Include REITs. The Washington Post's Stephen Barr, in his "Federal Diary" column (11/21) writes, "Don't bet the mortgage that the Thrift Savings Plan will add a real estate investment fund, or any other option, soon. A consultant hired by the TSP said yesterday that the retirement savings program for government employees is generally comparable to 401(k) and similar plans offered in the private sector and did not recommend any changes. … About 200 House members are co-sponsoring a bill that would add a real estate investment fund to the TSP, which prompted the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board to order the $140,000 study. After the board signaled opposition to adding a real estate option and sought the study, the chief sponsors of the bill put it on hold."

WSJournal Accuses White House Of "Pandering" To Textile Industry. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "Congress's failure to pass Permanent Normal Trade Relations with Vietnam embarrassed President Bush on his visit to Hanoi last week," but "this failure is an even bigger fiasco than it appears because of the White House's pandering to the U.S. textile industry." The Administration "chose to make one more protectionist concession," and "is promising to protect the US yarn industry against a surge in imports of other textile products." The "trade precedent here is dangerous, and probably violates World Trade Organization rules." This "fiasco is another illustration that tactical protectionist concessions rarely yield the strategic free-trade gains that supporters claim."

OTHER NEWS:

Leading Indicators Up In October; Existing Home Sales Down. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, Derby, 2.04M) reports, "An indicator of future economic activity inched higher in October, a private research group said Monday, suggesting that recent weakness in the housing market hasn't been severe enough to offset lower gas prices and a rising stock market. Separately, the National Association of Realtors reported that existing home sales in the third quarter dipped to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.27 million units nationwide, down 12.7% from the same period a year ago." The Conference Board "said its composite index of leading economic indicators for October rose by 0.2% to 138.3, after a revised 0.4% advance the month before. The index was equal to 100 in 1996. October's rise matched forecasters' expectation."

Economists Believe "Worst Of The Housing Bust Is Over." The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A2, Izzo, 2.04M) reports, "The worst of the housing bust is over, economists said by nearly 2-to-1 in the latest WSJ.com economic forecasting survey. But they still predict that the average selling price of a house will fall next year. … The 49 economists responding to the WSJ.com forecasting survey expect home prices, measured by the government's Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight index, to rise 2.8% this year and to fall by 0.5% next year. That contrasts with a 13.4% increase in 2005." USA Today (11/21, Knox, 2.27M), meanwhile runs a story titled "Homes' Losing Streak To Continue," citing the National Association of Realtors' numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0096578

Stocks Mixed Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (11/20, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today a mixed finish. The Dow was down 26 points [to close at 12,316.54]. NASDAQ gained almost 7 points [to close at 2,452.72] on the day." The Financial Times (11/21, Mackenzie) notes "the S&P 500 slid 0.70 points, or 0.05 per cent to 1,400.50, having reversed an early fall below the 1,400 threshold it closed above on Friday." The Wall Street Journal (11/21, C1, McKay, 2.04M) also reports the stock numbers.

WSJournal Says Mergers Show Economy Is In Good Shape. The Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "Yesterday's tally was at least $52 billion in M&A activity before the market opened for the normally slow Thanksgiving week." This "is a sign that the animal spirits that give the U.S. economy its dynamism are alive and well." As an economic matter, "it is largely irrelevant whether the shares are publicly traded or not," and "we doubt the employees of such profitable closely held concerns as Cargill or Koch Industries fret much that their shares aren't listed on any public exchange. What they care about is that their companies are successful." Meanwhile, "a vibrant market for corporate control keeps managers alert and hunting for new opportunities," and "whatever the bad individual bets, the current merger wave is a sign of continuing economic vitality."

Utility Industry Markets Seen As Flawed. The New York Times (11/21, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "A growing chorus of large industrial power users, municipal utilities and consumer groups say there is a reason the price of electricity has not fallen since the federal government opened the heavily regulated utility industry to competition a decade ago. The new markets, they argue, do not work right." They identify "a variety of reasons. For one thing, when electricity producers offer to supply power for use the next day, utilities pay everyone the highest price accepted." Critics "also contend that producers can withhold power or limit production, with little risk of penalty, even when demand is at its highest, meaning prices soar." The Times adds, "A coalition of large industrial companies filed a complaint in September, arguing that [FERC] had failed to ensure proper competition and that it had stymied efforts by others to investigate allegations of improper conduct by withholding some of the data it collects." FERC "dismisses the critics, saying that where it has determined that a market for electricity exists, the prices in that market are assumed to be 'just and reasonable,' the standard set in federal law."

Venezuelan Discounted Heating Oil Program Comes To Washington DC. The Washington Post (11/21, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports that today, "Minnie Davis, a 65-year-old widow who lives with three of her grandchildren on North Capitol Street, is scheduled to get some unusual visitors -- the Venezuelan ambassador, the chief executive of Citgo Petroleum and former congressman Joseph P. Kennedy II. The occasion: The arrival of a Venezuelan-backed program to bring 7.5 million gallons of deeply discounted heating oil to as many as 37,000 low-income households in Maryland, Virginia and the District and free heating oil to some homeless shelters." The Post adds, "The program has the blessings of Venezuela's populist President Hugo Chavez, who has used it to demonstrate that he cares about the poor in the United States as well as Venezuela -- while tweaking President Bush."

Family Of Slain Journalist Sues DC For $20 Million. The Washington Post (11/21, B1, Cauvin) reports, "The children of slain New York Times reporter David E. Rosenbaum filed a $20 million lawsuit yesterday against the District and Howard University Hospital, claiming that their father was a victim of official negligence and medical malpractice." The Post continues, "Filed in D.C. Superior Court, the lawsuit comes less than a month after a jury convicted a 42-year-old man of murdering Rosenbaum during a robbery. The other suspect in the case had pleaded guilty shortly before the two were to go on trial." The Post adds, "The crime occurred on a quiet Northwest Washington street in a usually safe part of the city, stunning the neighborhood and many people who had known Rosenbaum. He was 63 and had just retired after three decades at the Times. Days later, questions surfaced about the emergency care he received at the scene on Gramercy Street and at Howard University Hospital, where he died Jan. 8, two days after the attack. … Those questions led to one damning revelation after another. Rosenbaum was misdiagnosed as a drunk. The ambulance bypassed the closest hospital because one of the emergency medical technicians had personal business to attend to near Howard. At Howard, Rosenbaum was not seen by a physician for more than 90 minutes and was not given a neurological evaluation until he had been there almost four hours, the lawsuit says. Daniel and Dorothy Rosenbaum say in their suit that these actions contributed to their father's death."

The Washington Times (11/21, Cella) reports, "The first hearing in the case is scheduled for February before Superior Court Judge Robert Morin. … The lawsuit follows closely the findings of the city's inspector general, who issued a report in June citing an 'unacceptable chain of failure' in the response." The Times adds, "According to the report, responding D.C. police officers failed to recognize that a crime had occurred, did not search the victim for identification and did not write an incident report. … The report said firefighters who responded to the scene did not assess or treat Mr. Rosenbaum correctly. They detected the odor of alcohol and discounted other potential causes of Mr. Rosenbaum's symptoms because of it. … In addition, the ambulance was delayed when the crew got lost on the way to the scene from Providence Hospital in Northeast, and the ambulance driver decided to take Mr. Rosenbaum to Howard University Hospital instead of the closer Sibley Memorial Hospital because Howard was nearer to her home."

DOJ_NMG_0096579

The New York Times (11/21) also reports on the suit.

Typos In Bills Can Invalidate Laws, Redirect Funding. USA Today (11/21, Heath) reports, "If you're reading this in New York, you're probably too drunk to drive. … That's because lawmakers accidentally got too tough with a get-tough drunken-driving law, inserting an error that set the standard for 'aggravated driving while intoxicated' below the amount of alcohol that can occur naturally." USA continues, "The one-word mistake makes the new law unenforceable, says Lt. Glenn Miner, a New York State Police spokesman. However, drivers with a blood-alcohol content of 0.08% or higher can still be prosecuted under other state laws." USA adds, "In the legislative world, such small errors, while uncommon, can carry expensive consequences. In a few cases around the nation this year, typos and other blunders have redirected millions of tax dollars or threatened to invalidate new laws. … In Hawaii, for instance, lawmakers approved a cigarette-tax increase to raise money for medical care and research. Cancer researchers, however, will get only an extra 1.5 cents next year — instead of the more than $8 million lawmakers intended. That's because legislators failed to specify that they should get 1.5 cents from each cigarette sold, says Linda Smith, an adviser to Gov. Linda Lingle. … When such mistakes happen, they often come during the last-minute rush of legislative sessions, says Bruce Feustel, a senior fellow at the National Conference of State Legislatures. What's important, he says, is that lawmakers can fix them before they cause any harm." USA notes, "Courts generally intercede only in the most obvious cases, says University of Notre Dame law professor John Nagle. If judges tried to change every legislative error, Nagle says, 'you get the courts trying to figure out what they think is a mistake that might not be a mistake at all.'"

Buchanan Named Winner Of Disputed Florida House Seat. The New York Times (11/21, Aguayo, 1.16M) reports Republican Vern Buchanan was "named the winner on Monday in a disputed race in Sarasota where thousands of votes may have been lost by electronic machines," and Democrat Christine Jennings "immediately sued for a new election." Buchanan "won by 369 votes in the Nov. 7 election, according to results confirmed by the Florida Elections Canvassing Commission, which is made up of Gov. Jeb Bush; Tom Gallagher, the state chief financial officer; and Senator Daniel Webster of Winter Garden, all Republicans." The results "were confirmed in a machine recount and a manual one." Jennings "argued in documents filed in Leon County Circuit Court in Tallahassee that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned and not registered votes for her."

The Washington Post/AP (11/21, A5, Kaczor) reports Jennings asked "a judge to order a new election because of problems in Sarasota County, where more than 17,000 voters who cast ballots in other races Nov. 7 failed to vote in the congressional contest. That rate is nearly six times higher than in the other counties in the congressional district or on Sarasota's paper absentee ballots, Jennings alleges in her legal challenge. Though she lost in the other four counties in the district, Jennings did well in Sarasota County, winning there by a 6 percentage point margin." The lawsuit is "not Jennings' final option. She also could appeal the results to the House, which will be under Democratic control next year." The AP adds three other House races remain in limbo – Ohio's 2nd and 15th CDs and North Carolina's 8th CD. The AP adds, "Late Friday, elections officials in New Mexico's 1st District released an unofficial tally showing that Republican Rep. Heather Wilson won her race against Democrat Patricia Madrid by a margin of 879 votes out of more than 210,000 cast."

Congressional Quarterly (11/21, Benenson) reports Jennings "defeated Buchanan in Sarasota County, 53 percent to 47 percent. Democrats argue that if the undervote rate in Sarasota County was comparable to the undervote rate in the other counties, Jennings surely would have beaten Buchanan." Kathy Dent, "the Republican supervisor of elections in Sarasota County, and others have suggested that the campaign's negative tone may have turned people away from participating in this race. Other analysts say that voters might have overlooked the 13th District contest because of where the candidates' names were placed on Sarasota County ballots." But Jennings' attorney Kendall Coffey "said Monday that the machines were at fault and needed to be examined. 'This is clearly a case of machine error — not ballot design error and not voter error,' Coffey said."

USA Today (11/21, 2.27M) reports the story in a brief section.

Extent Of Clinton's Campaign Spending Concerns Some Democrats. The New York Times (11/20, Kornblut, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "had only token opposition," but she "still spent more on her re-election — upward of $30 million — than any other candidate for Senate this year. So where did all the money go?" The campaign expenditures helped Clinton "win a margin of victory of more than 30 points. It helped her build a new set of campaign contributors. And it allowed her to begin assembling the nuts and bolts needed to run a presidential campaign." But Sen. Clinton "also bought more than $13,000 worth of flowers, mostly for fund-raising events and as thank-yous for donors. She laid out $27,000 for valet parking, paid as much as $800 in a single month in credit card interest and — above all — paid tens of thousands of dollars a month to an assortment of consultants and aides. Throw in $17 million in advertising and fund-raising mailings, and what had been one of the most formidable war chests in politics was depleted to a level that leaves Mrs. Clinton with little financial advantage over her potential rivals for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination — and perhaps even trailing some of them." The campaign's "financial record has fueled some criticism among Democratic activists and prompted concern among Mrs. Clinton's supporters, including complaints from some of her fund-raisers that her top aides exercised a lack of discipline." Beyond the "level of spending, there is also some concern within the Clinton camp about the adequacy of the controls on what is being spent." A "close friend of Mrs. Clinton, Maggie Williams, received a $37,500 consulting fee, paid to her firm, Griffin Williams Critical Point Management, at the end of July." When asked what the "payment was for, Mrs. Clinton's campaign aides checked and subsequently responded that the payment had been a mistake. They said it should have been for less than $5,000 to reimburse Ms. Williams, who served as chief of staff to Mrs. Clinton in the White House, for travel costs. They said Ms. Williams would return the extra money."

DOJ_NMG_0096580

Women Made Historic Gains In This Year's Elections. The Christian Science Monitor (11/21, Feldmann, 59K) reports that when the "winners of the Nov. 7 elections are sworn in in January, Democratic women - and some Republicans - will have cause to cheer: The House will have its first female speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D) of California. Congress will have its largest corps of women ever - 16 in the Senate and at least 71 in the House, from both parties." Women will also "hold nine governorships, tied with the record set in 2004, and other elective statewide jobs that could position them for higher office." For the "first time, the chair of the National Governors Association will be a woman, Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) of Arizona." In state legislatures, "a record 2,426 women were general-election candidates, and unofficial results show 1,735 winning, which would be a record. In addition, women appear set to build on their record number of top leadership spots in state legislatures." But "ultimately, women remain far from achieving equality. In the next Congress, the record 87 women members will represent 16 percent of the 535 seats.'

Brownback To Announce Decision On Presidential Run Next Month. The AP (11/21, Hananel) reports Sen. Sam Brownback, "who is considering a White House bid in 2008, said Monday the Republican field has room for a 'full-scale Ronald Reagan conservative' and pledged to make a final decision next month." Brownback said he "was not discouraged from running by the Democrats' strong gains in this month's midterm elections, including majority control of the House and Senate." Brownback, "who was elected in 1996, is a forceful foe of abortion and embryonic stem-cell research. He also has taken a prominent role in the fight against genocide in Sudan's Darfur region."

McCain, Romney Seek To Bolster Support On Right. The New York Times (11/21, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Sen. John McCain "seemed to struggle yet again to firm up his position with the right on Sunday, as he faces the prospect of a primary fight with, among others, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts." McCain, appearing on "This Week" on ABC, "said he thought Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that established a constitutional right to abortion, should be overturned. But he sometimes strayed from the orthodoxy of social conservatism," presenting himself "as a supporter of the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy imposed by President Bill Clinton in 1993 to allow gay men and lesbians to serve in the military." While he "said he opposed same-sex marriage, he seemed to countenance civil unions." The Times adds, "And how did Mr. Romney spend his Sunday? He announced that he would ask his state's highest court to order a question banning same-sex marriage onto the ballot if legislators failed to do so."

Romney's Opposition To Gay Marriage Emerges As His Signature Issue. Fox News' Special Report (11/20, Hume) reports, "Massachusetts republican Governor Mitt Romney has let it be known he will make a decision next year about whether he will run for president in 2008. He appears to be developing his domestic platform with a strong position on gay marriage." Fox's Carl Cameron went on to report, "For Romney, a Mormon hoping to launch his presidential bid in January, undoing the Massachusetts Supreme Court's 2004 decision legalizing gay marriage is becoming a signature issue for 2008." Romney "wants voters to decide state policy with a ballot question defining marriage as between a man and woman. 10 days ago lawmakers refused to approve the referendum. Romney is suing. … Romney's rally" opposing the court's ruling "capped a weekend strategy meeting of more than 150 backers for his 2008 White House bid including an impressive array of the GOP's top operatives and fundraisers."

DOJ_NMG_0096581

The Financial Times (11/21, Knight) reports Gov. Romney "appears to be on the verge of confirming what many political observers have long speculated: he intends to seek the Republican party's presidential nomination in 2008." Romney "convened a meeting of his top advisers and leading supporters at the weekend to discuss the potential launch of his White House bid. According to an aide to his Commonwealth Political Action Committee, the gathering was 'to thank those who have been supporters' over the past year." An aide to the committee said that Romney "planned over the coming holidays to discuss a possible presidential run with his family and will 'make a decision one way or another after the first of the year.'" Romney "has recently added several influential political consultants to his roster."

Hunter Seen As Having Potential In GOP Presidential Primary. In a Washington Times op-ed (11/21), talk radio host Rick Amato says, "As the line of Republican candidates running for the White House in 2008 begins to form, there is one candidate making preparations to run whose name voters outside of San Diego and Washington will be hard-pressed to recognize, but that could change in time. I'm speaking of the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, California Rep. Duncan Hunter." Hunter "should not be overlooked. He is a social conservative in what is expected to shape up as a socially moderate Republican field. Historically, social conservatives have done very well with voters in early primary states such as Iowa and South Carolina." Hunter is "further to the right on social issues than either John McCain, Rudy Giuliani or Mitt Romney."

Doro Bush Koch Seen As Contrasting Bush 41 And 43. The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Wallsten, 850K) reports, "Dorothy Bush Koch is only now stepping into the spotlight with a new book about the first President Bush and about her family. And she has a few gently pointed words to say about life as the lone daughter in the country's most powerful political family. … One intriguing element of Koch's presentation Sunday" at the Miami Book Fair International," was what she implied but did not directly state about the contrasting images of the family's two presidents, one of whom is known as the consummate diplomat and the other who has labeled himself the 'war president.' Twice on Sunday, she noted that among the accomplishments she most admired about her father was his ability to manage the end of the Cold War 'without a shot being fired.'" The Times adds, "The title of Koch's book, 'My Father, My President: A Personal Account of the Life of George H. W. Bush,' suggests that Koch does have her favorite between the family's two presidents."

Hatch Aide Is New CEO Of Liquor Lobby. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (11/21, McCaslin) reports, "Craig Wolf, who served as counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee and specifically its chairman, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, has become the new president and CEO of the Wine & Spirits Wholesalers of America."

Thousands Protest Bush's Visit To Indonesia. NBC Nightly News (11/20, story 3, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported President Bush "is on his way back to the United States now at this hour after the last stop in his Asia trip. A short visit to Indonesia, the most populous Muslim nation in the world where thousands of angry protesters filled the streets to denounce him during the visit and the invasion of Iraq. … There was a brief flurry of excitement on the way to Vietnam. Air Force One was grounded with a tire problem. An alternative aircraft was mustered for the President's use. But just then, a spare tire was found at Ho Chi Minh airport in Vietnam." ABC World News (11/20, story 2, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) said Bush "shrugged off protests that greeted him in Indonesia as sign of a healthy democracy."

Fox News' Special Report (11/20, Hume) reported the Indonesian president "was clearly taking a risk domestically by welcoming…Bush. About a mile from the presidential retreat, thousands of anti-American protesters took to the streets, calling President Bush a terrorist, while thousands more protested the visit 30 miles north in Jakarta. In Indonesia the negative view of the U.S. can be traced to one thing -- the Iraq War. In 2002, 61% of Indonesians had a favorable view of the US One year later, after the war started, that percentage was 15%." Bush was shown saying, "It's to Indonesia's credit that it's a society where people are able to protest and say what they think. It's not the first time, by the way, where people have showed up and expressed their opinion about my policies, but that's what happens when you make hard decisions." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/20) said Indonesia is "seething over Bush's invasion's of Iraq and Afghanistan."

The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "About 2,000 protesters from Muslim, student, and labor groups showed up to protest U.S. policies in Iraq and Afghanistan, saying it was Bush who was spreading terror. In Surabaya, East Java, about 100 students were reported to have clashed with police at a McDonald's after staging a protest at the US Consulate. No arrests were reported."

The New York Times (11/21, Sanger, 1.16M) says Bush, "whose visit to Indonesia three years ago was consumed with talk of counterterrorism, this time appeared focused on fighting bird flu, bolstering a small program to aid Indonesian schools and promoting growth." Also, "in an afternoon of meetings at an ornate presidential palace that is a legacy of Dutch colonial rule, Mr. Bush held a closed-door session with what the White House called 'civic leaders' of Indonesia."

DOJ_NMG_0096582

The Financial Times (11/21, Aglionby) headlines its report "Bush Brushes Off Protests Over Middle East," while USA Today (11/21, Jackson, 2.27M) titles its story "Bush Calls Indonesian Protests A Good Thing." Bush is quoted saying, "Indonesia is an example of how democracy and modernization can present an alternative to extremism."

Bush Tells Indonesian Boy About His Childhood Hobbies. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (11/21, McCaslin) reports, "We couldn't help but be amused yesterday when President Bush, visiting a pair of faux Indonesian classrooms in Jakarta, was asked by a small boy what his hobbies had been when he was growing up. Observed the White House pool report: 'Bush didn't miss a beat: 'Baseball. I liked baseball. That was my hobby. Sports.' Then, perhaps realizing that sports was the wrong thing to push in a classroom, even a fake one, the president added: 'The best thing that I did was to learn how to read.' Continuing in that vein, the last thing we heard before being pushed out was Bush cautioning the kids that 'there are people who watch TV too much.'"

US Approves Most IAEA Aid For Iran Nuclear Sites. The AP (11/21, Jahn) reports Washington "said Monday it would accept Iran's request for U.N. aid on seven nuclear projects but urged the [IAEA] to deny assistance for a plutonium-producing reactor that can be used to make a bomb." Those decisions "reflected U.S. recognition that it was futile to try to block IAEA help to Iran on all eight projects because of opposition by most of the agency's 35-nation board. It also appeared prompted by an IAEA ruling that neither the reactor nor the other projects posed a proliferation threat." The AP says diplomats "suggested it could reflect a U.S. decision to tread relatively lightly while Washington weighs the possibility of direct dialogue with Iran on reducing violence in Iraq."

Israeli Intelligence Reports Progress On Iran's Nuclear Testing. The Jerusalem Post (11/21) reports, "Iran has developed and tested a trigger device for a nuclear bomb, Israeli agents stationed there have told the White House, according to a report published in The New Yorker Monday morning." According to the report, "the White House received the information but did not pass it on to the CIA," and "in the past six months, Israel and the United States had been working together to support a Kurdish resistance group known as the Party for Free Life in Kurdistan." The Israeli intelligence "presented a stark contrast to recent CIA estimates on Iran's nuclear program, which claimed that Teheran was far from attaining a nuclear bomb." The New Yorker article "seemed to suggest that there was a difference of opinion between the CIA, the White House and the Pentagon regarding the progress of Iran's nuclear weapons program." The White House "reportedly was refusing to reveal to the CIA the source of the Israeli information, the location of the site of the experiments, or the number of tests that had been carried out."

Gideon Rachman Blasts "Folly" Of Preventive War In Mideast. In his Financial Times (11/21) column, Gideon Rachman writes about thoughts of bombing Iran, "Military experts talk of the need for hundreds or thousands of bombing raids, stretched over many days – and even that might merely set back Iran's nuclear programme a few years. Iran would also certainly retaliate. It could unleash Shia militias on allied troops in Iraq, encourage Hizbollah and Hamas to stage new attacks on Israel and block the Strait of Hormuz, through which 40 per cent of the world's oil flows. ... If Iraq has taught America and its allies anything, it is that it is much easier to start a war in the Middle East than to finish one."

Israeli Military Chief Starts Investigation Of Cluster Bomb Use. The New York Times (11/21, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "The Israeli military chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, ordered an inquiry on Monday to determine whether the armed forces had followed his orders when it used large numbers of cluster bombs during the month long war with Hezbollah in Lebanon this summer." Many human rights groups "have criticized Israel's use of cluster bombs in the fighting, saying they were dropped in or near populated areas." The general "did not specify what orders he gave regarding cluster munitions, and it was not clear whether he prohibited them, or placed certain restrictions on their use." Israel "has received cluster munitions from the United States for many years," and also makes its own," and in August, the State Department "began investigating whether Israel used cluster bombs in Lebanon in violation of secret agreements that restrict their use." In "a separate development, an aide to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said the president's Fatah movement had suspended talks with the militant faction Hamas on a national unity government. "

Hariri Probe Said To Have Caused Rift In Lebanese Government. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) Michael Young, opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine, writes, "The Syrian regime is discovering what a nuisance Rafik Hariri, the late Lebanese prime minister, can be. Last Friday, the U.N. Security Council approved a draft plan for a mixed Lebanese-international court to try those responsible for Hariri's assassination on Feb. 14, 2005. Damascus, the main suspect in the crime, is palpably anxious. That anxiety played out in Lebanon 10 days ago, when six ministers named by pro-Syrian politicians resigned rather than take part in Beirut's formal endorsement of the tribunal proposal. … Five of the six ministers who resigned were appointed by or affiliated with the two main Shiite parties, Hezbollah and the Amal movement, while the sixth is Lebanese President Emile Lahoud's man. Their resignations came amid a struggle for power between pro-Syrian groups and the anti-Syrian parliamentary and cabinet majority -- dating back to the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah."

DOJ_NMG_0096583

Postwar Lebanon Cynical About Future. The Washington Post (11/21, A22, Shadid, 690K) reports that in Beirut, "Lebanon has emerged from the 33-day war with Israel only to find itself lately in one of the most pronounced political crises it has experienced in a generation." On Sunday, Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, said "the government now faced a choice: either resign in favor of what he called a national unity government or hold early parliamentary elections," an "if neither demand is met, he said, his followers have planned days, even weeks, of protests to topple a government he said was beholden to the United States." Still "reeling from this summer's war and mired in economic troubles," Beirut shows "little sign of enthusiasm" for demonstrations and revival.

Palestinian Unity Government Talks Suspended. In a lengthy piece, the AP (11/21, Daraghmeh) reports Hamas and Fatah "froze talks Monday on forming a Palestinian unity government, Fatah officials said, a new setback in efforts to form a more moderate coalition acceptable to the West. The deep differences raised questions about the ability of the sides to reach a deal that could end months of painful economic sanctions." The AP notes the "sudden announcement of [the] breakdown," saying the two parties "appeared to be heading toward formation of a Cabinet of independent experts to replace the Hamas-led body." However, it was not "clear whether the suspension was the sign of a real crisis or simply a negotiating tactic by Abbas' weakened Fatah Party." The AP adds, "Even if the sides reach agreement, it remains unclear whether the 'division of labor' formula, with the moderate Abbas handling diplomacy while Hamas sticks to its hard line, would be acceptable to the West." Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni "said Monday that Syria was the reason talks between the Palestinian factions have been troubled."

Israeli Maps Show Settlements In Land Owned By Palestinians. The New York Times (11/21, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports that yesterday in Jerusalem, "an Israeli advocacy group, using maps and figures leaked from inside the government, says that 39 percent of the land held by Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank is privately owned by Palestinians." The data "indicate that 40 percent of the land that Israel plans to keep in any future deal with the Palestinians is private," and the new claims regarding Palestinian property are said to "come from the 2004 database of the Civil Administration, which controls the civilian aspects of Israel's presence in the West Bank." Peace Now, an Israeli group that advocates Palestinian self-determination in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, "plans to publish the information on Tuesday." Miri Eisin, a spokesperson for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said that "Israeli officials would have to see the data and the maps and added that ownership is complicated and delicate."

Train Bombing In India Kill 8, Wound 60. The AP (11/21, Banerjee) reports, "A bomb exploded and tore through two cars of a passenger train Monday in a remote area of eastern India, killing at least eight people and wounding about 60 others, officials and Indian media said." The bomb "had been planted in one of train's cars and exploded about 6:20 p.m. near the Belacoba station, about 345 miles north of Calcutta." PTI, citing railway police official Tushar Bhattacharya, reported that "the death toll had climbed to eight with about 60 wounded." Prasad Ranjan Roy, Home Secretary of West Bengal state, said "initial suspicion pointed to either Maoist rebels or Assamese militants," and "he suggested the blast could be the work of the relatively small Kamtapur Liberation Organization, an Assamese group tied to the larger United Liberation Front of Asom." However, he "cautioned," and said, "We are trying to get details."

Natsios Says US Could Opt For "Plan B" To End Darfur Violence Next Year. The Washington Post (11/21, A24, Kessler, Boustany, 690K) reports President Bush's Darfur representative, Andrew Natsios, "said yesterday that the Bush administration will resort to an unspecified 'Plan B' if the Sudanese government does not agree by Jan. 1 to complete negotiations on an expanded international peacekeeping force for its troubled Darfur region." He "declined several times to explain what he meant by 'Plan B,' saying he was not trying to make a threat." The US and the UN recently "backtracked" on the concept of a UN-led force "and instead sought to win the government's agreement for a hybrid force of African Union and U.N. troops." Yesterday, Natsios "rejected Khartoum's claims that a U.N.-led international force would mean a return to colonialism."

AFP (11/21) says Natsios "warned Khartoum to meet a January 1 deadline for full acceptance of a UN plan to deploy international peacekeepers to Darfur or face tougher action." He also "said the Khartoum government had yet to give its approval for the timing, size and command structure of the peacekeeping operation." Natsios "refused to elaborate on what Plan B would entail if no response was forthcoming by January 1 beyond saying it's 'a different approach' to the negotiated deployment of peacekeepers."

DOJ_NMG_0096584

The AP (11/21, Montesquiou) notes the Sudanese government "hailed a new agreement with the United Nations over peacekeepers in Darfur as a diplomatic breakthrough for Sudan, but said serious differences remain over the force's makeup and command." Despite the announcement, "there were signs the government might still resist hopes for a robust U.N. deployment to bring an end to the continuing bloodshed." Khartoum's "comments could signal that Sudan will try to reduce the U.N. role in the peacekeeping force. But they could also be part of an effort by the government to save face, after abandoning its earlier position that U.N. troops were unacceptable."

NYTimes Suggests Taking More Action For Darfur, Chad Genocide. In the New York Times (11/21, 1.16M), columnist Nicholas Kristof writes that the spread of genocide into Chad was not or is not "inevitable." There was no response "partly because of reluctance from the White House and Pentagon, and partly because of resistance from France and other countries," so the "genocide in Darfur has steadily expanded." Kristof suggests writing to "embassies of countries like France and Egypt that could play especially crucial roles," and also to China, "which provides Sudan the guns." In the news industry, "including Arab and European television networks, could use a few pokes to appreciate that genocide is newsworthy." The "heroic efforts of aid groups in Darfur and Chad — 13 aid workers have been killed in Darfur since May — deserve support as well," and "they can use our backup."

LATimes Says Libyan Dictator's Statements Of Darfur Are "Absurd." The Los Angeles Times (11/21, 850K) editorializes that Libyan dictator Moammar Kadafi's statement that "Western countries and America are not busying themselves out of sympathy for the Sudanese people or for Africa but for oil and the return of colonialism to the African continent," is "absurd." Not only that, but the UN "already has 10,000 peacekeepers in southern Sudan sent in 2005 to stabilize a separate conflict there, and to date they haven't seized any Sudanese oilfields or founded any colonies," and it's "reckless." A "deal to finally end the atrocities in Darfur is teetering on a knife's edge," and before "an international force can be mobilized, there are still delicate political decisions to be made, such as whether it would be empowered to protect villagers or simply monitor the carnage." Resolving them will "require an unusual degree of unity among players as diverse as the Arab League and the UN Security Council."

Darfur Said To Highlight West's Inconsistency In Tackling "Totalitarianism." In her column in the Washington Post (11/21, 690K), Anne Applebaum says groups working to end the genocide in Darfur "have "made an impact. Indeed, it is fair to say that were it not for the Christian, Jewish, human rights, genocide-prevention groups and others that have been talking about Sudan with such dedication, the massacres of Darfur might not be on the international agenda at all." She says she "can offer no scientific explanation as to why the tragedy of Darfur conjures up the specter of history's judgment and why other tragedies do not." Applebaum posits that, "because it seems to be in no one's 'interest' to do so, a call for U.N. intervention in Darfur surely feels … like an act of real charity, and not more evidence of the West pursuing its interests." She continues, "Taking a stand against genocide in Sudan does not require anyone to take a parallel stand on communism, the war on terrorism or the war in Iraq." In short, "it is still possible to think of Darfur as an appropriate target for neutral humanitarianism." Applebaum says historians "will also judge us by the consistency with which Western and international institutions battled sophisticated totalitarianism in all its forms," and she concludes, "The creation of an international coalition to end genocide is a stunning achievement, but its goals are still not deep or broad enough."

Muslim Population Increases In Russia. The Washington Times (11/21, Mainville, 88K) reports, "Low domestic birthrates and rising immigration from the former Soviet republics are producing explosive growth in Russia's Muslim community, which is on a track to account for more than half the population by midcentury." Russia's overall population is "dropping at a rate of 700,000 people a year," but "Russia's Muslims, however, are bucking that trend." By 2015, Muslims "will make up a majority of Russia's conscript army and by 2020 one-fifth of the population." Four mosques in Moscow serve "a Muslim population of about 2.5 million," but "as in many countries with growing Islamic populations, tensions are also on the rise." "Most Muslims living in Russia are not immigrants, but natives of lands seized by the expanding Russian empire."

Muslim Women Gather In New York To Issue Fatwas. The Christian Science Monitor (11/21, Ben Arnoldy, 59K) reports that in a meeting in New York, "Muslim women from 25 countries began laying groundwork for the first international all-female council formed to issue fatwas," and their idea is "to ensure that women's perspectives on Islamic law become part of religious deliberation in the Muslim world - particularly on issues such as domestic violence, divorce, and inheritance." The New York gathering, "called the Women's Islamic Initiative in Spirituality and Equity, plans to seat the new council - perhaps seven members - within a year." The group "also plans to give scholarships for more women to pursue advanced training - open to women in places like Morocco, Egypt, and Iran - in an effort to broaden the qualified pool." Conference attendees say "a muftia council could prompt wider support for women's struggles" The meeting "used money from nongovernmental foundations, some based in the US."

DOJ_NMG_0096585

Losing Candidate Declares Himself President Of Mexico. The AP (11/21, Stevenson) reports, "Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador launched a parallel government Monday and prepared to swear himself in as Mexico's 'legitimate' president, a ceremony the leftist hopes will keep alive protests to undermine the man who officials say defeated him at the polls." The "inauguration ceremony is the latest chapter in Lopez Obrador's unsuccessful battle for the presidency. He claims fraud and dirty campaign tactics were responsible for President-elect Felipe Calderon's narrow victory in the July 2 vote, and his parallel government could spend the next six years calling for street protests that have already dented the economy and prompted travel warnings from the U.S. Embassy." The New York Times (11/21, McKinley, 1.16M) headlines its story "Yes, He Lost Mexico's Vote, So He's Swearing Himself In," and begins its story saying, "Don Quixote, move over." The Los Angeles Times (11/21, Tobar, 850K) runs a similar report.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (11/21, A16, 2.04M) says, "The next test of Mexico's rule of law will come December 1 when president-elect Felipe Calderón is supposed to be sworn in. Hard liners are already pledging to crash the event. Perhaps this time Mexico's elected leadership will draw a line in the sand."

Researchers Find Unconventional Transmissions Of AIDS In Africa. The New York Times (11/21, Rosenthal, 1.16M) reports, "As researchers spend more time studying Africa's overwhelming pediatric AIDS problem, they are finding that the routes of transmission may be different than in the industrialized countries, and that strategies for preventing the disease's spread must be adapted to local realities." Researchers have agreed that "a host of traditional ceremonies and practices are creating transmission routes unique to Africa — dangers that have, up to now, been ignored." There are naming ceremonies "that require nursing," and also "a host of potentially even more hazardous moments, such as when body fluids of different people are mixed." Researchers "are just beginning to study the role of these common traditional practices of rural Africa, to determine if they account for a small or large portion of H.I.V. transmission."

Commission Blames Nepali King For Bloody Violence On Demonstrators. The Washington Times/AP (11/21, Gurubacharya) reports, "A government commission investigating Nepal's bloody crackdown on pro-democracy demonstrators blamed the violence on King Gyanendra and recommended punishing him, officials said yesterday." The commission "also found 201 officials in the king's administration responsible for the bloody crackdown," including "the chiefs of police and the armed forces." After receiving the commission's report, Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala "vowed to punish those held culpable for the crackdown, in which hundreds were injured and hundreds detained, with some claiming torture." The commission "did not recommend a punishment, and Nepal has no laws addressing crimes committed by a king." A yet-to-be elected constituent assembly "is expected to decide the monarchy's fate," and Gyanendra "has already been stripped of his powers, command over the army and his immunity from prosecution."

NYTimes Says UN Human Rights Council Needs Improvement. The New York Times (11/21, 1.16M) editorializes, "The new Human Rights Council now seems headed for a failing midterm grade." For the "world's worst and most consistent human rights violators, like China, Iran, North Korea, Myanmar and Sudan, there has been a tendency to muffle words and conclusions and shift the focus," but the council seems to "change personality turning harshly critical and uninterested in broader contexts." The UN should be "more than a self-protective club of sovereign states."

WPost Suspects Putin Is Behind Poisoning. The Washington Post (11/21, 690K) editorializes, "There's no concrete evidence as yet that the FSB" or Russian President Vladimir Putin "is behind the poison attacks -- but there is plenty of reason for suspicion." The Post adds, "Does Mr. Bush regret having given so much support to a leader who has dismantled his country's nascent democracy and whose opponents keep turning up in hospitals and morgues?"

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Iraq Considers Three-Way Talks With Iran And Syria."
"Navajos' Desert Cleanup No More Than A Mirage."
"Pelosi-Harman Friction Strains Democrats' Unity."
"No Prison For Weller, No Closure For Others."
"King Of The College Cowboys."
"Simpson Book, TV Plan Dropped."
"Private Cash Fuels Boom In Takeovers."

USA Today:

"Examples."
"Small Mistakes Cause Big Problems."
"Many DNA Matches Aren't Acted On."
"Chemical Weapons' Disposal Delayed."
"Status Of Stockpiles."

DOJ_NMG_0096586

New York Times:
"Israeli Map Says West Bank Posts Sit On Arab Land."
"New York Court Cuts Aid Sought By City Schools."
"In New Orleans, Rust In The Wheels Of Justice."
"In Web World, Rich Now Envy The Superrich."
"Clinton Won Easily, But Bankroll Shows The Toll."
"Under Pressure, News Corp. Pulls Simpson Project."

Washington Post:
"Ramsey Ally Named Chief."
"Flaws Cited In Effort To Train Iraqi Forces."
"News Corp. Pulls Plug On O.J. Book, Fox Special."
"Spoofer O Iraq's Chaos Becomes A Victim."
"Polygamists Out Of The Closet."
"Passing The Class But Failing The Test."

Washington Times:
"Fenty Taps Ramsey Replacement."
"Muslim Birthrate Worries Russia."
"Rangel's Call For New Military Draft Rebuffed."
"Iraq, Iran And Syria Set 3-Way Talks."
"Holiday Travelers Brace For Onslaught."
"Partisan Agony, Ecstasy Reflected In Hill Mood Swings."
"Simpson Book, TV Special Canceled."

Detroit Free Press:
"Bo's Spirit Lives At Big House."
"Suspect In 2 Homicides Was Let Go In '98 Killings."
"Expert A Magic Ride, Warn Temps On Route."
"Fox Chase Case On Simpson Plans."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"DA To Re-Examine Police Shootings."
"OJ Book, TV Show Called Off After Furor."
"Delta Recalls 700 Mechanics."
"Few In Congress Served In Military."

Houston Chronicle:
"Striking Janitors Ok Deal."
"Continental Keeps Wary Eye On Merger Bids."
"The Last Stand."
"After 20 Years, local Cold Case Gets Warm."
Street-Racing Danger Flares Up In Fatal Crash."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Iraq Summit-Iran; Bush In Indonesia; Former Russian Spy Poisoned; FOX Cancels OJ's Project; Michael Richards Yells Racial Slurs; Dropping Out Of High School; Deadly School Bus Accident; Ending Drinking & Driving; Kidney Transplant Triangle.
CBS: Deadly School Bus Accident; School Buses & Safety Belts; FOX Cancels OJ's Project; Iraq Summit-Iran; New Iraq Strategy; Iraq's Future; Kidney Transplant Triangle; Michael Richards Yells Racial Slurs; Giving Back.
NBC: New Iraq Strategy; Iraq Summit-Iran; Bush Returns Home; Rangel's Call For The Draft; Former Russian Spy Poisoned; Stock Market; Chinese Steeling Defense Secrets; Deadly School Bus Accident; FOX Cancels OJ's Project; Ambassador Hotel; The Emergency Room Wait.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Syria And Iraq-Diplomatic Ties; Duncan Hunter-Troop Redeployment; Barack Obama-Troop Redeployment; Bush-Iraq Troop Levels; Six-Party Talks With North Korea; Michael Richards Apologizes For Racial Slurs; Highway Safety-Car Rankings.
NPR: Pelosi-No Plan To Pursue Draft Proposal; Duncan Hunter-Troop Redeployment; Bush-Hawaii; Bush-Iraq Troop Levels; Bush-Indonesia; Houston-Janitor Strike Ends; Annan-Biological Weapons; Barry Bonds' Personal Trainer Refuses To Testify; Jennings-Disputing Election Loss in Florida; FL NAACP-Silent Protest Of Governor-Elect.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends breakfast with troops, Officers Club, Honolulu; attends briefing at the US Pacific Command, Honolulu.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: HOMELAND SECURITY _ 9 a.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a briefing on homeland security and improving state, local and federal coordination, with Susan Reingold of the Office of the Director of National Intelligence. Location: 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

IRAQ-OFFICER _ 9 a.m. Telephone news conference with Lt. Ehren Watada, the first Army commissioned officer to refuse to go to Iraq. Contacts: Trevor Fitzgibbon, 202-246-5303. Notes: Callin number: 877-7079628; passcode: Iraq.

HOLIDAY SPENDING _ 10 a.m. The Consumer Federation of America and the Credit Union National Association release their annual consumer survey on holiday spending plans and concerns about debt levels. Location: National Press Club.

SAVINGS-PENSIONS _ 10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The joint Brookings Institution-Georgetown Public Policy Institute Retirement Security Project (RSP) host a panel discussion of economic analysts who will address the next steps for Congress. Participants will consider the impact of the new pension law, the mechanics of the Automatic 401(k), and discuss a new paper from RSP that estimates that these and related proposals that would increase net national savings by around $75 billion. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0096587

PORT-BORDER SECURITY _ 12 p.m. Equity International holds a briefing on border and port security. Location: National Press Club.

BIOFUEL-FARMERS _ 12:30 p.m. The Biotechnology Industry Organization holds a news conference to release a report outlining current and future feedstock supply challenges for the biofuel industry. Location: National Press Club.

LAZEAR-ECONOMIC FORECAST _ 1 p.m. CEA Chairman Ed Lazear will hold a conference call to discuss the Administration's economic forecast Notes: to participate, please call 866-207-9086. Chair is White House.

VEHICLES-FUEL EFFICIENCY _ 1:30 p.m. The Civil Society Institute holds a telephone news conference on a new poll showing that nearly all US consumers expect a sharp increase in gasoline prices in the near future and that, despite lower pump prices in recent months, there has been no slump in demand for hybrids and other fuel-efficient vehicles. Notes: To participate, dial 800-860-2442. Ask for ``The Washington Big 3 Survey'' news event.

MASSACHUSETTS V. EPA _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. The American Enterprise Institute Federalism Project hosts a panel disussion on the upcoming U.S. Supreme Court's hearing of an oral argument in Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). In this case, part of a broader campaign for the regulation of carbon dioxide, several states and environmental organizations have argued that the EPA must regulate CO2 under the Clean Air Act. Panelists: Joathan H. Adler, Case Western Reserve Law School; Lisa Heinzerling, Gorgetown University Law Center; Barry Rabe, University of Michigan; and Edward W. Warren, Kirkland & Ellis. Moderator: Michael S. Greve, AEI. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, AEI 1150 17th St. NW.

RUSSIA-WTO _ 3 p.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a seminar on Russia's accession to the WTP, with Assistant USTR Dorothy Swoskin, Nick Giordano of the National Pork Producers Council, Randi Levinas of the U.S.-Russia Business Council, others. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0096588

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, November 21, 2006 8:10 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, November 21, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061121.pdf; dojclips061121.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

AG Pushes Domestic Wiretapping (DENP) 5
Gonzales Pronounces Supermax Safe (RMN) 5
Supermax Still Not Super Secure (RMN) 6
Judge Rejects Request For NSA Documents (AP) 6
Human-rights Groups Back Dems' Detainee Law Overhaul (HILL) 7
Top-Secret Torture (WP) 8
Reno Files Challenge To Terror Law (AP) 9
Islamic Charity Tries Anew To Lose Label (AP) 10
No Transfer For Guantánamo Detainee (AP) 10
2nd Man Charged In Terrorism TV Case (NSDY/AP) 11
Prodi Removes Top Intelligence Chiefs (FT) 12
The Curse Of Rendition (FT) 12
Germany Detained Six In Terror Inquiry (NYT) 13

Homeland Response:

Military Documents Hold Tips On Antiwar Activities (NYT) 14
6 Imams Removed From Twin Cities Flight (AP) 15
Learn The Rules Before You Go (USAT) 16
Fliers Aren't Giving Thanks For Fickle TSA Rules, Screeners (USAT) 16
A Pointed Reminder For Security Screeners (WP) 17
Chemical Weapons' Disposal Delayed (USAT) 18

War News:

Bush Denies Decision On Altering Iraq Troop Levels (FT) 18
Bush Weighs Next Step On Troops In Iraq (AP-Y) 19
Pentagon May Suggest Short-Term Buildup Leading To Iraq Exit (WP) 20
U.S. Considers Large, Temporary Troop Increase In Iraq (NYT) 22
Bush Says No Decision Yet On Troop Levels In Iraq (WP) 23
In Indonesia, Bush Defends His Iraq Policy (MCT) 24
Bush Says He's Still Weighing New Moves In Iraq (WSJ) 25
Bush Pressured To Come Up With New Iraq Strategy (USAT) 26
Obama Urges Gradual Withdrawal From Iraq (CHIT) 27
Obama Urges Gradual Withdrawal From Iraq (AP-Y) 28
Obama Calls For Pullout In Iraq (LAT) 29
The Only Real Option: Leave Iraq Now (WP) 30
The Lingo Of Vietnam (WP) 31
The Story Behind The Iraq Study Group (WP) 32
Rising Price Of The War On Terror (CSM) 33
'War On Terror' Could Last 30 Years Or More (AFP) 34
Iraqi President Accepts Iran's Invitation For Weekend Talks (USAT/AP) 34
Syria And Iraq Restore Ties Severed In The Hussein Era (NYT) 35
Iraq To Restore Long-Severed Relations With Neighbor Syria (WP) 36
Iraq President To Hold Talks With Iran (FT) 38
Iraq Considers Three-way Talks With Iran And Syria (LAT) 38
Iraq, Iran And Syria Set For 3-way Talks (WT) 40
U.S. Should Lead Iraq Summit (LAT) 41
Next Move In Iraq? (USAT) 42
Syria Lends A Hand (WSJ) 43
Don't Trade Iran For Iraq (HILL) 44
An Iraqi Solution, Vietnam Style (NYT) 45
Flaws Cited In Effort To Train Iraqi Forces (WP) 46
Force Multiplier (WSJ) 48
Iraq Resumes Diplomatic Ties With Syria (AP-Y) 49
Spoofer Of Iraq's Chaos Becomes Another Victim (WP) 51
Banned Iraqi Television Station Illicitly Back On The Air (MCT) 52
British PM Visits Troops In Afghanistan (AP) 53
Troops Will Stay, Blair Pledges (WT/AP) 54
Taliban Drug Trade: Echoes Of Colombia (CSM) 55

DOJ:

GAO Reports Progress On Info Classification At Justice, FBI (FCW) 56

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutors Drop Lay Appeal (HC) 57
Head Of Cyberonics Resigns As Options Inquiry Expands (NYT) 57
Fortunate Ones (USAT) 58
Capital One Ex-CFO Resolves Charges (WP) 64
South Korean Prosecutors Indict Lone Star, KEB (WSJ) 65
SEC Filings Show New Chairman Got Options 3 Years Before Joining Board (USAT) 66
Sumner Redstone's Nephew Sues Over Management Of Family Trusts (WSJ) 67
Paulson Criticizes Regulation (USAT) 68
Paulson Urges Flexible Market Regulation (FT) 69
Paulson Says Business Is Over-Regulated (WP) 70
SEC To Undergo Further Scrutiny From Congress (WSJ) 71

Criminal Law:

Criminal Network To Catch Crooks In Cyberspace, FBI Goes Global (WSJ) 72
Gangsters Who Targeted Blacks Get Life (AP) 74
Government Backs Off Prison Restrictions (AP-Y) 75
G.O.P. Fund-Raiser Sentenced For Embezzlement In Ohio (NYT/AP) 75
Married Aleppo Man Held In W. Va. Death (PPG) 76
FBI Recovers Stolen Goya Painting (NSDY/AP) 77
A Phone Call Leads The F.B.I. To A Stolen Goya (NYT) 77
Goya Is Found After The FBI Is Tipped Off (NYS) 78
Oil's Well That Ends Well For Stolen Goya (NYDN) 79
Million-Dollar Painting Recovered (ABC) 80
Stolen Goya Painting Recovered (CNN) 80
Alleged Agent's Confession Allowed At Trial (MH) 80
Former Daley Aide Gets Almost 4 Years For Hiring Fraud (AP) 81
Former Patronage Chief Sentenced To 46 Months (CHIST) 82
Bus Union Official Faces New Charges (NYT) 83
FBI Busts Union's Boss On School Bus Shakedown Rap (NYDN) 84
Jeffs' Preaching Will Be Dissected Word By Word (SLT) 84
Jeffs Preliminary Hearing Today (DESERET) 85
Polygamists Fight To Be Seen As Part Of Mainstream Society (WP) 86
Motel Room Was Often Site Of Polygamist Rites (AP) 88
Many DNA Matches Aren't Acted On (USAT) 89
In New Orleans, Rust In The Wheels Of Justice (NYT) 92
A Good Chief Goes (WP) 94

Civil Law:

Lawyers Argue Validity Of '98 Online Law (AP-Y) 95
Closing Arguments In Internet-porn Trial (PHI) 96
Smokers Sue Tobacco Company For Lung Scans (LAW) 96
Billion-Dollar BofA Ruling Struck Down (LAW) 97
Court Rules On Internet Defamation Liability (LAT) 98
California Court Reverses Internet Liability Case (WSJ) 99

Civil Rights:

Dems To Target Political 'Robo Calls' (USAT) 99
Suburban Atlanta Police Ask DA's Office To Review Officer Shootings (AP) 100
Officer In Taser Case Identified (LAT) 101
Federal Judge Rejects Las Vegas Ban On Feeding Homeless In Parks (AP) 103
An Opening On Abortion? (WP) 103

Antitrust:

Muni Cloud Hovers Over Investors (WSJ) 104
Private Cash Fuels Boom In Takeovers (LAT) 105
Ready To Deal: $60 Billion In Two Days (WSJ) 107
Smaller Rival In Agreement To Acquire Copper Giant (NYT) 109
Mattel Says It Really Owns The Bratz That've Given Barbie Such A Bad Time (WSJ) 110
Cephalon Used Improper Tactics To Sell Drug, Probe Finds (WSJ) 111
LSE Shuns 'final' £2.7bn Nasdaq Bid (FT) 113
LSE Rebuffs Offer By Nasdaq Valuing Firm At $5.1 Billion (WSJ) 114
London Exchange Rejects Nasdaq's $5.1 Billion Offer (WP) 116
British Shun A New Offer By Nasdaq (NYT) 117
Curtain Rises On Final Act In LSE Drama (FT) 118

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Snowmobile Plan Proposed For Yellowstone (AP-Y) 119
Yellowstone Plans To Retain Current Snowmobile Limit (NYT) 119
Environmentalists Seek Marine Protection For Parts Of Northwest Atlantic (FINDLAW/AP) 120
Letters (WSJ) 120
Navajos' Desert Cleanup No More Than A Mirage (LAT) 124

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senators To FBI: Get A VCF Refund (GCN) 128
DrugNet, Chapter 3: The PowerPoint (PHI) 129
Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Pot Charges (AP) 134

DOJ_NMG_0096591

115 Charged In Prescription-drug Sweep (LCJ).....134
70 Seized In E. Kentucky Drug Sweep (LEXHL).....134
Drug Sweep Nets More Than 50, Including 2 Pharmacists (AP).....135
Bonds' Personal Trainer Back In Prison (AP).....135
27 Face Charges In Mississippi Drug-trade Ring (WT).....136
Agents Credited For Drug Busts (BSH).....136
Police Find One Completed IED, Components For More Explosive Devices (DLYSENT).....137

Immigration:

Arizona Growers Race Against The Clock To Find Winter Harvest Workers (USAT).....137

Tax:

IRS Links Increased Revenue To More Audits (WP/AP).....139

Congress-Administration:

GOP Leaving Spending Bills To Democrats (AP-Y).....139
Fiscal Battle Lines Drawn (HILL).....140
The Economic Front (WSJ).....142
Pelosi: Relieving Middle Class Tops List (AP-Y).....143
Democratic Leadership Spotlights Middle Class (WT).....143
Rebalancing Act Democrats Target Wealth Gap And Hope Not To Hit Economy Divide Between Rich And Poor Continues To Widen; Spurs 'Robin Hood' Plans Can Growth Benefit Workers? (WSJ).....144
Washington Wire (WSJ).....147
Pelosi-Harman Friction Strains Democrats' Unity (LAT).....148
Democrats Plan Series Of Votes On Ethics Reforms (WP)..151
Has Gates Learned His Lesson? (LAT).....152
Democratic Leaders Reject Idea Of Draft (WP).....154
Rangel's Call For New Military Draft Rebuffed (WT).....155
Rejecting The Draft (NYT).....155
Democrats' Rx? Generics (WSJ).....156
Intelligence Panel Staffer Reinstated (WP).....158
Same Old Party (NYT).....159
A Familiar Number (NYT).....160
Behind Democrats' Climb In Mountain West (USAT).....160
Traditionally Republican States Show They're Open To Democrats (MCT).....162
Is The South Truly A Dead Zone For Democrats? (NYT).....163
Dems' Senate Grip Will Rely On 3 New Hybrids (USAT).....165
Dems Return To Power With A Long Wish List (USAT).....166
Push To Add Real Estate Funds To Savings Plan Is Rebuffed (WP).....167
Textile Fiasco (WSJ).....168

Other News:

Leading Economic Indicators Inched Higher In October (WSJ).....169
Is The Worst Over For The Housing Bust? (WSJ).....170
Homes' Losing Streak To Continue (USAT).....171
Wall St Plays It Safe As Deals Surge (FT).....172
The Dow Slips In Rare Interruption Of Record Surge Of Past Six Weeks (WSJ).....173
Merger Monday (WSJ).....174
Flaws Seen In Markets For Utilities (NYT).....175
Citgo Brings Discounted Heating Oil To Region (WP).....177
Slain Journalist's Family Files $20 Million Lawsuit (WP).....178
Rosenbaum Family Files Suit Against City, Hospital (WT)...179
Reporter's Kin Sue City And Hospital (NYT).....180
Small Mistakes Cause Big Problems (USAT).....180
Winner Named For Florida Seat; Loser Files Suit (NYT).....181
Republican Declared Winner In Fla. House Race (WP/AP).181
Democrat's Challenge In Fla. 13 Focuses On Undervotes (CQ).....182
GOP Holds House Seat Of Katherine Harris (USAT).....183
Clinton Won Easily, But Bankroll Shows The Toll (NYT).....183
Women's Report Card For 2006 Vote (CSM).....185
Kansas Republican Eyes Presidential Bid (AP-Y).....187
Dueling Conservatives (NYT).....187
Romney Prepares To Run For President (FT).....187
Ahead To 2008 (WT).....188
Out Of The Bush Family Shadow (LAT).....189
Inside The Beltway (WT).....190
Bush Gets A Dose Of Democracy On Visit To Indonesia (LAT).....191
Bush Ends Trip At Careful Stop In Indonesia (NYT).....192
Bush Brushes Off Protests Over Middle East (FT).....194
Bush Calls Indonesian Protests A Good Thing (USAT).....194
U.S. Urges IAEA To Deny Iran Reactor Aid (AP).....195
Report: Israeli Spies Active In Iran (JERP).....196
Talk Of Another Middle East Preventive War Is Folly (FT)....197
Israel Orders Investigation Of Bomb Use In Lebanon (NYT) 198
Murder Update (WSJ).....199
Pessimism Deepens In Postwar Lebanon (WP).....201
Palestinian Unity Government Talks Stall (AP).....203
Israeli Map Says West Bank Posts Sit On Arab Land (NYT) .204
Bomb Kills 8, Injures 60 On India Train (AP).....206
U.S. Sets Jan. 1 Deadline For Sudan To Act On Darfur (WP)207
U.S. Threatens 'Plan B' If Sudan Ignores Deadline (AFP).....208
Sudan Hails New Peacekeeping Agreement (AP).....209
Boy's Wish: Kill Them All (NYT).....210

DOJ_NMG_0096592

Loose-cannon Kadafi (LAT).....211
Why Only Darfur? (WP).....212
Muslim Birthrate Worries Russia (WT) 213
A Bid To Bring The Female Voice To Islamic Law (CSM) ..214
Unelected Mexican Leftist Claims Office (AP).....215
Yes, He Lost Mexico's Vote, So He's Swearing Himself In (NYT) 216
Mexican Leftist Declares Himself 'President' (LAT) 217
AMLO's Antics (WSJ).....219
Traditional Ways Spread AIDS In Africa, Experts Say (NYT) 219
Nepali King Faulted In Dissident Crackdown (WT/AP) 221
A Discredit To The United Nations (NYT).....222
Political Poison (WP).....222

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0096593

TERRORISM NEWS:

AG Pushes Domestic Wiretapping (DENP)

By Felisa Cardona, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, November 21, 2006

The U.S. attorney general says the Democrats' victory won t deter the White House on the issue.

Speaking Monday to The Denver Post editorial board, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales discusses the need for warrantless eavesdropping to fight terrorism. "We've done a lot to make America safer, but it's not safe," he said. (Post / John Prieto)

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales reiterated his support for a domestic wiretapping program to fight terrorism during a visit Monday with The Denver Post editorial board.

"We've done a lot to make America safer, but it's not safe," Gonzales said when asked about the need for warrantless eavesdropping. "Fundamentally, the world is different today. My 14-year-old son will grow up in a different world than I grew up in. It's much more likely there will be a terrorist attack in this country. I never worried about a terrorist attack as a boy."

Gonzales said the Bush administration would not be deterred by the Democratic takeover in Congress but that he hoped new congressional leaders would be as willing to avoid a confrontation on national security as he is.

"I'm not going to prejudge," Gonzales said of the possibility of trying to convince the new Congress. "We are going to work as hard as we can to avoid the kind of crisis you referred to."

Gonzales said the Bush administration's anti-terrorism efforts since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks have improved intelligence gathering, especially between nations.

"The unsung story of this is our relationships with our foreign partners," Gonzales said. "The level of cooperation is outstanding, and it's made a big difference now that we are able to analyze plots. We have to be right 100 percent of the time; they (terrorists) only have to be right one time."

Gonzales also spoke about the issues with security at the Supermax prison in Florence and said he considered the problems "a priority."

He acknowledged that more staffing and security measures, such as increased monitoring of the perimeter of the prison, are necessary.

A recent report on prison security at Supermax showed that inmates were communicating with each other and with outsiders by telephone without those conversations being screened.

Gonzales said that in the past month, seven new employees, including guards, were hired to ease staffing concerns. He said part of the problems with security have to do with a lack of Arabic translators, an issue he says plagues all levels of government.

While the prison may not have Arabic translators on hand to monitor live inmate phone conversations, the calls are taped and reviewed later, Gonzales said.

"It's intolerable to have dangerous people in our prisons communicating with each other," he said.

Staff writer Felisa Cardona can be reached at 303-954-1219 or fcardona@denverpost.com.

Gonzales Pronounces Supermax Safe (RMN)

By Sara Burnett, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, November 21, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged today there have been problems at Supermax prison in Florence but said steps have been taken to improve security and make sure the community is safe.

DOJ_NMG_0096594

"I think it's a safe facility," Gonzales said during a meeting with the Rocky Mountain News editorial board. "Have mistakes been made? Have there been some problems there? No question about it, like there are at every facility. But we've taken steps to address them."

Gonzales said the Department of Justice has added 11 new employees at Supermax, and that seven more positions will be filled "as soon as we can." The 18 new employees would bring the facility to 208 — still short of the 240 employees it had when the prison opened in 2004.

Supermax, the nation's highest-security prison and home to inmates such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, also has addressed problems with inmate mail and phone calls not being monitored, Gonzales said.

He said a "large portion" of phone calls are being monitored as they occur, and others are recorded and later reviewed by translators. All mail is being viewed, he said.

In September, a Justice Department inspector general's report criticized the prison for not properly screening terrorists' mail and other communications. Gonzales today called that situation "intolerable" and said steps were taken to correct it.

"We spend a lot of taxpayer dollars in the investigation and prosecution of these kinds of dangerous criminals, and to have them locked up and to still present a danger to the American citizen is not right," he said.

Residents and local law enforcement also have expressed concern about the safety of the prison's perimeter, and about local police not being able to communicate via radio with prison guards.

Gonzales said he has asked the director of the U. S. Bureau of Prisons to look into those concerns as well.

Supermax Still Not Super Secure (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, November 21, 2006

Messages monitored, but not in real time

In a meeting with News editors and writers on Monday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales delivered both good news and bad news about the security of communications flowing to and from inmates at the Supermax lockup in Florence.

On the plus side, Gonzales said that every communication with prisoners, by mail or telephone, is now reviewed. Mail is read and telephone messages are either monitored on the spot or recorded and eventually translated.

That's a dramatic improvement. A report by the department's inspector general published earlier this fall found that less than half of inmate phone calls at Supermax were monitored, and during a test period a mere 1.8 percent of mail to and from the prisoners was checked by law enforcement officials.

The "eventually translated" part, however, is the bad news. While the AG asserted that the goal was to monitor all communications in "real time," it's not happening now. The Bureau of Prisons lacks enough translators to interpret messages as they come and go. Which means that instructions to terror networks or outside criminal enterprises could be flowing freely for days, weeks or months (more like months, as we'll explain below) before potentially lethal plans are derailed.

A shortage of Arabic-language translators with the proper security clearance has plagued every intelligence bureau, law enforcement agency and military service since 9/11. Gonzales said as much on Monday.

Even so, any time lags in translation are troubling. Supermax houses the most dangerous criminals in the custody of U.S. law enforcement. These inmates - among their ranks are several plotters of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and an alleged mastermind of jihadist terror attacks in Spain - pose a unique danger to the outside world. Translating and decoding the contacts these prisoners have with the outside world should have a special urgency.

Until recently, however, deciphering those messages was a low priority for the feds. The IG report said the FBI attempted to produce translations from intercepted letters within 60 days, which is already far too long. In actuality, it could take between six and 18 months to get a useful translation, the report added.

Given the wide latitude Congress has granted the administration to wage the war on terror, not to mention the expansive surveillance powers the White House has asserted on its own, such delays are indefensible.

In our conversation Monday, Gonzales agreed. But he still needs to push his department to finish the job of ending the security risk at SuperMax.

Judge Rejects Request For NSA Documents (AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The National Security Agency is not required to release details about its secret wiretapping program, a federal judge said Monday.

The People for the American Way Foundation, a liberal advocacy group, sued to obtain records under the Freedom of Information Act. The group sought to find out how many wiretaps were approved and who reviewed the program.

President Bush has acknowledged the existence of the program, which he calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program. The National Security Agency monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the U.S. and people in other countries when a link to terrorism is suspected.

Civil liberties group criticize it as an expansion of presidential power, and a federal judge has said it is unconstitutional. The Justice Department says it is a necessary tool to fight terrorism.

The NSA denied the request for documents, saying the records would jeopardize national security. The advocacy group argued that the law can't be used to protect the government from disclosing details about illegal programs.

U.S. Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle disagreed, saying that even if the program is ultimately determined to be illegal, it doesn't change the fact that the materials are classified and are not covered by the Freedom of Information Act.

Human-rights Groups Back Dems' Detainee Law Overhaul (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, November 21, 2006

Some human-rights groups are hoping that the Democrats' takeover of Congress will provide the necessary momentum to overhaul the controversial new legislation governing military tribunals.

One of the groups' main goals is to restore habeas corpus rights to military detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The writ of habeas corpus would allow the prisoners to have the legal basis of their detention reviewed in court to determine whether they should be released from custody.

"I expect that there will be a serious, bipartisan effort to try and correct some of the more confusing and flawed elements of the Military Commissions Act," said Tom Malinowski, the advocacy director of Human Rights Watch. "The most promising effort would be the one to restore habeas corpus rights to detainees, because it is such a fundamental right."

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), a 2008 presidential hopeful who come January will be the second-ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, introduced a bill that would amend existing law, including providing habeas corpus protections to military detainees.

Dodd is the first to take direct aim at the controversial tribunal bill, which President Bush signed into law in October.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said he too is in the process of drafting "major changes" to the legislation, including instituting habeas corpus rights for detainees.

Right after the Democrats take over the majority in early January, the Pentagon must report on the new procedures involved in the military commissions to the Senate and House Armed Services committees.

The Democrats may be able to corral enough bipartisan support to push for changes to the law, Malinowski predicted.

"Depending on how they frame [the legislation], they may be able to get some moderate Republicans [to support it]," he said.

One of those centrists is Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who introduced an amendment when Congress was considering the military tribunal bill in late September that would have reinstated habeas corpus rights. That amendment failed by three votes. Democrats could also enlist the help of Sens. John Sununu (R-N.H.) and Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who also support reinstating habeas corpus rights.

But Senate Democrats could have a tough time gathering enough support to stave off a White House veto. The Senate passed the military commissions bill by a vote of 65 to 34.

While changing the new law is important, that is not the only remedy, said Elisa Massimino, Washington, D.C. director of Human Rights First.

DOJ_NMG_0096596

"We need more oversight and there would need to be hearings held on who exactly is held at Guantanamo Bay," said Massimino.

Oversight hearings into the use of controversial, alternative interrogation techniques, such as those the CIA uses against high-value terrorist suspects, are also imperative, said Massimino.

The confirmation hearings of Robert Gates, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's replacement to head the Pentagon, likely will provide more clues about how Democrats will change laws governing the treatment of military detainees.

Republican presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) worked hard to pass the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, which prohibits cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment for all prisoners, despite opposition from the White House and many in his party.

Even before Democrats won the midterm election, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) had been asking for internal White House legal memos on the administration's interpretation of laws governing detainee treatment.

"Now he can really force these things," Massimino said of Levin, who will be the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee in January.

Malinowski said he is particularly interested in the Department of Justice memo that specifies what interrogation techniques, including those the CIA uses, are legal in the administration's view.

"They are going to fight tooth and nail not to give that out," he said.

Several House Democrats are following their Senate counterparts' lead and have started considering changes to the military tribunal legislation.

"It is being put together at the committee level right now," said Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), a veteran of the House Armed Services Committee, who will be a subcommittee chairman in January.

"I will support any legislative activity to throw that act out at best, and at a minimum reconfigure it to include habeas corpus and other aspects to conform to our constitutional imperative," Abercrombie told The Hill. "At the first legislative opportunity, the issue surrounding military commissions will be taken up."

The committee is considering passing legislation to expedite the judicial review of the new military tribunal law to determine its constitutionality. It's the same provision Dodd included in his bill overhauling the law.

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who will take over the armed services panel next year, said he thought the new law was "unconstitutional."

Meanwhile, Rep. Solomon Ortiz (D-Texas), the third-ranking Democrat on the panel, said he expects to have to deal with the military tribunal legislation one way or the other.

"I am pretty sure it is going to be challenged [in the courts]," he said.

But committee Democrats likely will have a tough opponent in Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), who as current chairman played a part in drafting the legislation and who will be the panel's ranking member next year.

"I think it is a solid act," Hunter said yesterday in an interview with reporters. "We should start prosecuting instead of second-guessing."

House Democrats may face larger hurdles than their Senate colleagues in trying to change the tribunal legislation. The House passed the Military Commissions Act by a vote of 253 to 168.

Top-Secret Torture (WP)

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The Bush administration claims detainees can't disclose how they were treated.

BURIED WITHIN a recent government brief in the case of Guantanamo Bay inmate Majid Khan is one of the more disturbing arguments the Bush administration has advanced in the legal struggles surrounding the war on terrorism. Mr. Khan was one of the al-Qaeda suspects who was detained in a secret prison of the CIA and subjected to "alternative" interrogation tactics -- the administration's chilling phrase for methods most people regard as torture. Now the government is arguing that by subjecting detainees to such treatment, the CIA gives them "top secret" classified information -- and the government can then take extraordinary measures to keep them quiet about it. If this argument carries the day, it will make virtually impossible any accountability for the administration's treatment of top al-Qaeda detainees. And it will also ensure that key parts of any military trials get litigated in secrecy.

Mr. Khan is one of 14 people transferred to Guantanamo earlier this year from the CIA's secret prison program. After his transfer, lawyers seeking to represent him asked for an order granting them access on the same terms as lawyers representing other detainees. The government objected on two main grounds. It contended that the court lacks jurisdiction because of two new laws that strip federal courts of authority over detainee matters. That may well be correct, and Judge Reggie B. Walton agreed last week that any consideration of counsel access should wait until the court of appeals rules on the jurisdictional question.

But the government also argues that Mr. Khan is different from previous Guantanamo inmates; their lawyers are cleared to see information classified at the "secret" level. The CIA program, however, involves top-secret information, so lawyers for Mr. Khan would have to be cleared at a higher level -- and access would have to take place under more restrictive circumstances.

The trouble is that at least some of the secrets the government is trying to protect are the very techniques used against people such as Mr. Khan -- and its means of protecting them is to muzzle him about what the CIA did to him. CIA official Marilyn A. Dorn said in an affidavit that Mr. Khan might reveal "the conditions of detention and specific alternative interrogation procedures." In other words, grossly mistreating a detainee now justifies keeping him quiet.

The problem with this argument is not just its Kafkaesque sheen. If the courts accept it, it would have vast practical implications. The integrity of any military trials of the high-value detainees will depend on their excluding evidence obtained by unduly coercive means. By the logic of the government's argument, however, all of that litigation will have to take place in secret. Detainees are also supposed to be able to appeal their status as enemy combatants to the federal appeals court here in Washington. The government's logic would all but assure that the bulk of any such appeal would be secret as well. So accepting this theory would mean that no claim of torture could be resolved in a transparent and accountable fashion. Given the importance of open trials for the high-value detainees, it's hard to imagine a principle that would more thwart the effort to bring them credibly to justice.

Reno Files Challenge To Terror Law (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, The Associated Press

AP, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials filed court papers Monday arguing that the Bush administration is setting a dangerous precedent by trying a suspected terrorist outside the court system.

It was the first time that Reno, attorney general in the Clinton administration, has spoken out against the administration's policies on terrorism detainees, underscoring how contentious the court fight over the nation's new military commissions law has become. Former attorneys general rarely file court papers challenging administration policy.

Suspected al-Qaida sleeper agent Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri is the only detainee being held in the United States.

The former prosecutors challenged the Justice Department's right to bring al-Marri before a military commission.

A citizen of Qatar, he was arrested in 2001 while studying in the United States. He had faced criminal charges until authorities designated him an enemy combatant and ordered him held at a naval base in South Carolina.

The Justice Department said in court papers last week that a new anti-terrorism law strips detainees such as al-Marri of the right to challenge their imprisonment in court.

"The government is essentially asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute those people criminally — perhaps because it would be too difficult to obtain a conviction, perhaps because a motion to suppress evidence would raise embarrassing facts about the government's conduct, or perhaps for other reasons," the former Justice Department officials said.

Some of the eight attorneys named in the document are now in private practice and represent detainees at the military base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Most served under President Clinton, though the list includes former U.S. Attorneys W. Thomas Dillard and Anton R. Valukas, who served under President Reagan.

DOJ_NMG_0096598

"The existing criminal justice system is more than up to the task of prosecuting and bringing to justice those who plan or attempt terrorist acts within the United States — without sacrificing any of the rights and protections that have been the hallmarks of the American legal system for more than 200 years," the attorneys wrote.

The al-Marri matter is before the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., and is one of three appeals court cases that will help determine the scope of the new military commissions law. That law allows the CIA to use tough — but undefined — interrogation techniques and says detainees may not use civilian courts to challenge their imprisonment.

Human rights groups have challenged the law. The former prosecutors wrote that they worried the government would increasingly use the law to avoid criminal trials "and the rights associated with them, such as the defendant's right to counsel and the government's obligation to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

The government was standing behind its position, Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said in a statement Monday night.

"These are complex and difficult legal issues, and while we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing in this case as both the magistrate judge and district court concluded," Blomquist said.

Last weekend, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales defended the nation's handling of the detainees. He said they are afforded more rights than required.

"What is extraordinary, in other words, is how much — not how little — our law protects enemy combatants," he said.

Islamic Charity Tries Anew To Lose Label (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Missouri-based Islamic charity accused of being part of an international terrorist organization tried to distance itself in federal court Monday from a Sudanese group suspected of financing al-Qaida.

The Treasury Department considers the Islamic American Relief Agency, of Columbia, Mo., to be an arm of the Islamic African Relief Agency, a Sudanese group accused of providing financial support to Osama bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas.

The FBI raided the charity's office in Missouri and the homes of people affiliated with the group nationwide. Since then, the 20-year-old charity has been unable to raise money.

Attorney Shereef Hadi Akeel told the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that the charity was not part of the Sudanese group. The organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts, he said.

If the two groups were the same, Akeel said, when the Missouri group wanted to move money into Sudan, it would have simply transferred it. Instead, he said the charity sought U.S. permission.

A federal judge rejected the group's lawsuit in 2005, finding enough evidence to support the Treasury Department's decision. The three-judge appeals panel seemed hesitant to reject that finding Monday, asking few questions and noting that it would need to see clear evidence to overturn the agency's decision.

The Justice Department pointed to the Missouri charity's own tax and corporate documents, which list the charity as a chapter or affiliate of the Sudanese group.

Akeel said that in the world of aid organizations, charities in the U. S. frequently partner with groups in impoverished areas.

The judges heard both public and classified testimony Monday and did not rule on the case.

No Transfer For Guantánamo Detainee (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - The U.S. military is not required to send a Guantánamo Bay detainee to a civilian hospital for medical treatment, a federal judge said Monday, leaving the prisoner to choose between having a heart procedure performed at the military base or not at all.

DOJ_NMG_0096599

Saifullah A. Paracha, a 59-year-old multimillionaire Pakistani businessman and television producer, argued that the procedure was too risky to be handled anywhere but in a cardiac unit. He asked to be transferred to a hospital in the United States or Pakistan.

The procedure, called cardiac catheterization, is used to detect heart problems such as blockages. A doctor inserts a plastic tube into a vein and slides it into the heart or nearby coronary arteries to measure blood pressure or oxygen levels.

If something goes wrong, Paracha's attorney said, doctors could need to perform emergency heart surgery.

Doctors successfully completed an identical procedure at Guantánamo Bay in 2003, the Justice Department said. Special medical equipment and personnel were available, attorneys said, making transferring Paracha an unnecessary security risk.

JUDGE AGREES

U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman agreed, saying the government regularly decides how best to treat civilian prisoners inside the United States and judges rarely intervene.

Paracha twice met with Osama bin Laden, but his attorney said it was in hopes of landing a television interview. Paracha, who lived in the United States for 16 years, denies making investments for al Qaeda, translating statements for bin Laden, joining in explosives-smuggling or recommending that nuclear weapons be used against U.S. soldiers.

Doctors will not perform the procedure without Paracha's consent. Attorney Gaillard Hunt said Paracha, who has a history of heart problems, may decide not to be treated if the procedure is done at the base.

"That's true of any prisoner anywhere," Friedman replied. ``There are lots of people who aren't detainees anywhere who choose not to have procedures done that their doctors believe should be done. If that's his choice, that's his choice."

Friedman said he was troubled by Hunt's claims that military officials shackled Paracha's hands and feet to his hospital bed during previous medical tests and did not release him even to eat.

ATTORNEYS' WARNING

In legal documents, Paracha's attorneys said there would be diplomatic consequences in Pakistan if he died.

"His death in U.S. captivity would be a blow to American prestige in that area, even under the best of circumstances," attorneys wrote. ``If anything happened to him while he was being treated in an irregular or inadequate facility, the reaction would be unpredictable."

Paracha's attorneys can appeal Friedman's ruling.

In July, his son, Uzair Paracha, was convicted of agreeing to help an al Qaeda operative with terrorist designs sneak into the United States. A U.S. District Court judge in New York sentenced the son to 30 years in federal prison.

2nd Man Charged In Terrorism TV Case (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK -- A man was charged Monday with supporting terrorists by enabling customers to obtain satellite broadcasts of a Hezbollah television station, the second person accused in a case that has drawn scrutiny over how far the government can go in claiming someone is aiding terrorist groups.

Saleh Elahwal, 53, of Matawan, N.J., and Javed Iqbal, 42, of Staten Island, could each face up to 110 years in prison if they are convicted of all 11 counts in a rewritten indictment unsealed Monday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. They pleaded not guilty.

Lawyers for both declined to comment outside court. Prosecutors said weeks ago they planned to bring additional charges as they as they collect evidence and build a case.

Iqbal, a Pakistani businessman, was charged in August with helping his customers receive broadcasts of al Manar, which was designated by the U.S. government this year as a global terrorist entity. At the time, the charges against him carried a potential prison term of five years.

Al Manar, launched in 1991, features news programming that promotes Hezbollah's positions and shows statements from the terror group and speeches from its leader, the government has said.

DOJ_NMG_0096600

As part of their probe, FBI agents searched two storefronts in Brooklyn where Iqbal worked and at his residence, where multiple satellite dishes helped him distribute the broadcasts to New York-area customers through a Brooklyn company called HDTV Limited, prosecutors said.

The indictment accused the men of carrying out the scheme from September 2005 through August.

Iqbal's representatives criticized the government's case after his August arrest, saying his First Amendment rights were violated.

Prodi Removes Top Intelligence Chiefs (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

Three top intelligence officials were removed on Monday in the most abrupt shake-up of Italy's espionage community since the current structures were established almost 30 years ago.

The government of Romano Prodi removed the chief of the national military intelligence agency, whom prosecutors want to put on trial for involvement in the suspected kidnapping by CIA agents of an Egyptian imam in February 2003.

It also replaced the head of the domestic secret service and the chief of an intelligence co-ordinating committee that reports to the political authorities.

The shake-up signalled the determination of the centre-left prime minister to assert his authority in this most delicate of policy arenas.

Pino Sgobio, a communist parliamentarian and member of Mr Prodi's ruling coalition, said he hoped that the new intelligence chiefs would work in a transparent manner "after the recent dark years of their predecessors".

The most damaging affair concerns Nicolò Pollari, the head of Sismi, the military intelligence service. Prosecutors plan to ask a judge to try him on charges of involvement in the abduction of Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr in Milan almost four years ago.

The prosecutors allege that the imam, a terror suspect also known as Abu Omar, was kidnapped by a team of CIA agents and sent to Egypt for interrogation under the US administration's programme of "extraordinary rendition".

The prosecutors suspect Mr Pollari co-operated in the CIA operation, of which they say they have extensive proof in the form of transcripts of intercepted telephone calls, photographs and other material.

Mr Pollari denies the allegation and told a parliamentary committee in August he had not authorised any action contrary to Italian law.

At the time of the imam's abduction, Mr Pollari reported to the centre-right government of Silvio Berlusconi, Mr Prodi's predecessor, who was a fervent supporter of the US "war on terror".

Some intelligence experts say it is doubtful that the CIA did not seek at least tacit approval from Mr Berlusconi's government for the operation, but the former premier and his political allies deny prior knowledge of the kidnapping.

In a sign that Mr Prodi wants to keep a close eye on an affair that goes to the heart of US-Italian relations, his office said Mr Pollari had not been sacked but had been assigned an undisclosed "important special post" reporting directly to the premier.

Mr Pollari, 63, was replaced as head of Sismi by Bruno Branciforte, 59, a naval intelligence expert. At Sisde, the domestic secret service, Mario Mori, 67, was replaced by Franco Gabrielli, 46, who is highly regarded for having recently dismantled a Red Brigades terrorist cell.

Since the creation of Italy's democratic political system in the late 1940s, the intelligence services have played a prominent and often bitterly criticised role in battling home-grown terrorism, of the extreme-left and extreme-right varieties.

Various acts of far-right terrorism that took place from the late 1960s to the 1980s were attributed to rogue elements in the secret services, and judicial inquiries into these events were sometimes obstructed by the agencies.

The Curse Of Rendition (FT)

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

The decision yesterday by the government of Romano Prodi, the Italian prime minister, to sack his country's head of military intelligence and two other spy chiefs is yet another reminder of how leading European countries have colluded in the shameful and destructive practice of "rendition" - a programme run by the US Central Intelligence Agency to kidnap and transport beyond the reach of the law suspects in the "war on terror".

DOJ_NMG_0096601

Prosecutors suspect Nicolò Pollari, head of Italy's Sismi agency, of involvement in the CIA's abduction in Milan of Osama Hassan Mustafa Nasr in February 2003. The radical Egyptian cleric was then flown to Cairo where he claims - credibly, given Egypt's human rights record - to have been tortured.

While there may well be other motives behind Rome's move - allegations that an associate of Mr Pollari attempted to smear Mr Prodi, fears for the safety of Italian troops in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon and a wish to embarrass Silvio Berlusconi, the previous Italian prime minister, are all adduced as possible reasons - this looks like a rare attempt to hold someone to account for "rendition".

The word itself - which ranks with euphemisms such as "friendly fire" or "collateral damage" - is perversely misleading. Behind its bogus legalism lies a practice of lawlessness, captured in chilling detail in a Council of Europe report last June, implicating more than a dozen European countries.

These countries, among them Britain, Germany, Spain, Poland, Sweden and Turkey, stand accused of complicity in kidnapping and the outsourcing of torture to friendly despots, at a network of secret sites for "ghost prisoners" denied legal process.

The unusual detail of the Council of Europe report and newspaper accounts provoked a storm of bluster and obfuscation, masking panic at the leakiness of the intelligence services that provided most of the information and a determination to shoot the messenger rather than heed the message.

The message could not be clearer. It is a capitulation by liberal societies to their enemies, a surrender of the rule of law to jihadi totalitarianism, to sink into such practices - whatever semantic evasions are used to describe them. As the Financial Times has persistently argued: we should not need to make the case against torture. It is morally depraved. It corrodes the society that condones it. It elicits largely worthless information. Full stop.

It is hard to exaggerate the extent to which policies such as "rendition" and the abuses practised at Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo have handed propaganda triumphs to the jihadis - harder still to undo the damage to US and western reputations. A start might be made if those high up the chain of command - such as Donald Rumsfeld, the now defenestrated US defence secretary - were called to account for their actions. Italy may have started this process.

Germany Detained Six In Terror Inquiry (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

FRANKFURT, Nov. 20 — German authorities, investigating an alleged plot to hide an explosive device aboard a passenger jet here last summer, detained six men on Friday on suspicion of belonging to a terrorist group.

All but one of the men was released the following day, the federal prosecutor in Karlsruhe said on Monday.

But German authorities said they are investigating additional people whom they believe sought to bribe an employee at Frankfurt Airport to place a bomb aboard the plane in luggage.

The plot was in its very early stages, the prosecutor said, and it may have foundered because of a dispute over how much to pay the airport employee. He was operating inside the security zone at the airport, which is Europe's third busiest after Heathrow, serving London, and Charles de Gaulle, serving Paris.

A spokesman for the prosecutor did not disclose the identity or nationalities of the suspects. German news organizations, citing unnamed police officials, reported that the men were from the Middle East, possibly from Jordan. The newspaper, Die Welt, said on its Web site that the target was the Israeli state airline El Al.

Police also raided several houses and apartments on Friday in several towns in west central Germany. The man who remains in custody is being questioned on a separate matter, the prosecutor said.

Germany has been on edge about a terrorist attack since August, when two bombs in suitcases were placed on trains near Cologne but failed to detonate. Police arrested a Lebanese student in Germany, who told them he was angry about cartoons in Danish papers that lampooned the Prophet Mohammed.

DOJ_NMG_0096602

Security at European airports has come under heightened scrutiny since August, when police in Britain foiled a plot to carry explosives in liquid form on to airliners bound for the United States.

Last month, citing security risks, French authorities stripped access badges from 72 Muslim workers at Charles de Gaulle Airport north of Paris, because the workers had either traveled to Pakistan or Afghanistan, or were suspected of having ties to extremist Islamic groups.

Robert A. Payne, a spokesman for Fraport, which operates the Frankfurt airport, declined to comment.

A German expert on terrorism, Rolf Tophoven, said the report of the alleged Frankfurt plot was alarming because it suggested that terrorists were seeking ways around the tight security checks that are now common at major airports.

"This is a new tactical development, because they tried to infiltrate the security infrastructure by hiring a person who had access to the airfield and aircraft," Mr. Tophoven said. "You can protect an airfield with electronic fences and X-rays, but you can't protect against human weakness."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Military Documents Hold Tips On Antiwar Activities (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — An antiterrorist database used by the Defense Department in an effort to prevent attacks against military installations included intelligence tips about antiwar planning meetings held at churches, libraries, college campuses and other locations, newly disclosed documents show.

One tip in the database in February 2005, for instance, noted that "a church service for peace" would be held in the New York City area the next month. Another entry noted that antiwar protesters would be holding "nonviolence training" sessions at unidentified churches in Brooklyn and Manhattan.

The Defense Department tightened its procedures earlier this year to ensure that only material related to actual terrorist threats — and not peaceable First Amendment activity — was included in the database.

The head of the office that runs the military database, which is known as Talon, said Monday that material on antiwar protests should not have been collected in the first place.

"I don't want it, we shouldn't have had it, not interested in it," said Daniel J. Baur, the acting director of the counterintelligence field activity unit, which runs the Talon program at the Defense Department. "I don't want to deal with it."

Mr. Baur said that those operating the database had misinterpreted their mandate and that what was intended as an antiterrorist database became, in some respects, a catch-all for leads on possible disruptions and threats against military installations in the United States, including protests against the military presence in Iraq.

"I don't think the policy was as clear as it could have been," he said. Once the problem was discovered, he said, "we fixed it," and more than 180 entries in the database related to war protests were deleted from the system last year. Out of 13,000 entries in the database, many of them uncorroborated leads on possible terrorist threats, several thousand others were also purged because he said they had "no continuing relevance."

Amid public controversy over the database, leads from so-called neighborhood watch programs and other tips about possible threats are down significantly this year, Mr. Baur said. While the system had been tightened, he said he was concerned that the public scrutiny had created "a huge chilling effect" that could lead the military to miss legitimate terrorist threats.

Mr. Baur was responding to the latest batch of documents produced by the military under a Freedom of Information Act request brought by the American Civil Liberties Union and other groups. The A.C.L.U. planned to release the documents publicly on Tuesday, and officials with the group said they would push for Democrats, newly empowered in Congress, to hold formal hearings about the Talon database.

Ben Wizner, a lawyer for the A.C.L.U. in New York, said the new documents suggested that the military's efforts to glean intelligence on protesters went beyond what was previously known. If intelligence officials "are going to be doing investigations or monitoring in a place where people gather to worship or to study, they should have a pretty clear indication that a crime has occurred," Mr. Wizner added.

DOJ_NMG_0096603

The leader of one antiwar group mentioned repeatedly in the latest military documents provided to the A.C.L.U. said he was skeptical that the military had ended its collection of material on war protests.

"I don't believe it," said the leader, Michael T. McPhearson, a former Army captain who is the executive director of Veterans for Peace, a group in St. Louis.

Mr. McPhearson said he found the references to his group in the Talon database disappointing but not altogether surprising, and he said the group continued to use public settings and the Internet to plan its protests.

"We don't have anything to hide," he said. "We're not doing anything illegal."

The latest Talon documents showed that the military used a variety of sources to collect intelligence leads on antiwar protests, including an agent in the Department of Homeland Security, Google searches on the Internet and e-mail messages forwarded by apparent informants with ties to protest groups.

In most cases, entries in the Talon database acknowledged that there was no specific evidence indicating the possibility of terrorism or disruptions at the antiwar events, but they warned of the potential for violence.

One entry on Mr. McPhearson's group from April 2005, for instance, described a protest at New Mexico State University in Las Cruces at which members handed out antimilitary literature and set up hundreds of white crosses to symbolize soldiers killed in Iraq.

"Veterans for Peace is a peaceful organization," the entry said, but added there was potential that future protests "could become violent."

6 Imams Removed From Twin Cities Flight (AP)

By Steve Karnowski, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, November 21, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS -- Six Muslim imams were removed from a US Airways flight at Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport on Monday and questioned by police for several hours before being released, a leader of the group said.

The six were among passengers who boarded Flight 300, bound for Phoenix, around 6:30 p.m., airport spokesman Pat Hogan said.

A passenger initially raised concerns about the group through a note passed to a flight attendant, according to Andrea Rader, a spokeswoman for US Airways. She said police were called after the captain and airport security workers asked the men to leave the plane and the men refused.

"They took us off the plane, humiliated us in a very disrespectful way," said Omar Shahin, of Phoenix.

The six Muslim scholars were returning from a conference in Minneapolis of the North American Imams Federation, said Shahin, president of the group. Five of them were from the Phoenix-Tempe area, while one was from Bakersfield, Calif., he said.

Three of them stood and said their normal evening prayers together on the plane, as 1.7 billion Muslims around the world do every day, Shahin said. He attributed any concerns by passengers or crew to ignorance about Islam.

"I never felt bad in my life like that," he said. "I never. Six imams. Six leaders in this country. Six scholars in handcuffs. It's terrible."

Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Washington-based Council on American-Islamic Relations, expressed anger at the detentions.

"CAIR will be filing a complaint with relevant authorities in the morning over the treatment of the imams to determine whether the incident was caused by anti-Muslim hysteria by the passengers and/or the airline crew," Hooper said. "Because, unfortunately, this is a growing problem of singling out Muslims or people perceived to be Muslims at airports, and it's one that we've been addressing for some time."

Hooper said the meeting drew about 150 imams from all over the country, and that those attending included U.S. Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, D-Minneapolis, who just became the first Muslim elected to Congress. Shahin said they went as far as notifying police and the FBI about their meeting in advance.

DOJ_NMG_0096604

Shahin expressed frustration that - despite extensive efforts by him and other Muslim leaders since even before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks - so many Americans know so little about Islam.

"If up to now they don't know about prayers, this is a real problem," he said.

Reached by cell phone just after his release, Shahin said he didn't know where they would spend the night or how they would try to get back to Phoenix on Tuesday. Hooper said US Airways refused to put the men on another flight.

Hogan said more information would likely be released Tuesday.

The other passengers on the flight, which was carrying 141 passengers and five crew members, were re-screened for boarding, Rader said. The plane took off about three hours after the men were removed from the flight.

Learn The Rules Before You Go (USAT)

By Kip Hawley

USA Today, November 21, 2006

At the Transportation Security Administration, our primary mission is to ensure the security of air travel. We use many layers to accomplish this, the most visible layers occurring when passengers go through the security line. TSA and our partners in law enforcement, airlines and airports handle the security work, but we also depend on travelers to be active participants by being prepared when they arrive at the airport.

Passengers can have a huge impact in making the process go smoothly and quickly for everyone. Take a minute to learn the rules before going to the airport (www.TSA.gov). The new liquid rules are simple: Put them in a checked bag, or put travel-size items in a baggie and put that in a bin at the checkpoint. 3-1-1 is the rule: containers 3 ounces or less, in a 1-quart zip-top bag, one per passenger.

This process is based on serious science and security reasoning. It assures that a completed bomb is not brought through. Liquids (and everything else) sold after the checkpoint have a separate security system that allows them to be brought on planes safely.

Please respect the job our security officers are doing on your behalf. They use their training and experience to sort out threats among the busy flow of travelers. It is a demanding job and requires intense focus while working pleasantly with the public. The checkpoint is not the place to debate the merits of various security measures.

The discretion carried out by our 43,000 Transportation Security Officers may mean that passengers might occasionally encounter slightly varying decisions at security checkpoints. Our goal is common sense security. To avoid absurd situations resulting from a mechanical enforcement of the rules, TSA entrusts its security officers to make decisions based on their training and judgment.

TSA and travelers partner every day to make the security process efficient. During the holiday period, we ask for a little extra preparation and patience as our security officers focus their efforts on protecting you.

Kip Hawley is the administrator of the Transportation Security Administration.

Fliers Aren't Giving Thanks For Fickle TSA Rules, Screeners (USAT)

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Thousands of infrequent fliers will take to the skies this Thanksgiving week, giving the government's latest rules for what can be carried on board an unparalleled stress test. A word of warning: Be prepared.

Since a plot to bomb jetliners with liquid explosives was broken up in London last August, flying has proved a little less convenient and a lot more confusing.

Initially, liquids and gels in carry-ons were banned. With passengers carrying less, they got through inspections and boarding quicker, but plenty complained about being left without toothpaste, cosmetics and such.

So in September, the Transportation Security Administration relaxed the rules, allowing fliers to carry on 3-ounce containers of toiletries, liquids and cosmetics in a 1-quart plastic bag. That made travel more convenient but also more confusing. The rules are so complicated that they aren't applied consistently.

Some curious results have followed.

DOJ_NMG_0096605

Last Wednesday, according to dotcom executive Sandra Jerez, screeners at New York's LaGuardia Airport confiscated two 3-ounce bottles of breast milk she wanted to carry on board. She had pumped the milk while on a business trip to take home to her 5-month-old son.

The New York screeners were wrong. As long as the milk was in the right size bottles, it should have been allowed.

Also wrong was the advice Jerez received earlier in the day from screeners at Washington's Reagan National. They said the answer would depend on the screeners' discretion.

"The rules should be the rules," Jerez said. "Shouldn't they?"

Absolutely. Fliers can live with restrictions, but only if they can understand what the restrictions are.

Also this month, computer instructor Gene Henriksen was told that he couldn't carry on 2-ounce unmarked bottles of toiletries at airports in Newport News, Va., and Atlanta because the bottles weren't labeled. That's incorrect.

When Henriksen called the TSA's helpline, he was told it was "up to the local agent."

Wrong, again.

While TSA screeners must make judgment calls — and fliers must comply — screeners should be reading from the same playbook, and that playbook needs to be simple enough that it's easily understood.

It isn't. It's also a moving target. Earlier this month, when the European Union issued carry-on rules quite similar — but not identical — to U.S. rules, several airlines published the "updated" rules on their websites, saying passengers could bring 100 milliliters or 3.4 ounces of liquids on board. According to a Northwest Airlines spokesman, the airline was simply following up on a TSA security directive.

The slight change muddied the issue for no good reason. Screeners are eyeballing the containers, not measuring them; 100 milliliters is merely a common size in Europe.

The TSA is now asking airlines to simplify their message, using 3 ounces. Good move. But whether everyone is ready for the busiest travel weekend of the year is very much in doubt.

Passengers and screeners alike will have to give a little. That bottle of mouthwash isn't really worth arguing about, is it? Given the hassle, is it even worth carrying on board?

More than anything, flying this week requires 3 ounces (or 100 milliliters, if you like) of common sense.

A Pointed Reminder For Security Screeners (WP)

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Feel frustrated when a jangling bracelet or pocket full of coins sets off security screeners as you make your way into a government building? Consider the Sikhs, whose religion requires them to always wear a dagger.

The centuries-old requirement has collided with beefed-up, post-Sept. 11 rules that no longer allow people to leave legal weapons and other banned items with security guards working in such buildings as courthouses and federal offices. In two dozen cases in the past two years, Sikhs have been arrested, threatened with arrest or harassed in disputes with guards over the ceremonial kirpan, according to the Sikh American Legal Defense and Education Fund.

In an effort to bridge the culture-security gap, the Homeland Security Department and the Sikh legal group yesterday unveiled a poster meant to help screeners through these interactions. The poster, which will be distributed to federal facilities across the country, shows photos of different kirpans, ranging from a symbolic necklace some women wear to the more common three- to six-inch daggers, as well as full-on swords. Sikhs often wear them under their clothing, bound to them by a cloth body holster.

The kirpan, one of five items baptized Sikhs are required to wear, is meant as a reminder of the duty to uphold justice. The others are reminders of other things: the kesh, or Sikhs' uncut hair, to live as God created you; kanga, a wooden comb, to remain neat; kara, a bracelet, to do good deeds; and kachera, or large underwear, to remain chaste and faithful sexually.

"These articles are a constant reminder to me of what my duties are," said Manjit Singh, co-founder and chairman of the legal fund.

DOJ_NMG_0096606

Although Sikhs still can't take the wooden- or steel-handled knives -- which sometimes have blunted tips -- into government buildings, the poster tells security workers how to navigate the situation.

"Respectfully ask if a Sikh is carrying a kirpan. If so, request to inspect the kirpan," the poster reads. "If a kirpan must be confiscated, explain the reason(s) why and handle the kirpan with respect and care."

Sikhs are accustomed to packing their kirpan in their luggage when they fly. They also went through a similar education campaign after Sept. 11 about the turbans Sikh men are required to wear. Turbans are often made of 20 feet of fabric, and taking them off and putting them on are elaborate processes.

"For Sikh Americans, this is a huge and significant accomplishment," Singh said of the poster, which tells screeners to "show respect to all variations of faith."

Chemical Weapons' Disposal Delayed (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has extended its timeline to destroy its aging chemical weapons arsenal until 2023, despite concerns by Congress and watchdog groups that the stockpiles raise the risk of an accident or theft by terrorists.

The new schedule, outlined in Pentagon documents obtained by USA TODAY, means the military won't eliminate its stocks of deadly nerve gases and skin-blistering agents until 11 years after the 2012 deadline set by the international Chemical Weapons Convention. The U.S. government had already asked for a five-year extension from an earlier 2007 deadline.

Communities near the seven sites where weapons are stockpiled have long complained about the delays. Congress echoed those concerns this year, when it called eliminating the stockpiles “a homeland security imperative” and directed the Pentagon in a defense bill to “make every effort” to destroy them by the convention deadline or “soon thereafter.”

Pentagon spokesman Chris Isleib said the delay is the result of several factors, including technological challenges in developing and building disposal plants, regulatory delays, and safety and security issues. Even so, he said the military remains committed to the job and that the war in Iraq has not drained money from the effort.

“Destroying these weapons safely is not a fast or simple process,” Isleib said.

Disposal facilities, mostly incinerators, are operating at five sites. The new Pentagon plan, however, would slow construction and operating schedules for two remaining plants near Pueblo, Colo., and Richmond, Ky. Those plants, which will neutralize chemical agents instead of burning them, won't finish that work until 2020 and 2023, respectively, the plan shows.

The Pentagon “is again backsliding on its commitment,” Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said in a statement.

The projections “are simply unacceptable,” he said. “They would subject the people living near (stockpiles) to the dangers of chemical weapons until well into the 2020s.”

The military has destroyed 41% of its 31,500-ton chemical arsenal, which includes weapons such as rockets and caches of raw chemical agents. A Pentagon report in April showed that projected costs for destroying all stockpiles have climbed from $2 billion in 1986 to $32 billion today.

Critics say the plan to slow spending and stretch construction at the remaining disposal plants will raise costs and create needless risks of an accidental chemical release or terrorist attack.

“To intentionally put tens of thousands of Americans at an unnecessary risk by continuing to store these weapons is reprehensible,” said Craig Williams of the Chemical Weapons Working Group, a Kentucky-based coalition of citizen groups from stockpile sites. “Not only are they ignoring our international treaty obligations, they are undermining the military's … obligation to protect U.S. citizens.”

WAR NEWS:

Bush Denies Decision On Altering Iraq Troop Levels (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096607

George W. Bush said he had made no decisions on altering troop numbers in Iraq on Monday following reports that the Pentagon was considering a temporary boost to curb sectarian violence in Baghdad.

The Washington Post reported on Monday that a Pentagon team reviewing Iraq policy was considering several options, including a temporary troop increase to accelerate the training of Iraq forces and curb sectarian bloodshed.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases,'' Mr Bush said in Indonesia.

In addition to the Pentagon policy "scrub" – which is being overseen by the uniformed military – the White House has ordered a review to consider new policies to address the Iraq chaos, which has claimed the lives of 2,855 US soldiers and tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians.

The Iraq Study Group, a Congress-mandated review led by James Baker, former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, former Democratic congressman, is next month expected to produce its recommendations for a policy shift on Iraq. In addition to recommending a boost in support for training Iraqi troops, its report is expected to call for the White House to talk to Iran and Syria – which the Pentagon has accused of fomenting parts of the insurgency – about finding ways to stabilise Iraq.

While the Pentagon is still completing its review, General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, last week told Congress he believed the US had the correct number of troops in Iraq. His comments drew criticism from John McCain, widely seen as Republican frontrunner for the 2008 presidential race, who said he was disappointed that the military was pursuing a course of "status quo".

In the wake of their US mid-term election victory, Democrats have argued that the US public voted for change in Iraq, which they say should equate to troop withdrawals, a move that Gen Abizaid last week said would exacerbate sectarian violence in Iraq. Some influential Republicans such as Mr McCain and Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina senator, want the White House to increase troops in Iraq.

Over the past couple of weeks, however, Mr McCain has hinted that he may support withdrawing from Iraq if the White House does not boost troops to a level he believes necessary to achieve success in Iraq. He has said it would be "immoral" to send troops back to Iraq if US policy is simply going to result in delaying defeat.

Bush Weighs Next Step On Troops In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt

AP, November 21, 2006

President Bush said Monday he isn't ready to decide between rival calls to increase or scale back U.S. troops in Iraq. Unruffled by street protests against his policy, he said they were a healthy sign of democracy in this Muslim nation.

Facing growing disapproval at home for the Iraq war, Bush heard no criticism or demands for troop cuts from Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. The Indonesian leader said the "global community must be also responsible in solving the problems in Iraq" along with the United States.

Awaiting the results of a Pentagon review and recommendations from a special commission exploring Iraq options, Bush refused to tip his hand about any change in the level of American forces in Iraq, now at more than 140,000.

Back in the U.S., the Republican chairman of the House Armed Services Committee said more Iraqi troops should be pushed to the front lines. "We need to saddle those up and deploy them to the fight," primarily in Baghdad, said Rep. Duncan Hunter of California.

Prominent Democrats have called for a timetable for troop withdrawals. Some Republicans — notably potential Republican presidential candidate John McCain — are urging a heavy buildup of forces to quell the violence in Baghdad.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources," Bush said, standing alongside Yudhoyono at a news conference in the presidential palace.

Asked specifically whether there were any risks in increasing U.S. troops, Bush said, "There's no need to comment on something that may not happen. But if it were to happen, I will tell you the upsides and downside."

A study of options is under way by a Pentagon group for Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Those options include sending more U.S. troops, reducing the force but staying longer or simply pulling out, The Washington Post reported Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0096608

Indonesia was the last foreign stop on Bush's eight-day, postelection journey that also has taken him to Singapore and Vietnam. He met in Hanoi with world leaders to seek a common strategy for talks aimed at encouraging North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program.

Concerns for Bush's safety in Indonesia were heightened after police warned of an increased risk of attack by al-Qaida-linked militants. Bush is widely disliked in this country because of strong U.S. support for Israel and because of the invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Demonstrations by Islamic hard-liners, students, housewives and taxi drivers have been staged every day this month and nearly 10,000 protesters turned out on Monday, some holding banners that read "Bush is a terrorist!" and "You're not welcome here!"

Bush was unruffled. "People protest, that's a good sign," he said. "It's a sign of a healthy society."

Countering arguments about his goals in the Middle East, Bush said that "to say spreading democracy is anti-religious — it's the opposite of that. Democracy means you can worship any way you choose, freely."

Yudhoyono said any long-term solution in Iraq should involve a national reconciliation, the strengthening of Iraq's government and the involvement of other countries. "We have to combine all those three solutions before actually the United States can determine what the possible policies" should be for withdrawal from Iraq, he said.

Bush's visit was limited to about six hours in the hill town of Bogor, south of Jakarta. Thousands of police and rifle-carrying soldiers patrolled the streets near the presidential palace.

Before an elegant dinner, Bush and his wife, Laura, stopped by a mock classroom in a tent on the palace grounds to showcase U.S. aid for Indonesia's education programs. Chatting with youngsters, Bush was asked about his favorite hobby as a child.

"Baseball. I liked baseball. That was my hobby — sports," he said, before reaching for a more inspirational answer. "The best thing I did was to learn how to read."

Bush returns home to a growing debate about the war, now in its fourth year and with a U.S. death toll of more than 2,860. McCain has called for sending in 20,000 more U.S. troops to curb rising sectarian violence. Bush noted that Pace, the Joint Chiefs chairman, was at work on a thorough review of options for Iraq.

According to senior officials on Pace's staff, the general has asked the group to look at what is going right or wrong in the military conduct of the entire global war on terror and what options are available to make progress.

Indonesia has suffered a string of terrorist attacks against Western interests since 2002, including nightclub and restaurant bombings on the resort island of Bali and blasts at the Australian Embassy and the J.W. Marriott Hotel in the capital.

More than 240 people were killed, many of them tourists, by the attacks blamed on the Southeast Asian terror network Jemaah Islamiyah. While the group has been crippled by hundreds of arrests in recent years, one of its alleged leaders and most deadly operatives, Noordin Top, remains at large.

Bush arrived in Bogor by helicopter in a slashing rain and was driven to the palace in a limousine that bore no U.S. flag. Rather than spend the night, Bush was left for Hawaii where he will have breakfast Tuesday with U.S. troops and visit the U.S. Pacific Command. He will be in Washington on Wednesday for the annual appearance with a Thanksgiving turkey before retiring to the presidential retreat at Camp David for the holiday.

Pentagon May Suggest Short-Term Buildup Leading To Iraq Exit (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The Pentagon's closely guarded review of how to improve the situation in Iraq has outlined three basic options: Send in more troops, shrink the force but stay longer, or pull out, according to senior defense officials.

Insiders have dubbed the options "Go Big," "Go Long" and "Go Home." The group conducting the review is likely to recommend a combination of a small, short-term increase in U.S. troops and a long-term commitment to stepped-up training and advising of Iraqi forces, the officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0096609

The military's study, commissioned by Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, comes at a time when escalating violence is causing Iraq policy to be reconsidered by both the White House and the congressionally chartered, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Pace's effort will feed into the White House review, but military officials have made it clear they are operating independently.

The Pentagon group's proceedings are so secret that officials asked to help it have not even been told its title or mandate. But in recent days the circle of those with knowledge of its deliberations has widened beyond a narrow group working for the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"Go Big," the first option, originally contemplated a large increase in U.S. troops in Iraq to try to break the cycle of sectarian and insurgent violence. A classic counterinsurgency campaign, though, would require several hundred thousand additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers as well as heavily armed Iraqi police. That option has been all but rejected by the study group, which concluded that there are not enough troops in the U.S. military and not enough effective Iraqi forces, said sources who have been informally briefed on the review.

The sources insisted on anonymity because no one at the Pentagon has been permitted to discuss the review with outsiders. The review group is led by three high-profile colonels -- H.R. McMaster and Peter Mansoor of the Army, and Thomas C. Greenwood of the Marine Corps. None of them would comment for this article.

Spokesmen for the chairman and vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs did not respond to calls or e-mails seeking comment.

"Go Home," the third option, calls for a swift withdrawal of U.S. troops. It was rejected by the Pentagon group as likely to push Iraq directly into a full-blown and bloody civil war.

The group has devised a hybrid plan that combines part of the first option with the second one -- "Go Long" -- and calls for cutting the U.S. combat presence in favor of a long-term expansion of the training and advisory efforts. Under this mixture of options, which is gaining favor inside the military, the U.S. presence in Iraq, currently about 140,000 troops, would be boosted by 20,000 to 30,000 for a short period, the officials said.

The purpose of the temporary but notable increase, they said, would be twofold: To do as much as possible to curtail sectarian violence, and also to signal to the Iraqi government and public that the shift to a "Go Long" option that aims to eventually cut the U.S. presence is not a disguised form of withdrawal.

Even so, there is concern that such a radical shift in the U.S. posture in Iraq could further damage the standing of its government, which U.S. officials worry is already shaky. Under the hybrid plan, the short increase in U.S. troop levels would be followed by a long-term plan to radically cut the presence, perhaps to 60,000 troops.

That combination plan, which one defense official called "Go Big but Short While Transitioning to Go Long," could backfire if Iraqis suspect it is really a way for the United States to moonwalk out of Iraq -- that is, to imitate singer Michael Jackson's trademark move of appearing to move forward while actually sliding backward. "If we commit to that concept, we have to accept upfront that it might result in the opposite of what we want," the official said.

The Pentagon official said this short-term boost could be achieved through three steps: extending the tours of duty of some units already in Iraq, sending other units there earlier than planned and activating some Army Reserve units.

The group concluded that such a step might be necessary because it is concerned that the continuing violence is undercutting the Iraqi government's credibility. "Folks increasingly realize that if violence can't be contained, the spiral downward will continue, the national government will lose the effectiveness it has . . . . and then all bets will be off," the official said.

Also, it would take months to prepare and implement the expansion of the program to train and advise Iraqi forces, he noted. The military would have to find those additional advisers, prepare them for the deployment, get infrastructure in place to house and feed them, order and ship equipment for them to use, and recruit additional Iraqis for them to train.

"The 'Go Long' approach is one that can work if there is sufficient strategic patience, resources appropriated and [if] leadership executes effectively," a military intelligence official said.

Another potential obstacle to the "Go Long" option is that it runs counter to the impulse of many congressional Democrats to find a way to get out of Iraq quickly. Planners envision taking five to 10 more years to create a stable and competent Iraqi army. Because it wouldn't lead to a swift exit, some Democrats could criticize this option as a disguised version of "staying the course."

DOJ_NMG_0096610

On the other hand, the hybrid version of "Go Long" may be remarkably close to the recommendation that the Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). That group's findings, expected to be issued next month, are said to focus on changing the emphasis of U.S. military operations from combating the insurgency to training Iraqis, and also to find ways to increase security in Baghdad and bring neighboring countries into talks about stabilizing Iraq.

The Pentagon group has given a thumbs-down to what it considered variants of withdrawal, such as pulling U.S. units out of the cities and keeping them in isolated enclaves, where they would not interact with the Iraqi population but would be available to combat major insurgent offensives and also to protect the government against coups.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. military commander for the Middle East, expressed a similar view last week when he told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he thinks that immediate troop withdrawals would increase the violence in Iraq.

U.S. Considers Large, Temporary Troop Increase In Iraq (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — Pentagon officials conducting a review of Iraq strategy are considering a substantial but temporary increase in American troop levels and the addition of several thousand more trainers to work with Iraqi forces, a senior Defense Department official said Monday.

The idea, dubbed the “surge option” by some officials, would involve increasing American forces by 20,000 troops or more for several months in the hope of improving security, especially in Baghdad. That would mark a sharp rise over the current baseline of 144,000 troops.

But some officials and senior military officers are arguing against the idea, saying that it could undercut a sense of urgency for Iraqi units to take on a greater role in fighting the insurgency and preventing sectarian attacks. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, told Congress last week that the military was stretched so thin that such an increase could not be sustained over the long term.

“There are people who believe that a short-term surge would have a beneficial impact, but there isn’t universal agreement on that yet,” said the senior official, who said that President Bush was scheduled to be briefed in the next several weeks on the developing options, which were first reported Monday in The Washington Post.

There is far more consensus within the Pentagon on the need to increase the number of American trainers, more than 3,000 of whom are working with Iraqi Army, police and border units. General Abizaid endorsed that idea in general terms in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee last week.

A Pentagon strategy review, ordered by Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, is backing the idea, as is a separate panel studying Iraq options, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, the senior official said.

The number of American advisers, who generally work in 11- to 13-member teams attached to Iraqi units, is likely to end up being doubled, the officials said.

To do that, officials are considering whether they could convert American soldiers in combat units already in Iraq into advisers, working alongside Iraqi security forces, the senior official said. That would reduce the number of Americans exclusively available for combat, but it would enable the advisers’ ranks to be increased rapidly, instead of the months it would take to train additional advisers in the United States.

In addition, placing more experienced troops with Iraqi soldiers would augment the Iraqi units’ combat power, the official said.

The Pentagon review is being conducted by more than a dozen officers who have served in Iraq and are regarded as some of the military’s most experienced thinkers about the problems there. The group appears to have rejected other more radical options, including a rapid withdrawal of American troops from Iraq and a major long-term increase in troop levels, the senior official said.

DOJ_NMG_0096611

Some Pentagon officials took issue Monday with the idea that the relatively low-ranking group composed largely of colonels would be drafting options for switching course in Iraq. A Pentagon spokesman, Bryan Whitman, said the group was not charged with developing formal recommendations but rather with giving its views to other members of the Joint Staff.

His comments appeared aimed, at least in part, at reasserting in public the role of the Joint Chiefs, who have been criticized by retired military officers for deferring too much in developing Iraq strategy to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has announced his resignation.

"They're not working on any specific product or report," Mr. Whitman said of the group. "They're providing unfettered views and fresh views." He added that recommendations for shifting strategy would be made by General Pace, "whose job is to advise the president."

The senior Pentagon official said that increasing the number of American combat troops for an indefinite period "is not on the table." Nor is there active discussion of a rapid troop drawdown advocated by some Democrats, the official said, an approach the official called "turning off the lights and going home."

Though a temporary increase of about 20,000 American troops is under consideration, the plan envisions the additional troops staying only until security conditions improve. After that, troop levels could come down, as better-trained and equipped Iraqi units took on a larger security role.

But even that option would not be easy to accomplish without putting more strain on already-strapped Army and Marine combat units. Officials said it could be done by extending the tours of some units already in Iraq, speeding up the deployment of other units scheduled to go, and activating more reserve units.

"The fact of the matter is that the United States military does have the ability to put more troops on the ground if we need to have more forces on the ground," Mr. Whitman said.

Temporary spikes in troop levels have succeeded in tamping down insurgent violence in Iraq in the past. But several Pentagon officials say they are not sure that the Army can achieve the same results against attacks fueled increasingly by sectarian tension. An increase in American forces this year to more than 140,000 from 128,000 has failed to stem the spike in sectarian attacks, they noted.

Representative Duncan Hunter, a California Republican who is losing the chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee at the end of the year, said at a news conference that rather than sending more American troops, he favored redeploying Iraqi units from largely calm areas to Baghdad and other violence-ridden sections of the country.

"The idea of having the Iraqi battalions that we've stood up and trained 50 to 100 miles away, in areas that are peaceful, simply staying in their barracks while we put together new rotations of Americans to take their place, simply doesn't make sense," he said.

Bush Says No Decision Yet On Troop Levels In Iraq (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia, Nov. 20 -- President Bush said Monday that he had made no decisions about altering the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, noting that there are "a lot of suggestions" still being evaluated.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," Bush said. "They will be bringing forth the suggestions and recommendations to me here as quickly as possible."

Bush made his remarks during a news conference here following a meeting with Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, near the end of an Asian trip that included a stop at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Vietnam.

While Bush would not comment on whether he should adjust troop levels, Yudhoyono said the United States should consider disengaging from Iraq, but only in conjunction with increased international cooperation to stabilize and rebuild the country.

"The global community must be also responsible in solving the problem in Iraq," Yudhoyono said. "It is not only the responsibility . . . of the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0096612

Several reviews of U.S. options in Iraq are expected to begin recommending changes in the Bush administration's policy -- a process likely to be encouraged by Democrats who won control of the House and Senate in elections this month.

One review, being conducted by the Pentagon, has laid out three basic options: a quick withdrawal, a significant increase in the number of U.S. troops, and an intermediate option that would require an increase in troops, if only for the short term .

Even with the endorsement of a Pentagon panel, or that of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), any increase in troops would be controversial, particularly because Democrats in recent months campaigned on the need for a plan to decrease U.S. exposure in the country.

Bush's visit to the world's most populous Muslim nation brought him in close proximity to the anti-American anger that has intensified across the Islamic world since the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq. In the days before his arrival, several thousand demonstrators took to the streets in nearby Jakarta to protest Bush's visit, as well as U.S. foreign policy. Other protests were held in cities across the country.

There were reports of threats against the president's party, and security was tight for his arrival. Bush shrugged off the protests, saying: "I applaud a society where people are free to come and express their opinions."

The president did not see any of the protests. After his arrival at the airport in Jakarta, he flew by helicopter to meet with the Indonesian president, even as thunderstorms pounded the area.

Bush's entire 6 1/2-hour visit to this country, the world's fourth-largest, was confined to the gated and heavily guarded Bogor Palace, an elegant 19th-century compound used for presidential events.

While Bush may be unpopular among many Indonesians, his administration has promoted increasingly close relations with the government here. After Congress suspended military assistance programs with Indonesia in 1992 and again in 1999 in response to human rights violations in East Timor, the programs were restored last year.

Meanwhile, the two nations have cooperated closely on anti-terrorism efforts. Indonesia has been the scene of deadly terrorist assaults, including bombings in Bali in 2002 and 2005 and two others in Jakarta in 2003 and 2004. The United States was also among the first nations to respond following the devastating 2004 tsunami that killed tens of thousands in Indonesia, and it is helping develop an early-warning system for the massive waves.

Before arriving here, Bush spent half a day in Ho Chi Minh City, where his focus remained on the new Vietnam. Rather than taking in any of the sites associated with the Vietnam War, the president visited a research institute working to prevent the spread of avian flu and AIDS. Bush also toured the stock market there, before meeting with business people -- some of whom returned to Vietnam after living in the United States.

"I am amazed at the size of the growth and the fact that there are people beginning to realize dreams," Bush said, praising the nation's recent strong economic development.

When the president arrived in Ho Chi Minh City from Hanoi on Sunday night, Air Force One suffered a brake malfunction upon touchdown, causing a safety system to blow the valves out of six of the plane's tires. While the mishap posed no danger to the president, it almost caused him to use a smaller backup plane for his trip here.

But Air Force mechanics were able to make repairs in time for the president's flight. After his news conference, Bush and first lady Laura Bush were the guests at a dinner, the final official event of Bush's trip to Southeast Asia. Afterward, the president departed for Honolulu, where he was to have breakfast with troops Tuesday and receive a briefing from military commanders before returning to Washington.

In Indonesia, Bush Defends His Iraq Policy (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia - With President Bush beside him, the president of the world's most populous Muslim nation called Monday for other countries to help stabilize Iraq and for developing a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops.

At a joint news conference, Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono didn't specify which countries should be brought in to help, but he emphasized that "the global community must be also responsible in solving the problems in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0096613

While he mentioned that the U.S. should work toward "a proper timetable" for "the disengagement of U.S. military forces and other coalition forces from Iraq," he implicitly rejected calls for an abrupt pullout, and Bush said Yudhoyono hadn't urged him to do that.

Bush defended his Iraq policy and didn't rule out sending more U.S. troops to join the approximately 140,000 currently in Iraq.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," he said. He said he hopes to get recommendations from the Pentagon "as quickly as possible."

Of the three obvious options - sending significantly more U.S. troops to Iraq, staying the course or withdrawing immediately - only one has much support, however. The U.S. doesn't have enough troops to increase its presence significantly, and there's wide agreement that a hasty retreat would only leave a bigger mess. So support is coalescing around alterations to the current strategy, perhaps adding 20,000 to 50,000 more troops for a limited time, then beginning a drawdown.

Bush's visit to Indonesia on the final leg of a six-day Asia tour sparked days of protests that continued as he met with Yudhoyono behind the heavily guarded gates of a presidential palace. Bush said he wasn't bothered by protests against him.

"It's to Indonesia's credit that it's a society where people are able to protest and say what they think," Bush said. "It's not the first time, by the way, where people have showed up and expressed their opinion about my policies. But that's what happens when you make hard decisions."

Helmeted police stood shoulder to shoulder to block off streets near the meeting site in Bogor, about 45 miles south of Jakarta. Nearby businesses were forced to close for the day.

The protesters didn't get near the sprawling country estate, and Bush avoided any encounters by traveling by helicopter from the Jakarta airport. The chopper landed at the colonial-era palace in a driving rainstorm, punctuated by at least one lightning strike.

Both leaders seemed eager to avoid any friction during the seven-hour visit, which was intended to strengthen relations and showcase Indonesia as a model Muslim democracy.

Bush came to Indonesia after wrapping up a weekend trip to Vietnam with a trip to the Ho Chi Minh City stock market, a museum tour and a briefing on efforts to combat AIDS and avian flu. Bush banged a gong to open a trading session at the fledgling stock market.

The market offers investors fewer than 60 stocks and mutual funds, but its mere existence symbolizes the economic changes that are transforming communist Vietnam.

After a quick tour of a history museum, Bush and his wife, Laura, stood in the steaming heat and watched a colorful performance by Vietnamese drummers and dancers. Four shimmering dragons, each propelled by two young boys beneath elaborate sequined costumes, snaked through a flag-waving drill team.

Earlier in the day, White House aides scrambled to come up with alternative travel arrangements after Air Force One suffered six flat tires upon Bush's arrival. A malfunction in the aircraft's braking system overheated the tires, causing their valves to blow out.

The safety feature is intended to prevent a more dangerous tire blowout. Air Force mechanics fixed the problem in time for Bush's departure. The president was scheduled to layover in Hawaii Monday night before returning to Washington on Tuesday.

Bush Says He's Still Weighing New Moves In Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

BOGOR, Indonesia -- President Bush, facing mounting calls to change course in Iraq, said he is still considering sending more American troops to try to quell the violence there.

Speaking to reporters here, Mr. Bush made clear he also is considering withdrawing some troops and said he wouldn't make final decisions until he received recommendations from U.S. military commanders and other government officials currently conducting sweeping reviews of U.S. policy on Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0096614

Mr. Bush specifically cited the work being done by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who is making a thorough review of options for Iraq.

"I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources, including our own United States military," Mr. Bush said.

The top general in the region told Congress last week that more troops might be necessary in the near term to boost training of the Iraqi military and police. Mr. Bush has often said he would send additional U.S. troops to Iraq if senior commanders there requested them, but his comments yesterday took on additional political significance because of the raging debate in Washington about whether to begin leaving Iraq.

Many leaders of the new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate have coalesced around a proposal for a "phased withdrawal" from Iraq that would begin early next year. Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain has been urging the White House to go in the other direction by significantly ramping up the U.S. military presence in Iraq. Mr. McCain argues that deploying thousands of additional American troops there could help pacify Baghdad and curb the country's sectarian violence.

Mr. Bush made the comments following a series of meetings here with Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, the leader of the world's most populous Muslim country. The visit took place under extraordinarily tight security because of concerns that home-grown Islamic militants would try to strike Mr. Bush. Thousands of protesters took to the streets to register their opposition to Mr. Bush's visit.

Mr. Yudhoyono declined to call for a U.S. withdrawal or criticize the broader American-led nation-building effort there. Instead, the Indonesian leader appeared to endorse many aspects of the Bush administration's current strategy for Iraq. White House officials were pleasantly surprised by Mr. Yudhoyono's moderate tone, as the war is so unpopular in Indonesia.

In his own comments, Mr. Yudhoyono stressed the importance of bolstering Iraq's national government, finding a way of reconciling the country's feuding sectarian groups and enlisting the international community to rebuild the country when the fighting eventually stops -- though he didn't offer any assistance from Indonesia.

The two leaders' comments about Iraq underscored the agonizing questions facing policymakers. Mounting public fury in the U.S. over Mr. Bush's handling of the invasion and subsequent occupation cost Republicans their control of Congress this month, and even Mr. Bush's closest political allies say he needs to chart a new course on Iraq if he hopes to salvage the remaining two years of his presidency.

Both supporters and opponents of the war agree there are few easy -- or bloodless -- ways of winding down the troubled U.S. effort.

Leading Democrats have rallied around a proposal from Michigan Sen. Carl Levin that calls for beginning troop withdrawal within four to six months. A rising number of Republicans also have begun arguing U.S. forces should start returning home next year.

The comments from Mr. McCain have garnered wide attention, shifting the terms of the debate away from a focus on a troop drawdown to the far more complex question of whether and how to add forces.

The debate will come to a head in coming weeks when the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan team led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, makes its prescriptions for resolving the situation in Iraq.

Bush Pressured To Come Up With New Iraq Strategy (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Barbara Slavin

USA Today, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Increased pressure from Congress and high level studies commissioned by the Pentagon and the White House are prodding President Bush to significantly change strategy in Iraq for the first time since the war began in March 2003.

A new Democratic majority in Congress, the imminent departure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and a recent flurry of high-level studies have made conditions ripe for change.

The Pentagon, State Department and White House are exploring options for changing course in Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton, is preparing to present its recommendations next month.

DOJ_NMG_0096615

Bush said he is still weighing options. “I haven't made any decisions about troop increases or troop decreases, and won't until I hear from a variety of sources,” Bush said Monday.

Many Democrats, buoyed by midterm election results, say leaving the current Bush administration policy unchanged is unacceptable.

“The idea that we're going to have 140,000 troops in Iraq this time next year is just not reasonable,” Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said on NBC's Today show. Biden is in line to be the next chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

A look at the top options policymakers face:

•Adding troops. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has been one of the most prominent backers of beefing up U.S. forces in Iraq. McCain says more troops would help quell violence in Baghdad and eliminate the al-Qaeda-aligned insurgents in western Iraq.

“The consequences of failure are so severe that I will exhaust every possibility to try to fix this situation,” McCain, a GOP presidential hopeful in 2008, said Sunday on ABC's This Week.

Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, told McCain at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing last week that adding a large number of troops would stretch military resources and undercut efforts to have the Iraqi military take more responsibility for security.

•Repositioning troops and changing their missions. This could involve having more U.S. troops acting as advisers to Iraqi units, something Abizaid and other military brass have said they support.

“It seems to me that the prudent course ahead is to keep the troop levels about where they are,” Abizaid said last week, and “increase the number of (U.S.) forces that are with Iraqi security forces to make them better, more confident.”

U.S. advisers to Iraqi units generally work in teams of 10 to 15 for each Iraqi battalion of 400 to 600 troops. Abizaid says he wants more trainers so they can work with smaller units.

•Beginning to withdraw troops. Leading Democrats, including Biden and incoming Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin of Michigan, support this idea. Levin argues that a “phased redeployment” of U.S. troops in the next four to six months would push the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to crack down on militias and make other tough political decisions that would lead to a reduction in violence.

Abizaid says a withdrawal would undercut the Iraqi military and lead to more violence.

•Talking with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. Baker has met with Syrian and Iranian officials and says the Bush administration should, too. “Our panel thinks it's important that we talk to representatives of surrounding governments,” Baker said in an interview in September.

The Bush administration has accused Iran and Syria of contributing to the violence in Iraq and has not held high-level talks with either nation.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Monday invited top officials of Iraq and Syria to Tehran for talks.

Obama Urges Gradual Withdrawal From Iraq (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons And David Mendell

Chicago Tribune, November 21, 2006

Amid intense speculation about whether he will run for president, Sen. Barack Obama on Monday used the spotlight to showcase his strategy for the war in Iraq, excoriating the Bush administration for its "misguided" war and describing a solution that includes dialogue with hostile nations in the region.

In his speech to the Chicago Council on Global Affairs, the Illinois Democrat said the U.S. should end its "coddling" of the Iraqi government by beginning a reduction of troops in the next four to six months and pressuring Iraqis to work out agreements among their warring factions.

"Our troops can help suppress the violence, but they cannot solve its root causes," Obama told members of the council. "And all the troops in the world won't be able to force Shia, Sunni, and Kurd to sit down at a table, resolve their differences, and forge a lasting peace."

DOJ_NMG_0096616

Offering a few new specifics, Obama said he thinks Iraq should convene a regional conference that includes Syria and Iran, two countries with which the U.S. does not currently have diplomatic relations. He also said that, as the U.S. redistributes troops around the Middle East, some of them should be deployed to Afghanistan and northern Iraq.

Substantively, Obama's talk to the council was not markedly different from the one he gave there a year ago. He echoed many of the themes of that speech -- as well as from his highly publicized new book, "The Audacity of Hope." Politically, the plan he embraced positions him alongside many centrist Democrats in Congress who are calling for a slow and careful withdrawal of troops, rather than a quick exit or a build-up of military personnel in Iraq.

But while the speech was mostly the same, the environment in which he delivered it was radically different. Voters registered dissatisfaction with the Iraq war this month, handing Congress over to Democrats for a fresh start. Obama will serve on the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee as part of the new majority.

Perhaps of greater significance to the crowd at the Chicago Hilton on Monday is Obama's status as a possible presidential contender in 2008. The buzz surrounding his possible candidacy drew a large crowd and national spotlight to his speech. The council sold 1,400 tickets to the event, which meant organizers had to move it from the previously scheduled ballroom to a larger one.

"If we'd put this thing on for another senator, we could have held it in a phone booth," said Dick Longworth, a former Tribune reporter and senior fellow at the council, a non-partisan organization devoted to educating people about foreign affairs.

A year ago, Obama asked for a platform at the council to talk about a phased withdrawal from Iraq, much of it by the end of 2006 {ndash} a time frame he reiterated more recently in his book. Obama revised that time frame on Monday, saying he thinks the drawdown should begin within six months.

Though much of Monday's speech was devoted to criticizing the administration and the war, Obama said he thinks it's possible to "salvage an acceptable outcome." He suggests a redeployment of troops and stepped-up efforts to train Iraqi security forces, and says the U.S. should link economic aid to Iraq with "measurable progress on reducing sectarian violence."

Obama indirectly criticized a suggestion by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that the U.S. increase its troop levels in Iraq, saying there is little reason to believe that adding thousands of troops would achieve the desired results.

Afterward, Obama said he doesn't think that proposals to partition Iraq into three separate regions {ndash} Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni {ndash} would work if it were a U.S. initiative. Also, Obama told reporters he would not support a proposal to reinstate the draft.

Although the speech did not cover a lot of new ground, some in the audience said that made it more credible.

"What makes his speech even stronger in his case is the consistency and continuity from what he said a year ago," said Marshall Bouton, president of the council. "He's not a Johnny-come-lately to this debate. It locates him along with a lot of others, embracing a measured, thoughtful, multi-faceted approach."

Obama Urges Gradual Withdrawal From Iraq (AP-Y)

By Deanna Bellandi

AP, November 21, 2006

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, who is contemplating a run for the presidency, on Monday called for a "gradual and substantial" reduction of U.S. forces from Iraq that would begin in four to six months.

Speaking to the Chicago Council on Global Affairs, Obama envisioned a flexible timetable for withdrawal linked to conditions on the ground in Iraq and based on the advice of U.S. commanders. He also called for intensified efforts to train Iraqi security forces, U.S. aid packages tied to Iraqi progress in reducing sectarian violence and new diplomacy with Syria and Iran.

"I believe that it remains possible to salvage an acceptable outcome to this long and misguided war," he said. "But I have to be honest today, it will not be easy. For the fact is that there are no good options left in this war."

Obama was not in the Senate when President Bush sought and received support from Congress in 2002 to use military force against Saddam Hussein. But he has publicly opposed the war since then.

The results of this month's elections, the Illinois senator said, represented a repudiation of President Bush's policies. But he said the war has also ignited a new sense of isolationism among Americans that is risky in a post-Sept. 11, 2001, world.

DOJ_NMG_0096617

"We can't afford to be a country of isolationists in the 21st century," he said, arguing that it is "absolutely vital that we maintain a strong and active foreign policy, relentless in pursuing our enemies and hopeful in promoting our values around the world."

Obama was careful not to set a specific timetable for withdrawal of troops or suggest troop levels.

"We cannot compromise on the safety of our troops, and we should be willing to adjust to realities on the ground," he said.

He proposed redeploying troops to Northern Iraq and to other countries in the region. He recommended boosting troop strength in Afghanistan, "where our lack of focus and commitment of resources has led to an increasing deterioration of the security situation there."

"For only through this phase redeployment can we send a clear message to the Iraqi factions that the United States is not going to hold together this country indefinitely — that it will be up to them to form a viable government that can effectively run and secure Iraq," he said.

Obama rejected proposals to add more troops to Iraq, an idea advanced by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., saying that without Iraqi cooperation "we would only be putting more of our soldiers in the crossfire of a civil war."

Following the speech, Obama rejected the notion of reinstating the military draft, an idea put forth by Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y. Obama said a volunteer military is adequate when the country has a national security strategy that makes sense.

"What I don't want ... is a situation in which we have bad strategies and we institute a draft simply to throw more bodies at a bad strategy. That is not going to work," he said.

Obama is one of several Democrats considering a run for the White House in 2008, which promises to be one of the most wide-open campaigns in decades. In recent polling, his numbers rival front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., but questions abound regarding his experience — he has served less than two years in the Senate. He said Monday he would decide in the next few months.

The first-term senator said the Iraq war has underscored one lesson: "We should be more modest in our belief that we can impose democracy on a country through military force."

Obama Calls For Pullout In Iraq (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

CHICAGO — Sen. Barack Obama, the popular Illinois Democrat who is considering a run for the White House, said Monday that the U.S. should start withdrawing troops from Iraq in the next four to six months, redeploy some forces to Afghanistan and bolster efforts to train Iraqi police.

Obama criticized President Bush for pushing forward with a war that "would require an occupation of undetermined length, at undetermined cost, with undetermined consequences."

He also noted that a bipartisan congressional effort was needed to "reassert our authority to oversee the management of this war" and retain better oversight over military expenditures.

He suggested that the U.S. would benefit from improved diplomacy with Iran and Syria and that all withdrawal timetables should be tied to the advice of U.S. commanders on the ground.

"I believe that it remains possible to salvage an acceptable outcome to this long and misguided war," Obama said to a rapt audience of 1,400 at a meeting of the Chicago Council on Global Affairs. "But it will not be easy. For the fact is that there are no good options left in this war."

The speech was similar to one he gave here nearly a year ago. The council has become a stumping ground for politicians wanting to highlight their views on foreign policy.

In 2005, though, only a few hundred curious observers gathered to hear the freshman senator.

"As the size of this crowd attests, the interest in hearing Sen. Obama's views is now greater, much greater," council president Marshall M. Bouton told Obama. "So is interest in your possible run for the presidency for the United States of America."

But Obama avoided addressing that possibility, even when two audience members asked him about it after the speech.

DOJ_NMG_0096618

Instead, he focused on the results of the recent midterm elections, describing them as a public repeal of White House policies.The war has created a dangerous culture of global isolationism among Americans, he said.

"We need to maintain a strong foreign policy, relentless in pursuing our enemies and hopeful in promoting our values around the world," Obama said.

A Harvard-educated attorney and longtime Illinois resident who practiced civil rights law, Obama rose to national prominence after delivering an electrifying keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in 2004. He won the Senate seat that November with 70% of the vote.

Now the 45-year-old junior senator has emerged as a promising presidential candidate that neither the press nor the public can get enough of.

He's been mobbed by fans while touring to promote his new book, "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream." Time magazine put him on its cover, next to a headline that read, "Why Barack Obama Could Be The Next President." Oprah Winfrey said she'd vote for him — even though he hasn't announced his intention to run.

Recent polls have showed Obama following Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y) as a favored Democratic presidential nominee, edging out former Vice President Al Gore and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

"On the plus side, Obama's a fresh face and he's lived the American dream," said Dennis Goldford, politics professor at Drake University in Des Moines. "On the down side, it shows how thin the Democratic bench is and the old faces all have a lot of baggage."

Dozens of people at Monday's event in the Hilton Chicago clutched copies of Obama's book. Sharon Russell, an accountant who lives in Gary, Ind., took a vacation day and paid a $100 entrance fee to see him.

"I wanted to have a chance to see the man I think will be our next president in person," said Russell, 52. "I think he'd make an excellent leader, at a time when this country really needs one."

The Only Real Option: Leave Iraq Now (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Good lord, if even Henry Kissinger now says that military victory in Iraq is impossible, pretty soon George W. Bush really will be left with just Laura and Barney on his side.

The Decider Agonistes must be feeling betrayed and abused these days. British Prime Minister Tony Blair's admission that the war has been "pretty much of a disaster" was just a slip of the tongue, but the president must have felt it as a cut most unkind.

And Kissinger? The oracle who has been dropping by the White House regularly to whisper sweet nothings into the presidential ear, urging him to hang tough? The sage who wrote in August 2005 that "victory over the insurgency is the only meaningful exit strategy" is now listing Bush's conditions for withdrawal -- a stable government, ruling all of Iraq, with the ability to control the violence -- and pronouncing them unattainable. Will anyone be surprised if Henry the K soon reveals that he knew the whole thing was folly all along?

Meanwhile, the neocon architects of the war are making a spectacle of themselves in their undignified flight from the sinking ship. Richard Perle, Kenneth Adelman, Michael Rubin -- they all take pretty much the same line, which is that the invasion was a great and noble idea but that the White House and the Pentagon bungled it horribly.

Defections, recrimination and finger-pointing among the people who got us into this mess provide an amusing sideshow. But the main event is the mandate that midterm voters imposed this month, in no uncertain terms: Find a way out.

Sen. John McCain has planted his flag at one extreme of the debate, making the counterintuitive argument that the way to get out of Iraq is to send in a lot more U.S. troops who would stabilize the country as a necessary prelude to withdrawal. By "counterintuitive," I mean "divorced from reality as we know it." For one thing, the troops McCain wants to send do not exist -- the military is stretched paper-thin as it is, and I don't think Rep. Charles Rangel's proposal to reinstate the draft is going to get very far. For another, McCain doesn't specify how all those magically conjured reinforcements are supposed to accomplish such a mission.

DOJ_NMG_0096619

In a sectarian civil war, the last place you want to stand is in the middle. Is the United States really going to choose sides and then lend a hand as Shiite or Sunni death squads go about their awful business?

At the other end of the debate is Rep. John Murtha, who says we should cut our losses and start pulling out. At least Murtha doesn't pretend we'd be leaving behind a secure, viable Iraq, because we wouldn't.

The new, post-midterm mainstream position in Washington is to support "phased withdrawals," with or without telling anyone in advance when a new phase will begin, and to involve "the neighbors," meaning Iran and Syria, in forcing Iraqi politicians to reach "a political solution." James Baker and his Iraq Study Group will probably come up with some variation of this scenario. But we should be honest and acknowledge that phased withdrawals, with or without a stated timetable, really mean just telling the Iraqis good luck and adios, drawing the whole process out in a belated attempt to save face.

The president clearly doesn't want to hear any of this. The bizarre analogy he made in Hanoi -- comparing Iraq to Vietnam and saying, "We'll succeed unless we quit" -- doesn't even make sense in his own parallel universe. He should ask his friend Kissinger to tell him about that Ho Chi Minh guy whose picture is plastered all over Vietnam.

But while the Decider covers his ears and rewrites history, the center of gravity of the debate has shifted from whether we should get out of Iraq to how and when.

If we are ready to acknowledge, as Kissinger does, that the president's goals in Iraq will never be accomplished, then how do we justify the American lives that will be lost next year, next month or next week, while the phases of a face-saving withdrawal run their course?

If American troops begin pulling out tomorrow, Iraq surely will suffer a terrible spasm of bloody violence. But if we wait a year and then pull out, there is no reason to expect any different outcome. Quite the contrary: The longer we stay, the more lawless and chaotic the country becomes. And the more young Americans die in a war that no longer has an attainable goal.

The Lingo Of Vietnam (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The way President Bush whisked through Vietnam -- oh, if only we had done the same 40 years ago -- it seemed as if he was feeling an obvious parallel with the war in Iraq. His aides, who somehow lose IQ points by mere proximity to the commander in chief -- national security adviser Stephen Hadley argued that Bush had "gotten a real sense of the warmth of the Vietnamese people" as he sped by in his motorcade -- insisted that no parallel existed. But these aides are dead wrong. There is this: I would have fought neither war.

Before you protest "of course, Cohen," let me explain that the "I" in the foregoing sentence is really four people. There is the "I" who originally thought the Vietnam War was morally correct, that the communists were awful people and that the loss of South Vietnam (the North was already gone) would result in a debacle for its people. That's, in fact, what happened. It was only later, when I myself was in the Army, that I deemed the war not worth killing or dying for. By then I -- the second "I" -- no longer felt it was winnable, and I did not want to lose my life so that somehow defeat could be managed more elegantly.

Things are precisely the same with Iraq, and here, too, I -- No. 3 -- originally had no moral qualms about the war. Saddam Hussein was a beast who had twice invaded his neighbors, had killed his own people with abandon and posed a threat -- and not just a theoretical one -- to Israel. If anything, I was encouraged in my belief by the offensive opposition to the war -- silly arguments about oil or empire or, at bottom, the ineradicable and perpetual rottenness of America.

On the contrary, I thought. We are a good country, attempting to do a good thing. In a post-Sept. 11 world, I thought the prudent use of violence could be therapeutic. The United States had the power to change things for the better, and those who would do the changing -- the fighting -- were, after all, volunteers. This mattered to me.

But these volunteers are now fighting a war few envisaged and no one wanted -- not I (No. 4), for sure. If at one time my latter-day minutemen marched off thinking they were bringing democracy to Iraq and the greater Middle East, they now must know better. If they thought they were going to rid the region of weapons of mass destruction and sever the link between al-Qaeda and Hussein, they now are entitled to feel duped by Bush, Vice President Cheney and others. The exaggerations are particularly repellent. To fool someone into sacrificing his life to battle a chimera is a hideous abuse of the public trust.

DOJ_NMG_0096620

Daily I read the casualty list from Iraq -- and I invent reasons to make the deaths less tragic. This is a hopeless, maybe tasteless, task, but it matters to me if someone is a career soldier who knew what he was getting into as opposed to some naive kid digitally juiced on a computerized version of war -- or, even sadder, some guardsman who enlisted for God, country or spare cash, but not by any means for Baghdad. He's a volunteer, all right, but not for a war that didn't exist when he raised his right hand and took the oath.

My dauntingly knowledgeable Post colleague Thomas E. Ricks reports from the Pentagon that the military is now considering three options for Iraq: more troops, fewer troops (but for a longer time) and no troops at all -- the ol' cut and run. The missing option here is victory. Don't worry, it will be invented. "You have to define win," Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who is about to return to Iraq, told the New York Times. Ah, just in the nick of time.

Where have we heard this sort of language before? It is the lingo of Vietnam. As with Vietnam, we are fighting now merely not to lose -- to avoid a full-fledged civil war (it's coming anyway) or to keep the country together, something like that. But not for victory. Not for democracy. All this talk of the Iraqis doing more on their own behalf is Vietnamization in the desert rather than the jungle. What remains the same is asking soldiers to die for a reason that the politicians in Washington can no longer explain. This, above all, is how Iraq is like Vietnam: older men asking younger men to die while they try to figure something out.

That's why Bush kept moving. He knows Vietnam is not just about the past. It's also about the future.

The Story Behind The Iraq Study Group (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

On his third trip to Iraq, in September 2005, Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) knew the American mission was imperiled.

"We were up in Tikrit and went to a hospital, and it was guarded with guns and security to the point they were pushing weapons into women's faces," Wolf said. "I saw we can't be successful if we're going into an operating room with pistols and weapons."

That's when the congressman from Vienna first began to think about the need for "fresh eyes" to scrutinize U.S. policy regarding Iraq. Quietly, he went to the White House and presented his plan: a bipartisan commission of well-respected policymakers to bore deeply into the Iraq dilemma and recommend solutions.

"If you ordered an Erector Set and you were trying to build it before Christmas and you got stuck and someone else came along, they might just see immediately what needs to be done," Wolf said. "Or if you had a health-care problem, you'd want a second opinion. It's all about fresh eyes on a target."

The result is the Iraq Study Group, led by Republican former secretary of state James A. Baker III and Democratic former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (Ind.), who was a vice chairman of the panel that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The group has taken on greater relevance after midterm elections marked by widespread voter dissatisfaction with Iraq, and it will play a decisive role in reshaping the U.S. position on Iraq, according to lawmakers and administration officials.

Initially, the White House was cool to the idea, Wolf said. But he was able to win over Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld followed, as did national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. "Rice's support was key," Wolf said. "But I had to have the support of everybody or there would be no way to do this."

The composition of the study group was also crucial.

"You had to get a group not connected to the administration, people who were not going to be campaigning and who could come to a consensus," he said. "We wanted a bipartisan group, people senior enough that they weren't looking to get placed in a law firm or good job. The test was: Do you love your country?"

The study group, composed of five Democrats and five Republicans, was created in March to assess the situation in Iraq, its impact on the surrounding region and its consequences for U.S. interests. The group's work has been guided by several smaller committees of experts on topics such as the economy and reconstruction, military and security, and political development.

DOJ_NMG_0096621

Wolf got Congress to appropriate $1 million for the project. To select the panel's members, he turned to the U.S. Institute for Peace, an independent nonpartisan organization created and funded by Congress. One of its goals is to promote stability after a conflict.

"It's a tremendous dilemma, a difficult situation" in which Congress "was looking for alternatives and the fall election was reinforcing the polarization of attitudes," said Richard H. Solomon, president of the institute. "We were creating the study group to build a political middle."

Wolf said he hopes that the group's recommendations, expected to be delivered to President Bush and Congress next month, will reconnect a nation splintered by war.

"When our country is together, we're strong -- Truman and Roosevelt showed that," he said. "When we're divided, I think the country's going to be in trouble. I hope something good comes from this, that we can develop consensus."

Rising Price Of The War On Terror (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

Whether troop levels increase in coming months, or decrease, or stay the same, one aspect of the US military effort in Iraq is unlikely to change: It will be expensive.

The cost of combat in Iraq has now surpassed $300 billion, according to government estimates. Add in activities in Afghanistan, and the total price of the global war on terror is about $500 billion, making it one of the most monetarily costly conflicts in which the nation has ever engaged.

Now the Department of Defense is in the process of drawing up its follow-on request for the remainder of FY 2007. Reports indicate that the Pentagon could ask for $120 billion to $160 billion, which would be its largest funding request yet for the global war on terror.

After they take control of Congress next year, Democrats will almost certainly investigate both the rate of Iraq spending and the manner in which it has been appropriated. Much of the war has been funded through supplementals, so-called emergency bills whose use in this case has become increasingly controversial in Congress.

"We're now at $507 billion for the global war on terror and counting, and almost all of that has been pushed through a process that doesn't give proper scrutiny to the budget. Are we spending it wisely?" says Gordon Adams, a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson International Center who was the senior White House official for national security budgets under President Clinton.

Last month, Congress approved $70 billion in spending intended to pay for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan through the first six months of fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1 for the US government.

The size of the request under discussion reflects both the continued nature of the mission and past wear-and-tear. Both the Army and the Air Force need billions to replace expensive hardware worn out by the pace of warfare in Iraq.

Before the invasion of Iraq, the White House estimated that combat operations there would cost about $50 billion. That forecast, however, was based on a quick end to the war and a rapid drawdown of US troops.

Three years later, Iraq alone is costing the US some $8 billion a month.

Estimates of total spending vary, due to the fact that Department of Defense records on obligations do not provide comprehensive specifics, and the supplemental bills voted by Congress do not have the line-item details of regular sending bills.

Congressional Research Service figures puts the cost of Iraq, Afghanistan, and other war-on-terror activities at $507 billion. Of that, the Afghan campaign has cost at least $88 billion, according to CRS. Iraq accounts for the bulk of the rest.

The drain of continued fighting in Iraq has meant that the global war on terror has steadily moved up the list of the most costly conflicts in US history (in terms of money, not casualties). In 2005, it passed the Korean war's inflation-adjusted cost of $361 billion.

Next year it will almost certainly pass the Vietnam War's $531 billion, making it the second most expensive US war ever, behind World War II.

Given the uncertainty of troop levels, it is very difficult to estimate the US military's future costs in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0096622

Overall, each individual soldier deployed in Iraq for a year costs about $275,000, according to CRS. The cost rises to $360,000 if required additional investments in equipment and facilities are added.

Using a scenario in which US troop levels fall to 73,000 by 2010, and then stay at that level, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that the cumulative cost of the global war on terror could reach $808 billion by 2016.

Meanwhile, the Pentagon and the Bush administration have continued the practice by which funding for the war on terror is requested in the form of supplemental appropriations. Supplementals are prepared much closer to the time when the money will actually be spent. The Vietnam War, for instance, was funded via supplementals at its outset. Later, Vietnam costs were folded into the regular budget process.

Supplementals provide much less detail as to where money will be spent than do regular budget documents, and receive less congressional oversight than do regular budget bills.

So far, the White House has shown little inclination to fund Iraq and Afghanistan via the regular budget, despite some pressure from Congress to do so. In addition, the nature of items paid for via these war spending bills may have begun to expand, to include items related to peacetime missions as well.

A Democratic-controlled Congress will almost certainly look for ways to increase pressure on the White House to abandon the flexibility and opaqueness of the emergency bill approach.

'War On Terror' Could Last 30 Years Or More (AFP)

AFP, November 21, 2006

The fight against terrorism could last 30 years or more, according to a report published by a British think tank that specialises in international security.

"There is every prospect of the 'war on terror' extending for 30 years or more," said the report by the Oxford Research Group.

"What is required is a complete re-assessment of current policies but that is highly unlikely, even with the recent political upheavals".

The US Democrats triumphed in legislative elections on November 7 in which they reclaimed the House and the Senate, at the expense of President George W. Bush's Republicans.

"Most people believe that the recent elections mark the beginning of the end of the Bush era but that does not apply to the war on terror," said Professor Paul Rogers, who wrote the report, in a statement.

"In reality there will be little change until the United States faces up to the need for a fundamental re-think of its policies".

The report showed that the United States is now faced with a dilemma: if it withdraws from Iraq, insurgent groups will be able to operate freely in the biggest oil reserve in the world.

"If it stays, though, then US soldiers become an increasing magnet for radical factions, with Iraq becoming a training ground for new generations of paramilitaries, just as Afghanistan was in the 1980s against the Soviet occupying forces," the report said.

It said that the "fundamental mistake" was to remove the regime of president Saddam Hussein by force, which was a "gift" for Al-Qaeda and extremist groups because the deployment of 150,000 US soldiers in the heart of the Arab world is considered by many to be "an occupation force".

At the same time, the war in Afghanistan, that has so far lasted six years, has seen "a marked increase in Taliban activity at a time of record revenues from opium production" and the insurgency there "shows no sign of ending".

The importance of oil in the region "means that it would be entirely unacceptable for the United States to consider withdrawal from Iraq, no matter how insecure the environment".

Professor Rogers has since May 2005 been studying the situation in Iraq and its impact on other countries, including Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East.

Iraqi President Accepts Iran's Invitation For Weekend Talks (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0096623

BAGHDAD — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad invited his Iraqi and Syrian counterparts to a weekend summit in Tehran to tackle the chaos in Iraq, Iraqi lawmakers said Monday.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's spokesman Kamaran Qaradaghi said in a statement late Monday that the Tehran meeting will include Talabani and Ahmadinejad. He said Syrian President Bashar Assad would not attend, but that Talabani had accepted an invitation to meet with Assad in Damascus. No date was set.

A close parliamentary associate of Talabani told the Associated Press that the summit represents an attempt by Tehran to strengthen its position in the region and prevent the United States from dividing Syria, a predominantly Sunni Arab country, from its ally of convenience, Shiite Iran. The associate spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with the media.

The State Department reacted with skepticism about Iran's intentions in Iraq, but said it was up to Iraq. "It's their call," spokesman Tom Casey said in Washington.

"We have seen statements like this many times," and there have been several high-level contacts between Iran and Iraq, Casey said. But Iran's statements of a desire to reduce violence in Iraq "have not been backed up by facts," he said.

The diplomatic gambit coincided with a groundbreaking visit to Baghdad by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, who was challenged over Damascus' role in supporting the Sunni insurgency.

"We object to any neighboring country that allows itself to be a base or a transit point for the terrorist groups that harm Iraq," Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said after meeting with Moallem.

The Iraqi government said diplomatic relations between the two countries, severed nearly 25 years ago, will be restored by today.

In the latest violence, Iraqi Minister of State Mohammed Abbas Auraibi, a member of Iraq's Shiite majority, said a roadside bomb hit his convoy as it was driving on a highway in eastern Baghdad, wounding two of his bodyguards.

Hakim al-Zamily, a Shiite deputy health minister, also escaped unhurt when gunmen fired on his convoy in Baghdad. Al-Zamily said two of his guards were killed.

The attacks came one day after suspected Sunni Muslim insurgents kidnapped Ammar al-Saffar, a Shiite deputy health minister, from his home in northern Baghdad.

Al-Saffar was snatched nearly a week after dozens of suspected Shiite militia gunmen in police uniforms kidnapped scores of people from a Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad. That ministry is predominantly Sunni.

For the second time in two days, coalition forces raided Baghdad's Sadr City Shiite stronghold, headquarters of a militia suspected of having carried out the mass kidnapping. No captives were found.

British and Iraqi forces also raided homes in southern Iraq and arrested four suspects in the kidnapping of four American security guards and their Austrian co-worker. No hostages were found.

Syria And Iraq Restore Ties Severed In The Hussein Era (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 20 — Iraq re-established diplomatic relations with Syria on Monday, agreeing to restore an embassy in Baghdad after more than 20 years with no formal avenues of communication.

The step came on the second day of a two-day visit by Syria's foreign minister, Walid al-Moallem, who met with the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, in the international Green Zone here.

As the United States undertakes a broad review of its role in Iraq, the neighboring countries of Iran, Turkey and Syria have stepped forward to try to position themselves in case of a major change in policy, leading to a recent flurry of diplomatic efforts. The countries are also concerned about the possibility of a political collapse as the Iraqi government sinks into paralysis with its two main sects stuck in a deadlock.

A government spokesman said President Jalal Talabani would travel to Iran for meetings with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad over the weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0096624

Syria cut off relations with Saddam Hussein's government in 1982 after siding with Iran in that country's war with Iraq. The break was complete: Iraqis could not travel to Syria, nor call on the phone. The countries re-established trade relations in 1997, and Iraqis could visit.

Now tens of thousands of Iraqis seeking to escape the violence that has consumed their country have fled into Syria, creating their own schools, neighborhoods and communities there.

Violence continued to claim Iraqi lives at a rapid pace. The authorities said 90 Iraqis were killed across Iraq on Monday, including 60 who were found dead in and around Baghdad. An elderly priest visiting a church in Naariya, an area in southern Baghdad, was kidnapped, a police official in the area said.

Among the dead was the host of a popular comedy show, Walid Hassan Jiaaz, who poked fun at post-invasion Iraqi life. He was shot dead by gunmen in western Baghdad. A deputy health minister, Hakim al-Zameli, a supporter of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, escaped assassination when his convoy came under attack; two of his guards were killed.

A week after the mass kidnapping of employees at the Ministry of Higher Education compound in Baghdad, the fate of those still missing remain unclear. Interior Minister Jawad Bolani said the kidnapping had not been motivated by sectarian hatred, but gave no details on what might have been the reason for the act. He said a preliminary investigation showed that the kidnappers might have had help from someone inside the ministry.

During their meeting on Monday, Mr. Maliki used stern words in urging Mr. Moallem to take more serious steps in preventing Sunni militants from crossing into Iraq from Syria, the prime minister's office said.

"We want to set a kind of relation with them to protect our people from the violence that was coming from them," said a Shiite politician who had been involved in the talks. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief spokesman for the American military command here, said Syrians made up about 20 percent of the 670 foreign fighters in custody in Iraq.

The United States withdrew its ambassador from Damascus in February 2005 after the assassination in Beirut of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister. But as the Bush administration considers policy alternatives in Iraq, allies like Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain are encouraging it to reopen dialogue with Syria and Iran.

In some ways it has already started. Mr. Moallem met with former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who is co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, in a hotel in New York in September and discussed what role Syria could play in helping to stabilize Iraq, said the Syrian ambassador to the United States, Imad Moustapha.

Although the United States and Iran have been at odds over Tehran's nuclear program, Bush administration officials have signaled that they would be willing to discuss Iraqi issues. Last week in testimony before Congress, David Satterfield, the State Department's coordinator of Iraq policy, said that with respect to Iran, "we are prepared, in principle, to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq."

He added, "The timing of such a direct dialogue is one we still have under review."

At a news conference with one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political leaders, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, Mr. Moallem said relations between Iraq and Syria were still strained.

"I didn't come to Baghdad to satisfy the United States," he said. "I'm not a mediator for the United States in the region."

Iraq To Restore Long-Severed Relations With Neighbor Syria (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 20 -- Iraq said Monday that it would restore diplomatic ties with neighboring Syria after a break of nearly a quarter-century in an effort to solidify links with a neighbor seen as a conduit for insurgents fueling the violence in Iraq.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki made the announcement after a historic meeting with Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Muallem, who pledged his country's help in quelling the sectarian violence that threatens to propel Iraq into civil war. Maliki, for his part, pressed Syria to step up efforts to keep Sunni Arab fighters from crossing into Iraq to join the insurgency.

"We refuse to let any regional neighbor countries become a passage or a headquarters for the terrorist organizations that hurt Iraq," he said in a statement after the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0096625

Syria and Iran, another neighbor, have offered to help bring stability to Iraq's fractured government, but the Bush administration has long-standing concerns about Iran's support for Shiite Muslim militias and Syria's failure to stop foreign fighters from joining the Iraqi insurgency.

The administration is under intense pressure to put aside those concerns and engage in talks with the two countries, even though it considers them adversaries. The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is expected to recommend in an upcoming report that the United States start such a dialogue.

On Monday, reports surfaced of a possible weekend summit in Tehran involving the Iraqi and Syrian presidents, but U.S. and Iraqi officials quickly denied that any high-level three-way meeting would take place.

In Baghdad, a U.S. Embassy spokesman said Iraqi President Jalal Talabani had no intention of attending a meeting with both Iran and Syria. Maliki's close aide Hasan Suneid said Talabani had accepted an invitation from the Iranian government to visit Tehran, but he did not specify when that would take place. "Iran has a great wish to hold a peace summit with Syria and Iraq, but still it is just a thought," Suneid said, "and if it happened, we should study it very well."

The Associated Press reported Monday night that Talabani would meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad this weekend but that Syrian President Bashar al-Assad would not attend.

State Department acting spokesman Tom Casey in Washington said that the administration welcomes "discussion and dialogue" among Baghdad, Tehran and Damascus because it wants Iraq to have strong relations with all its neighbors. But he also expressed doubts. "The problem is not what they say, but what they do," Casey said.

He added that "it's up to the Iraqi government to make the decision as to whether this is something useful for them or whether they would attend."

Muallem is the highest-level Syrian official to visit Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. His visit marked a major step toward restoring ties between the two countries, which have been at odds since the 1980s, when Syria backed Iran in its war against Iraq.

But Syria's oversight of its borders has become a major point of contention. Muallem denied that Syria has allowed foreign Islamic fighters to infiltrate Iraq but also said that sealing the long, porous border is an impossible task.

At a briefing in Baghdad, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman, said that so far this year Iraqi security and coalition forces have killed more than 425 foreign fighters in Iraq and captured about 670. Of those detained, he said, more than 20 percent came from Syria.

Caldwell said the U.S. government is not accusing Syria of aiding the fighters, but added, "We don't know how much they have tried to preclude it from happening, though, either." Caldwell also responded to Muallem's comment this past weekend that if the United States were to establish a timetable for withdrawing troops, the violence in Iraq would decrease. He said Iraqi officials continue to ask for military help.

"There's that acknowledgment that there is a need right now in their minds for additional security, and that the coalition forces can help provide for them as they develop their forces or capabilities and exert their influence," he said.

The political developments came as violence continued to flare across the country.

A deputy health minister, Hakim al-Zamily, escaped an assassination attempt in Baghdad that killed two of his bodyguards. He was the fourth high-level government official, and the second deputy health minister, to be targeted by kidnappers or killers in recent days.

"I think the terrorists are trying to show that the situation in Iraq is unbearable and it cannot be solved by the government," said Ali Adib, a Shiite lawmaker. "They would like to show the Democrats that they control the situation and not the government."

In Kirkuk, a police captain said unknown gunmen had attacked a restaurant frequented by policemen and civilians, killing the restaurant's owner and another employee.

Unknown gunmen killed a Babylon University medical school professor as he and his driver traveled from Hilla to Baghdad. Iraqi army and police forces found 19 corpses in Latifiyah, south of Baghdad. The U.S. military also announced that a Marine was killed in action Sunday in Anbar province.

DOJ_NMG_0096626

Iraqi government officials continued their investigation of a mass kidnapping at a Ministry of Higher Education building last week. Speaking at a news conference, Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani said investigators are trying to determine whether the kidnappers were aided by people within the ministry. He also ruled out sectarianism as a motive because the victims came from different backgrounds.

Officials continued to contradict each other about the number of people who were kidnapped. The higher education minister said as many as 150 people were taken, while a government spokesman put the number at about 60.

Staff writer Robin Wright in Washington, special correspondents Naseer Mehdawi and Saad al-Izzi in Baghdad and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Iraq President To Hold Talks With Iran (FT)

By Steve Negus, Gareth Smyth And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani will travel to Iran this weekend for talks with his Iranian counterpart Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, but his spokesman denied reports that a three-way summit including Syria's Bashar al-Assad was planned.

British government sources and news agencies had said yesterday that Iran was keen to host three-way talks, but Iraqi sources said there were no plans for such a meeting.

"President Jalal Talabani has plans to go to Tehran this weekend to meet with President Ahmedinijad. There is no talk of a trilateral summit," said presidential spokesman Hiwa Osman.

"President Talabani looks forward to meeting President al-Assad in Baghdad or Damascus in the near future," he said. US officials are reportedly planning an initiative to bring Syria and Iran into a broader regional effort aimed at curbing the violence in Iraq.

US and Iraqi officials have blamed Damascus and Tehran for fomenting disorder in Iraq. Iran has extensive influence with Shia parties in Iraq, reportedly subsidising groups such as the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq as well as breakaway factions of the Mahdi Army loyal to radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Tehran is also accused of supplying some of its clients with sophisticated weaponry and military expertise.

According to some analysts, Iran is trying to ensure that it has the capacity to cause severe problems for US forces in Iraq as a possible deterrent to US-led military efforts against its own territory.

International and domestic pressure is mounting on the Bush administration to open its own dialogue with Syria and Iran to find a common approach to restoring stability in Iraq.

Tom Casey, a spokesman for the US State Department, said there were no plans at present for direct contacts in Baghdad between the US and Iranian ambassadors.

Washington analysts say that while the US position in Iraq is weakening, Iran is asserting its influence. A trilateral summit, should it happen, could strengthen Iran's hand in shaping the agenda for eventual talks with the Bush administration.

Iraqi leaders frequently visit Tehran, but most of these are heads of specifically Shia religious parties with a tight bilateral relationship to Iran, and a wider summit specifically intended to discuss the promotion of stability in Iraq would be a diplomatic breakthrough.

Iraq Considers Three-way Talks With Iran And Syria (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi leaders said Monday that they were seriously considering three-way talks with Iran and Syria, responding to an overture from Iran's president that raised new questions about the level of American influence here.

The talks would focus on how the two neighboring countries could help quell rising sectarian bloodshed in Iraq, according to Iraqi officials familiar with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's offer.

The invitation to a summit is a further assertion of Iran's influence in Iraq, and it comes at a time when the U.S. government is sharply divided over whether to make an appeal of its own to Iran and Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0096627

Influential figures in Washington have urged the Bush administration to talk to both countries in hopes of gaining their help to bring the violence in Iraq under control. But many of President Bush's advisors oppose the idea.

White House policy has been to isolate Iran to compel the government to abandon its nuclear enrichment program and to refuse to talk with Syria until it drops its support for what the United States considers terrorist groups.

As the debate continues in Washington, Iran has stepped forward.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani plans to travel to Tehran on Sunday to meet with Ahmadinejad to try to iron out details of a possible three-way meeting, which would include Syrian President Bashar Assad, senior Iraqi officials said Monday. The move came as Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem met in Baghdad and announced an agreement to reopen diplomatic relations, which were broken off in 1982.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey sought to play down the significance of a possible three-way summit, contending that previous statements by Iranian and Syrian leaders had not proved productive.

"What we'd like to see the Iranian government do is desist, first and foremost, from negative actions it's taken in Iraq," Casey said. "As we have always said with respect to the Syrians, you know, the problem is not what they say, the problem is what they do."

Syria has served as an entry point and refuge for Sunni Arab Muslim insurgents who have carried out a steady stream of attacks on U.S. forces and the fledgling Iraqi government since the American-led invasion in 2003.

Iran, a Shiite Muslim nation, has significant influence over the Shiite militias that have increasingly attacked Iraq's minority Sunnis.

Along with the debate over Iran and Syria, officials in Washington have been jousting over whether the U.S. should begin withdrawing troops from Iraq.

On Monday, Bush, speaking to reporters in Bogor, Indonesia, said he had made no decision about troop levels in Iraq and that he was waiting to hear from the Pentagon.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a probable 2008 GOP presidential candidate, has called for boosting the force beyond the 140,000 or so troops now in Iraq. Others want to establish a timetable to withdraw troops or to focus on the training of Iraqi security forces.

"I say go Iraqi," said Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), the outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. "It doesn't make sense to plan American deployments before you utilize all the Iraqi forces."

Senior Iraqi officials say Ahmadinejad's summit proposal was the impetus behind the meetings between Iraqi leaders and Syria's foreign minister, the highest-level talks between the two Arab neighbors since the U.S.-led invasion.

Ahmadinejad first proposed three-way negotiations last year but was refused by then-Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari. Jafari and his advisors feared the United States would oppose giving Iran an intermediary role in Iraq and doubted Syria's intentions, sources said Monday.

"We said we had issues with Syria and felt that Iran could not be a mediator," said a high-ranking Iraqi official with knowledge of the discussions. "At the time, we said that the Syrians know what our expectations are and they needed to make the first move, which they have done by sending their foreign minister to listen to our grievances for their involvement in supporting what we consider terrorism."

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the Iranian proposal with the media, said Ahmadinejad had contacted Maliki last month to renew his invitation with a suggestion that he visit Iran on Nov. 5 — at the same time the Syrian president had scheduled a visit.

Iraqi leaders decided to delay negotiations until after the U.S. elections two days later in order to not affect the outcome, the official said.

The senior Iraqi official's account was confirmed by another high-ranking politician with knowledge of Iraq's foreign affairs.

Iran extended a third invitation to Iraq's political leadership Nov. 10, said Haider Abaidi, a prominent Iraqi legislator with close ties to Maliki.

DOJ_NMG_0096628

"They suggested that the three countries should sit together to discuss the security situation in Iraq because both countries are interfering with Iraq's affairs," Abaidi said. "Both were denying this for a long time, but this time the Iranians went a step further and said: 'Why don't we talk everything over together? All three of us.' "

Ali Dabbagh, an Iraqi government spokesman, said Talabani's scheduled visit to Iran would capitalize on the momentum gained from the debate in the United States about opening a dialogue with Syria and Iran.

Abaidi said Iraq's main factions, the Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, had discussed Iran's plan and had agreed, in principle, that it was worthwhile.

Three-way talks could boost Iran's regional sway and could also put the Bush administration in the awkward position of having to acknowledge the influence of a nation it once called a member of the "axis of evil" and a sponsor of terrorism.

"I think Iran wants to make sure that everyone understands that it holds a lot of the cards in Iraq, just as it did in Lebanon and Afghanistan," said Vali Nasr, author of "The Shia Revival" and an adjunct senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.

"Iran is saying that Iran and Syria are two of the most important actors in Iraq, and if you want a solution in Iraq, or anywhere in the Middle East, you have to talk to them. It's a regional game they're playing, and they will not allow themselves to be left out."

David Aaron, director of the Rand Corp.'s Center for Middle East Public Policy, said Iran and Syria could demand a high price for their cooperation.

Syria may ask the Bush administration to drop its support for a United Nations investigation into Syria's alleged involvement in the slaying of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in 2005.

And Iran may push the United States to abandon its opposition to its nuclear enrichment program.

But Nasr and Aaron contended that the initiative by Iran and Syria might also stem from broader national interests.

"All of the neighbors have a stake in this country not blowing apart or having a major civil war, because they will all get dragged into it," Aaron said.

Iraq, Iran And Syria Set For 3-way Talks (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani yesterday agreed to travel to Tehran this weekend for an unprecedented three-way summit with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Syrian leader Bashar Assad to deal with Iraq's raging insurgency.

The Bush administration repeatedly has refused to deal directly with the Iranian and Syrian leaders, and the meeting this weekend could be a move by Tehran and Damascus to pre-empt an expected shift in U.S. policy to find a regional solution to Iraq's woes.

Key Iraqi lawmakers yesterday confirmed reports swirling in the Arab-language press of the three-way summit, according to the Associated Press. Iran's invitation came as Syria and Iraq announced the restoration of formal diplomatic ties after a break of 24 years, capping an unexpectedly warm visit by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moualem to Baghdad this week.

"All three countries intend to hold a three-way summit to discuss the security situation and the repercussions for stability of the region," Iraqi lawmaker Ali al-Adeeb, a close aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, told reporters in Baghdad.

Said Mr. al-Moualem, "The stability of Iraq is a very important part of the stability of Syria."

The United States has accused both Syria and Iran of backing groups trying to undermine Iraq's fledgling democratic government, citing in particular Tehran's ties to Shi'ite militias not under the control of Iraq's central government.

But there has been intense speculation about a change of course in Washington since the midterm elections and about the pending report from an independent panel looking into U.S. alternatives in Iraq.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a longtime adviser to the Bush family and head of the commission, met with Mr. al-Moualem for extensive talks in September. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, President Bush's closest ally in the Iraq war, also has lobbied for direct contacts with Syria and Iran.

The State Department said yesterday the United States did not feel "snubbed" in being excluded from the Tehran gathering, and that it was up to Iraq to determine its relations with its neighbors.

DOJ_NMG_0096629

"If [the Iraqis] believe this is a positive opportunity for them, then they are more than welcome to go ahead," said spokesman Tom Casey. "They don't need our invitation or approval to do so."

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, briefing reporters in Iraq, said that between 70 and 100 foreign fighters are still crossing each month along the lengthy Syrian border.

Arab-language press accounts in recent days reported details of a far more extensive accord that could be on the table in Tehran.

Citing Iraqi government sources, the Baghdad newspaper Azzaman over the weekend reported that Mr. al-Moualem's visit was meant in part to discuss a "partnership" among Iraq, Iran and Syria and a series of coordinated steps to stabilize the security situation inside Iraq.

Under the accord, Iraq would repeal the law barring members of Saddam Hussein's Ba'ath Party -- who had close ties with their Syrian counterparts -- from government posts and would move to expel fighters from the anti-Iranian Mojahedin Khalq still based inside Iraq.

Both Syria and Iran would move to tighten their own borders against foreign fighters infiltrating into Iraq, and Iran would "deal with" al Qaeda figures inside its borders with suspected ties to terrorists in Iraq.

The announcement of the Tehran meeting came as at least four dozen Iraqis and a U.S. soldier and U.S. Marine were killed in sectarian and insurgent attacks.

Among the dead was Walid Hassan, one of Iraq's most popular comedians, whose weekly satirical television show "Caricature" mocked Iraqis, U.S. forces and anti-government groups alike. Mr. Hassan was shot by gunmen while driving in western Baghdad.

At least 47 American troops have been killed in Iraq since the beginning of the month.

•This article is based in part on wire-service reports.

U.S. Should Lead Iraq Summit (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 21, 2006

IRAN HAS INVITED TOP Iraqi and Syrian leaders to Tehran this weekend, but there are no Americans on the guest list. The omission is hardly a snub — U.S. diplomats probably wouldn't have much fun there anyway — but the talks underline the absurdity of the White House position, which is essentially to wait for a bipartisan commission to give it permission to sit down with some friends and enemies. Regional discussions about the future of Iraq are already happening. The U.S. should send out some invitations of its own.

In some respects, this weekend's talks about ways of curbing the violence in Iraq are unremarkable. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki visited Tehran in September, and the Syrians are frequent callers. The impending reestablishment of diplomatic relations between Iraq and Syria after a quarter of a century cements a growing bond.

The U.S. has reacted to the meeting with a kind of skeptical nonchalance (or vice versa). This reaction is understandable, but the overriding fact is that the situation in Iraq is untenable — to the U.S., its allies and its enemies.

Under such circumstances, it makes no sense to wait until January for former Secretary of State James A. Baker III to suggest that the U.S. open talks with Iran and Syria. Nor is it smart to commission national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley to write an alternative report that appears likely to be based on the self-justifying views of the very administration insiders who are responsible for the situation in Iraq.

The U.S., supporting the Maliki government, may or may not be able to broker a peace settlement between the warring Sunni and Shiite factions in Iraq. But it has a duty to the Iraqi people to keep the neighbors from rushing in to carve up their country.

U.S. officials say that Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, is authorized to talk to Iran, but only on the topic of ending violence in Iraq. They also say that Iran and Syria should show their concern for Iraq not through rhetoric but with action — such as cutting off their support for Iraqi militias and preventing terrorists from crossing their borders.

DOJ_NMG_0096630

This is all true enough. But it also ignores the U.S.' responsibility for Iraq. One of the administration's goals in the war was to recalibrate the balance of power in the Middle East. In this it has succeeded spectacularly — but the new order may be even less to its liking.

President Bush need not wait for the release of a commission report to convene a conference and invite all of the key players in Iraq's future: Iraq, Iran, Syria, Turkey, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, as well as representatives of the Gulf Coordination Council, the European Union and the U.N. Agreeing on a mutual duty to respect and uphold Iraq's territorial integrity would be the first goal.

If the United States fails to act, diplomacy delayed may become diplomacy derailed.

Next Move In Iraq? (USAT)

By Wesley Clark

USA Today, November 21, 2006

The mission in Iraq is spiraling into failure. American voters have sent a clear message: Bring our troops home, but don't lose. That's a tall order both for resurgent Democrats, some of whom are calling for a quick withdrawal, and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is presumably crafting new options.

Instead of cutting and running or staying the course, it is time for us to begin to redeploy. But how can we do this and improve our prospects for success?

First, we have to think past Iraq and above partisan politics, folding actions in Iraq into a strategy to protect broader U.S. interests throughout the region.

Neither the Bush administration's latest pronouncements nor the current political dialogue has adequately engaged these vital interests. The calamity in Iraq has hogtied the Bush administration, inviting disarray, if not instability, in neighboring countries that also require our attention.

U.S. interests include dissuading Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons and its hegemonic aspirations, providing security assurances for the rapidly developing Arab Gulf states and working with our friends in the Middle East to ensure access to oil resources and regional stability.

What about a timetable for U.S. troop withdrawals? Today, setting a rigid, Washington-driven timetable is an option, but a bad one. A precipitous troop reduction could have far-reaching effects: emboldening Iran, weakening U.S. security promises to friendly states, and even sparking military initiatives by other powers — Turkey or Iran — to deal with the resulting security vacuum. Our weakened position in Iraq also could undercut our leverage in the Israeli-Palestinian dispute.

What about imposing a tripartite division of Iraq? That would merely feed ethnic cleansing and likely lead to a wider, more intense conflict.

The right approach is a coordinated diplomatic, legal, economic and security campaign drawing upon broader dialogue in the region and intensified political work inside Iraq.

Here is how to do this:

•Establish an effective, sustained shuttle diplomacy within the region.

•Form a high-level interagency diplomatic team, representing the White House and secretaries of State and Defense and led by an experienced, respected diplomat.

•Begin talks within Iraq, and with all its neighbors, based on a clear set of principles outlined by the team. The goal would be to seek the commitments necessary to achieve our aims inside Iraq and also advance U.S. interests in the region.

These principles could include: Iraq would remain whole; oil revenue would go to the Iraqi people based on a formula they determine; the rights and security of individuals must be protected; the United States would have no permanent bases in Iraq; the covert flow of military arms and equipment into Iraq would be halted; and the security needs of all states would be respected.

A permanent Gulf regional security dialogue could emerge that includes Syria and Iran, and the United States could undertake a role as regional security guarantor. Preliminary discussions should lead to a more intensive dialogue with Iran in which security assurances and nuclear programs are discussed.

In terms of diplomacy, our team would engage each state and party, solicit its views and challenge it to participate in moving forward, just as U.S. diplomat Richard Holbrooke did in the Balkans a decade ago. Next steps might include confidence-building measures, hosted discussions between factions, and perhaps one or more larger meetings to conclude firm commitments, timetables or sequence of events.

DOJ_NMG_0096631

Of course there are no guarantees, but from such a dialogue should emerge a prescription for U.S. troop levels and activities consistent with our larger interests. Carrots and sticks could be employed. For instance, the factions could vow certain actions in return for U.S. assistance or troop deployments, or redeployments, and possible assistance from neighboring states.

Reaching an understanding on Iraq need not be a lengthy process, but the dialogue must be broadened in scope and participation to be effective. The aim would be a consensual solution underwritten by outside guarantors, not an imposed solution. And finally, military power would have a subordinated and supporting role.

Simultaneously, the United States would set about transforming its applied military power in Iraq into the useful diplomatic influence essential to addressing broader security concerns.

Ultimately, security in the Gulf and winning against al-Qaeda will require that we work with regional powers, promote stability and gradual transformation, and regain “strategic consent” for long-term U.S. assistance in the region. We must use the situation in Iraq to propel us toward this larger goal, and in doing so, we will also find the right way to wind down our deployment there.

The outline of what needs to be done is clear. But does the administration have the courage and foresight to do it, or will it continue to march into profound failure?

Retired general Wesley Clark, former Supreme Commander of NATO, is a senior fellow at UCLA's Burkle Center for International Relations.

Syria Lends A Hand (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Walid al-Moallem is a man lately in the news. On Sunday, the Syrian foreign minister paid a visit to Baghdad to pledge his cooperation with the Iraqi government and urge a timetable for American withdrawal. On Friday, the New York Times reported that Mr. Moallem had met in New York with James Baker's Iraq Study Group to explain why it is in Syria's "national interest to try to help stabilize the situation in Iraq." Earlier in the month, Mr. Moallem promised that Israel would "find Syria ready to resume peace negotiations."

Who is Walid Moallem? And, what's more to the point, would the U.S. be wise to "engage" him and his government in the cause of Mideast peace, as everyone from Mr. Baker to Tony Blair and Henry Kissinger is now urging?

In his memoir, former Mideast negotiator Dennis Ross describes Mr. Moallem as "a man of intellect and humor." But the Baathist apparatchik is shown in a different light in last year's Mehlis Report, which details the preliminary findings of the U.N. investigation into the Feb. 14, 2005, assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and 22 others. According to the report, Mr. Moallem met with Hariri two weeks prior to his assassination. An excerpt of their conversation:

Hariri: "I cannot live under a security regime that is specialized in interfering with Hariri and spreading disinformation about Hariri and writing reports to [Syrian President] Bashar Assad. . . . Lebanon will never be ruled from Syria. This will no longer happen."

Moallem: "We and the [security] services here have put you into a corner. Please do not take things lightly."

The exchange was secretly taped. The Mehlis Report notes that "the recorded interview clearly contradicts Mr. Al-Moallem's witness interview of 20 September 2005 in which he falsely described the 1 February meeting as 'friendly and constructive' and avoided giving direct answers to the questions put to him."

Mr. Moallem would thus seem to be guilty of obstructing an ongoing criminal investigation, if not actually of conspiracy to murder. But leave these sticky details aside and consider the case for engaging the Syrians diplomatically.

At a simplistic level, the argument is: Where's the harm in talking? Oddly, the people who say this about Syria rarely make it in connection to, say, al Qaeda.

A more sophisticated view is that the administration is anyway not seriously interested in overthrowing Mr. Assad -- the Muslim Brotherhood might well end up taking over -- so it will need carrots as well as sticks to improve his behavior. The largest of those carrots, supposedly, is a promise not to seek regime change; another is to abandon the cause of a truly independent Lebanon; a third is to lean on Israel to abandon the Golan Heights in return for a peace treaty. In exchange, it is hoped, Damascus will start playing a constructive role in Lebanon, abandon its support for terrorist groups in Iraq and Palestine, and begin to step away from its alliance with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0096632

That's a nice scenario, assuming it's plausible. But note the contradictions. How can the U.S. use the threat of regime change to improve Syrian behavior if in the very act of engagement it demonstrates that it has no interest in regime change? And why should Syria quit making mischief among its neighbors if it is that very mischief that brings America to the table?

In other words, for either side to gain ground they have to abandon the very things that got them ground. The State Department might just be "creative" enough to do that, but the Assad family has long understood that the only leverage they exercise is negative leverage. That's why the current Syrian president's father, Hafez Assad, refused the return of the Golan Heights when it was offered to him in 2000, and why Bashar Assad once said that "it is inconceivable that Israel will become a legitimate state even if the peace process is implemented." (Emphasis added.)

One also must wonder why Damascus has chosen this moment to go on its charm offensive, when it is riding high on America's stalemate in Iraq and Hezbollah's victory over Israel. In the past, the Syrians have made concrete concessions only under the most severe pressure: first in 1998, when Turkey threatened to invade if Syria did not expel Kurdish terrorist leader Abdullah Ocalan; then in 2005, when the U.S. and France united to demand the Syrian army's withdrawal from Lebanon.

One view is that Mr. Assad, after giving both material and verbal encouragement to the Iraqi "resistance," has concluded that Iraq's chaos could spread to Damascus. Maybe. But exiled Syrian dissident Ammar Abdulhamid has another take. "The neocon/neorealist dichotomy has given hope to the Syrian regime that it can outwait Bush," he says. "The regime is in jubilant mode right now, and the Iraq Study Group is going to deliver another boost to it."

In this reading, Mr. Assad's strategy is to ingratiate himself just enough with the West to take the option of regime change permanently off the table. In the meantime, he continues to funnel arms to Hezbollah while counting on the Shiite group to block the Hariri probe from ever going to trial. As for Iraq, having done his bit to bleed U.S. troops for three years, Mr. Assad has concluded it's time to usher us out the Mideast door. Funny the overture should come right after the U.S. midterms.

In the summer of 2005, a senior administration official smugly noted that the Syrian regime was sinking on its own weight, as if on quicksand. Now the countries have traded places, and some would urge the administration to grasp the offered hand of the likes of Mr. Moallem. They should consider what that hand has done, and whether it will pull us up -- or sink us.

Don't Trade Iran For Iraq (HILL)

The Hill, November 21, 2006

A consensus seems to be developing that only a "regional solution" embracing Iran and Syria can extract the United States from Iraq without jeopardy to those who have stood with us and without damage to both our reputation and Bush's place in history.

But at what price? Nobody seems willing to say what "engagement" with Iran for a regional solution would entail. We cannot ask Iran's help while we bomb its nuclear reactors or impose tough sanctions on the country.

The price of Iranian cooperation will be complicity in Tehran's nuclear ambitions. Iran will gladly assure Bush it does not intend to develop an atomic weapon. But we shouldn't believe it.

By quitting Iraq with Iranian help, we let a regime get atomic weapons that has promised to wipe Israel off the map. By going hat in hand to Iran, we sacrifice Israel.

Israel will have only one course — to bomb Iran in hope of delaying its acquisition of nuclear weapons. Israel's nuclear deterrent will be of little use. Israel could easily be wiped out by a few dozen nuclear explosions, while Iran, widely dispersed demographically, would likely survive an Israeli attack with half or more of its population alive. Israel cannot bet that Iran's good sense or the Israeli deterrent will stop Tehran from using nuclear weapons. It will be forced to strike now.

An Israeli strike would produce waves of nationalist sentiment in Iran and inflame Arab hatred of the Jewish state. It is precisely what we don't need now in the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0096633

Nor would an Israeli attack necessarily stop Iran getting nukes. If Iran gets the bomb, Tehran will not only wipe out Israel, but will cow non-nuclear neighbors and gain control over the Gulf.

What should the U.S. do?

We need to organize a Buyers Club, a kind of reverse OPEC to shun Iranian oil until Tehran dismantles its nuclear effort. Iran sells 2.7 million barrels of crude each day. That is a relatively small share of the 90 million barrels of daily world output. Merrill Lynch predicts that world oil production will rise by 2.6 million barrels a day in 2007 (1.1 million from OPEC countries and 1.5 million from the rest of the world). Its two-year phase-out of reliance on Iranian oil is feasible.

Japan, Iran's biggest customer, trimmed its purchases of Iranian oil by 15 percent in March. The Buyers Club would have to help importers to make sure shortages don't develop in any one country. (The U.S. does not buy any Iranian oil.) Prices will rise somewhat, but this is a small price to pay to avoid a nuclear war.

And about Iraq? An Iranian bomb is no way to save face! We need to pull out of Iraq and understand that we have lost the war there. We are unable to fight for a nation unwilling to fight for itself. We must accept the loss of face, do our best to stabilize the nation, help it stand on its feet for another year or so, and then pull out.

But we must be sure not to accept the siren song, reportedly being pedaled by former Secretary of State James Baker, that we can have a regional solution by getting our two old friends, Iran and Syria, into the act. That way lies disaster!

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race." To get Dick Morris's columns e-mailed to you for free, please send him your e-mail address. His e-mail is dickmorris2006@aol.com

An Iraqi Solution, Vietnam Style (NYT)

By Mark Moyar

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

Quantico, Va.

IRAQ'S prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, is now saying that he wants the United States to stand back and let him use Iraqi forces to restore order. Within six months, he asserts, the bloodletting will cease. The United States must give this proposal very serious consideration. Critics of America's current Iraq policy, particularly among the Congressional Democrats, have tended to concentrate on international diplomatic remedies. Experience, however, suggest that only the Iraqis themselves can end the chaos and violence.

The United States faced a very similar crisis a half-century ago. In 1955, the pro-American government of Ngo Dinh Diem sought to disband militias that belonged to religious sects, analogous to the Shiite militias in Iraq today. A self-interested faction controlled the South Vietnamese police, much as self-interested Shiites dominate the Iraqi police. In Vietnam as in Iraq, the only strong force not beholden to the sects was the army, and the army's leadership was not entirely loyal to the national government.

When the South Vietnamese sects defied the authority of the Saigon government in the spring of 1955, the American special ambassador, Gen. J. Lawton Collins, urged Diem to compromise with them. Efforts to suppress the sects by force, Collins warned, would alienate the Vietnamese people, unhinge the army and lead to disastrous civil warfare. This advice was based on the mistaken premise that political solutions suitable in the United States would likewise be suitable in any other country.

Diem rejected Collins's advice, and with good reason. In South Vietnam, as in other historically authoritarian countries, if the government failed to maintain a monopoly on power, it would lose prestige among its supporters and enemies. Only a strong national government could prevent the sects and other factions from tearing the country apart. While Diem was able to gain the submission of some groups by persuasion, others remained defiant.

In April 1955, fighting broke out between the South Vietnamese National Army and one of the militias. Diem sought to capitalize on the fighting to destroy the militia, which caused Collins to advocate Diem's removal. Other Americans predicted chaos and wanted to abandon South Vietnam altogether.

DOJ_NMG_0096634

President Dwight Eisenhower, however, decided that Diem should be allowed to use the army against the militias. In Eisenhower's view, a leader who had the smarts and the strength to prevail on his own — even if it meant he discarded American advice — would be a better and more powerful ally than one who survived by doing whatever the United States recommended.

Through political acumen and force of personality, Diem gained the full cooperation of the National Army and used it to subdue the sects. Simultaneously, he seized control of the police by replacing its leaders with nationalists loyal to him. In a culture that respected the strong man for vanquishing his enemies, Diem's suppression of the militias gained him many new followers.

Diem went on to become a highly effective national war leader. When, in August 1963, he suppressed challenges to his authority from another religious group, he again experienced an upsurge in prestige. Some American officials and journalists, however, denounced him for what they mistakenly saw as counterproductive heavy-handedness, and the officials prodded South Vietnamese generals into overthrowing him.

The South Vietnamese government rapidly deteriorated after the coup, in which Diem was assassinated. The new leaders were inept and tolerated strident opposition groups in order to satisfy the Americans. Violence proliferated among religious groups, and Viet Cong subversion accelerated.

South Vietnam's history recommends the pursuit of two objectives that American officials are now urging upon Prime Minister Maliki: subduing the Shiite militias and transferring control of the police from Shiite partisans to Iraqi nationalists.

In Iraq as in Vietnam, the leader best able to end the violence will be one who possesses a very keen understanding of the country's politics and can judge them better than outsiders can. Mr. Maliki has shown that he does not share America's views on how to deal with the militias and the police. Vietnam tells us that we should welcome his willingness to act on his own initiative, rather than being alarmed by it.

Just as Diem established himself because Eisenhower let him participate unhindered in a Darwinian struggle, we should give Mr. Maliki the chance to restore order as he sees fit, provided his government does not try to suppress the insurgency through wholesale violence against Sunni civilians, as some fear it will.

If we pull back our troops temporarily and let Mr. Maliki deal with Iraq's problems using Iraqi forces, we will be able to determine more quickly whether he can save his country as Diem saved his in 1955. We will see whether he has the political skills to cut deals with local leaders, the support of enough security forces to suppress those who won't cut deals, and the determination to prevent the obliteration of the Sunnis.

If he does not have these attributes, it is to be hoped that the Iraqi Parliament, the Council of Representatives, will exercise its constitutional right to remove the prime minister by a vote of no confidence. Perhaps there is a better prime minister out there. It is also possible that nationalists will try to stage a coup and install a more authoritarian, less sectarian government. We may decide to condone a coup if the situation becomes desperate enough. But we would be best advised to avoid orchestrating one as we did so disastrously in 1963.

The United States may ultimately find that no Iraqi leader can neutralize both the insurgents and the militias. The benefits of a self-sufficient Iraqi government are so great, however, that we must give Mr. Maliki the opportunity to try.

Flaws Cited In Effort To Train Iraqi Forces (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

The U.S. military's effort to train Iraqi forces has been rife with problems, from officers being sent in with poor preparation to a lack of basic necessities such as interpreters and office materials, according to internal Army documents.

The shortcomings have plagued a program that is central to the U.S. strategy in Iraq and is growing in importance. A Pentagon effort to rethink policies in Iraq is likely to suggest placing less emphasis on combat and more on training and advising, sources say.

In dozens of official interviews compiled by the Army for its oral history archives, officers who had been involved in training and advising Iraqis bluntly criticized almost every aspect of the effort. Some officers thought that team members were often selected poorly. Others fretted that the soldiers who prepared them had never served in Iraq and lacked understanding of the tasks of training and advising. Many said they felt insufficiently supported by the Army while in Iraq, with intermittent shipments of supplies and interpreters who often did not seem to understand English.

DOJ_NMG_0096635

The Iraqi officers interviewed by an Army team also had complaints; the top one was that they were being advised by officers far junior to them who had never seen combat.

Some of the American officers even faulted their own lack of understanding of the task. "If I had to do it again, I know I'd do it completely different," reported Maj. Mike Sullivan, who advised an Iraqi army battalion in 2004. "I went there with the wrong attitude and I thought I understood Iraq and the history because I had seen PowerPoint slides, but I really didn't."

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. military commander for the Middle East, told Congress last week that he plans to shift increasing numbers of troops from combat roles to training and advisory duties. Insiders familiar with the bipartisan Iraq Study Group say that next month the panel will probably recommend further boosts to the training effort. Pentagon officials are considering whether the number of Iraqi security forces needs to be far larger than the current target of about 325,000, which would require thousands more U.S. trainers.

Most recently, a closely guarded military review being done for the Joint Chiefs of Staff laid out three options for Iraq. It appears to be favoring a version of one option called "Go Long" that would temporarily boost the U.S. troop level -- currently about 140,000 -- but over time would cut combat presence in favor of training and advising. The training effort could take five to 10 years.

Despite its central role in Iraq, the training and advisory program is not well understood outside narrow military circles. Congress has hardly examined it, and training efforts lie outside the purview of the special inspector general on Iraq reconstruction. The Army has done some studies but has not released them. Even basic information, such as how many of the 5,000 U.S. military personnel involved are from the National Guard and Reserves, is unusually difficult to obtain.

But the previously unreported transcripts of interviews conducted by the Army's Combat Studies Institute at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., offer a view into the program, covering a time from shortly after the 2003 invasion until earlier this year.

One of the most common complaints of the Army officers interviewed was that the military did a poor job of preparing them. "You're supposed to be able to shoot, move and communicate," said Lt. Col. Paul Ciesinski, who was an adviser in northern Iraq last year and this year. "Well, when we got to Iraq we could hardly shoot, we could hardly move and we could hardly communicate, because we hadn't been trained on how to do these things." The training was outdated and lackadaisical, he said, adding sarcastically: "They packed 30 days' training into 84 days."

Sullivan, who advised three infantry companies in the Iraqi army, called the U.S. Army's instruction for the mission "very disappointing."

Nor were the officers impressed by some of their peers. Maj. Jeffrey Allen, an active-duty soldier, noted that all other members of his team were from the National Guard, and that his team was supposed to have 10 members but was given only five. He described his team as "weak . . . in particular the brigade team chief."

A separate internal review this year by the military's Center for Army Lessons Learned, based on 152 interviews with soldiers involved in the training and advisory program, found that there was "no standardized guideline" for preparing advisers and that such instruction was needed because "a majority of advisors have little to no previous experience or training."

Lt. Col. Michael Negard, a spokesman for the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq, the headquarters for training, said he has not seen the Lessons Learned report and so does not know whether the training has been improved or standardized since that report was issued.

After arriving in Iraq, advisers said, they often were shocked to find that the interpreters assigned to them were of little use. Ciesinski reported that at his base in western Nineveh province, "They couldn't speak English and we would have to fire them."

Nor were there enough interpreters to go around, said Sullivan. "It was a real juggling act" with interpreters, he said, noting that he would run from the headquarters to a company "to borrow an interpreter, run him over to say something, and then send him back."

But he was better off than Maj. Robert Dixon, who reported that during his tour in 2004, "We had no interpreters at the time."

DOJ_NMG_0096636

The Center for Army Lessons Learned study, whose contents were first reported by the Wall Street Journal, found one unit that learned after 10 frustrating months that its interpreters were "substandard" and had been translating the advisers' instructions so poorly that their Iraqi pupils had difficulty understanding the concepts being taught.

Trainers and advisers also reported major problems with the Army supply chain. "As an adviser, I got the impression that there was an 'us' and 'them' " divide between the advisers and regular U.S. forces, said Maj. Pete Fedak, an adviser near Fallujah in 2004. "In other words, there was an American camp and then, outside, there was a bermed area for the Iraqis, of which we were part."

Replacing basic office materials was one of the toughest problems advisers reported. "Guys would come under fire so they could get computer supplies, paper and things like that," Sullivan said. "It was a surreal experience."

Lt. Col. Paul Yingling, a staff officer with the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment in Iraq in 2005 and 2006 who worked with Iraqi units, came away thinking that the Army fundamentally is not geared to the task of helping the advisory effort.

"The thing the Army institutionally is still struggling to learn is that the most important thing we do in counterinsurgency is building host-nation institutions," he told the interviewers, "yet all our organizations are designed around the least important line of operations: combat operations."

Advisers found that the capabilities of Iraqi forces "ran the gamut from atrocious to excellent," as it was put by Lt. Col. Kevin Farrell, who commanded an armored unit in east Baghdad last year and this year.

Many worried that the Iraqi units being advised contained insurgents. An Iraqi National Guard battalion "was infiltrated by the enemy," said Maj. Michael Monti, a Marine who was an adviser in the Upper Euphrates Valley in 2004 and 2005.

Some advisers reported being personally targeted by infiltrators. "We had insurgents that we detected and arrested in the battalion that were planning an operation against me and my team," Allen said.

But Iraqi officers may have had even more to fear, because their families were also vulnerable. "I went through seven battalion commanders in eight weeks," Allen noted. Dixon reported that in Samarra both his battalion commander and intelligence officer deserted just before a major operation.

Iraqis also had some complaints about their U.S. advisers, most notably that junior U.S. officers who had never seen combat were counseling senior Iraqi officers who had fought in several wars. "Numerous teams have lieutenants . . . to fill the role of advisor to an Iraqi colonel counterpart," the Lessons Learned report stated.

Farrell, the officer in east Baghdad, said some advisers were literally "phoning in" their work. Some would not leave the forward operating base "more than one or two days out of the week -- instead they would just call the Iraqis on cellphones," he said.

Dixon was grim about the experience. "Would I want to go back and do it again?" he asked. His unambiguous answer: "No."

Yingling came to a broader conclusion. He recommended an entirely different orientation in Iraq, both for trainers and for regular U.S. units. "Don't train on finding the enemy," he said. "Train on finding your friends, and they will help you find your enemy. . . . Once you find your friends, finding the enemy is easy."

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Force Multiplier (WSJ)

By Hans Binnendijk And Bing West

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

The reassessment of U.S. strategy in Iraq should radically alter the combat mission of the American troops serving there. The key policy change is to embed five times as many U.S. combat advisers into Iraqi battalions. This will, on the one hand, reduce the size and casualties of U.S. forces, and on the other, strengthen the Iraqi army -- the only institution that can stop the creeping civil war. A war of that order will eventually degenerate into a regional catastrophe. The U.S. has three unpalatable choices: withdraw, choose sides or make a last effort to avoid it. Withdrawing now will trigger that war. Choosing sides with Shiites against Sunnis will label America as a murderer when the inevitable atrocities take place.

DOJ_NMG_0096637

So what would comprise a serious final effort? The diplomatic elements include discussions with Syria and Iran, multilateral aid and enfranchising Sunnis by sharing oil revenues, amnesty and moderation of the de-Baathification rules.

But any diplomatic package will fail unless Iraq's security forces restore order. The only way to rapidly do that is to shift platoons from American battalions into 140 Iraqi army battalions and critical police stations. Currently the U.S. has about a dozen military advisers working in each Iraqi battalion. These advisers spend their time as managers. They are too few to give combat advice and moral reassurance out on the streets during daily operations.

As a result, Iraqi platoons, lacking self-confidence, restrict their patrolling in the dangerous areas where they are most needed. To infuse combat confidence in each Iraqi battalion, we propose embedding about 60 advisers -- by transferring a reinforced platoon from every U.S. infantry battalion in Iraq. Each American soldier and Marine so deployed would be a force multiplier, greatly increasing the effectiveness of the Iraqi soldiers. The total number of advisers would expand to 20,000, plus additional support. Air and artillery strikes would be on call. Additional U.S. battalions would be needed to provide Quick Reaction Forces should the embedded forces need them. Special Forces commandos would still seek out al Qaeda operatives anywhere. U.S. units would maintain security in parts of Baghdad and 10 other key cities.

The huge increase in advisers would be offset by a drawdown of American conventional battalions and base support units. American-only patrols are becoming counterproductive, with fewer direct enemy engagements, more sniper and IED attacks, and more alienated Iraqis. In return for the embedding, the U.S. would insist that Iraqi officers accused of malfeasance by their advisory teams be relieved of duty.

By shifting missions from American-only patrolling to embedded combat advisers, the overall U.S. troop requirement might be cut nearly in half during the coming year. But the effectiveness of the mission should increase, based on past experience. In Vietnam, the Marine Combined Action Platoon (CAP) program deployed over 100 squads to live in hamlets with Popular Force units. Large areas were patrolled at low cost and 60% of the Marines involved extended at the end of their tours. Last year in northwest Iraq, the American commander in al Qaim replicated the CAP experience by integrating his battalion into local police and army forces and driving al Qaeda out of the city.

Many U.S. commanders will resist a major structural change that breaks down battalion combat teams. The embedded units will patrol heavily in dangerous areas. The Iraqi Army has to take on the militias and the police units who side with them. If the U.S. dramatically increases the advisory effort, strengthening the army, the risk emerges of creating a strong man, not a Western-style democracy; yet given the consequences of failure, these risks must be taken.

Restoring security in Iraq trumps all else. In the spring of 2004, Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, then commanding the Marine division in Anbar province, intended to initiate the combined platoon program on a major basis. The eruption of the extended battle for Fallujah precluded that. Combined platoons were a good idea 30 months ago; today, they are vital.

Mr. Binnendijk is the Theodore Roosevelt professor at National Defense University. Mr. West is author of "No True Glory: A Frontline Account of the Battle for Fallujah" (Bantam, 2005).

Iraq Resumes Diplomatic Ties With Syria (AP-Y)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

After nearly a quarter-century of severed ties, Iraq said Monday it will resume diplomatic relations with neighboring Syria — a move seen as a possible step toward stemming some of the unrelenting violence, which claimed another 100 lives.

The Iraqi and Syrian presidents also received invitations from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to a weekend summit in Tehran to tackle the chaos in Iraq, Iraqi lawmakers said. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's spokesman said his boss would attend but that Syrian President Bashar Assad would not. The invitation was thought to be an attempt by Iran to counter U.S. influence in the region.

The announcement of restored Iraqi-Syrian ties came during a groundbreaking visit to Baghdad by Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, who was challenged over Damascus' role in supporting the Sunni insurgency.

"We object to any neighboring country that allows itself to be a base or a transit point for the terrorist groups that harm Iraq," Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said after meeting with the Syrian envoy.

DOJ_NMG_0096638

Al-Maliki told Moallem that Damascus should not let its disputes with the United States be played out in Iraq, where the chaos and bloodshed has become "a danger that threatens all, not Iraq only."

Asked about the Syrian's visit, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said "the problem is not what they say but what they do."

"Certainly what we would like to see the Syrians do is take actions to, among other things, prevent foreign fighters from coming across the border into Iraq; and, again, to back up the positive words that they have with some real concrete steps," Casey said.

Moallem arrived in Iraq on Sunday in the first such high-level visit by a Syrian official since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime in 2003. He was expected to return to Damascus on Tuesday.

"Diplomatic relations will be restored between the two countries during the visit," Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said.

Syria broke diplomatic ties with Iraq in 1982, accusing Iraq of inciting riots by the banned Muslim Brotherhood in Syria. Damascus also sided with Iran in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq war. Trade ties were restored in 1997.

More recently, Syria is widely believed to have done little to stop foreign fighters and al-Qaida recruits from crossing its border to join Sunni insurgents in Iraq. It also has provided refuge for many top members of Saddam's former leadership and political corps, which is thought to have organized arms and funding for the insurgents. The Sunni insurgency, since it sprang to life in the late summer of 2003, has been responsible for the vast majority of U.S. deaths in Iraq.

A U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad on Saturday night and a U.S. Marine died during combat in Anbar province on Sunday, the military said, raising to at least 2,865 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war. This month in Iraq, 47 American service members have been killed or died.

The Iraqi death toll, meanwhile, rose to at least 1,371 for the first 20 days of November — the highest for any month since The Associated Press began tracking the figure in April 2005.

In all, 25 Iraqis were killed Monday in a series of attacks in Baghdad, Ramadi and Baqouba, police said. The bodies of 75 Iraqis who had been kidnapped and tortured also were found on the streets of the capital, in Dujail to the north of Baghdad and in the Tigris River in southern Iraq.

The Iraqi death toll this month is already well above the 1,216 who died in all of October, which had been the deadliest month in Iraq since the AP began its count.

The actual totals are likely considerably higher because many deaths are not reported. Victims in those cases are quickly buried according to Muslim custom and never reach morgues or hospitals to be counted.

Monday's civilian victims included Walid Hassan, an actor and comedian on Al-Sharqiyah TV who was shot while driving in western Baghdad. The motive for his slaying was unknown. Hassan had performed in a comedy series called "Caricature," which mocked coalition forces, insurgents, militias and Iraq's government.

Assailants also shot to death Fulayeh al-Ghurabi, a Shiite professor at Babil University in the province south of Baghdad, as he was driving home at midday, police said.

In addition to the victims of violence, countless Iraqis have had close calls with death. Among them were two government officials who escaped assassination attempts Monday.

Minister of State Mohammed Abbas Auraibi, a member of Iraq's Shiite majority, said a roadside bomb hit his convoy at about 9:30 a.m. as it was driving on a highway in eastern Baghdad. Two of his bodyguards were wounded.

Hakim al-Zamily, a Shiite deputy health minister, also escaped unhurt when gunmen opened fire on his convoy in downtown Baghdad at noon, killing two of his guards, the minister said.

On Sunday, suspected Sunni insurgents kidnapped another deputy health minister, Shiite Ammar al-Saffar, from his home in northern Baghdad. Officials said the gunmen wore police uniforms and arrived in seven vehicles to abduct al-Saffar, who was believed to be the most senior government official kidnapped in Iraq since the war began in March 2003.

Al-Saffar was seized nearly a week after dozens of suspected Shiite militia gunmen in police uniforms kidnapped scores of people from a Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad. That ministry is predominantly Sunni.

DOJ_NMG_0096639

Spoofer Of Iraq's Chaos Becomes Another Victim (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 20 -- For the last three years, Walid Hassan had an impossible task. He had to make war-weary Iraqis laugh. Week after week, the comedian and broadcaster found inspiration in the turmoil and bloodletting. On his weekend television show, "Caricature," he poked fun at the poor security, the long gas lines, the electricity blackouts and the ineffective politicians.

In Hassan's world, nothing was sacred. And many Iraqis adored him. In a nation bottled up with frustration, he was their release. They would recognize him on the streets and uncork their plights. He would listen, and turn them into satire.

On Monday, Hassan, 47, a father of five children, became a victim of the war and chaos from which he drew his inspiration. A Shiite Muslim, he was found in the majority-Sunni neighborhood of Yarmouk in west Baghdad with multiple bullet wounds to his back and head, according to police. He was last seen by witnesses in a black car with a driver and two other passengers.

"He was a star in the galaxy of Iraqi arts," said Ali Hanoon, the show's director. "Now, he's another sacrifice on the altar of this slaughtered country."

Hassan, who also produced a political show, was the latest casualty in the Iraqi media world, which has suffered heavily since the U.S.-led invasion of 2003 unleashed a wave of press freedom. So far, 133 reporters, cameramen and other media workers have been killed in Iraq, the vast majority of them Iraqi, according to Reporters Without Borders, a journalists advocacy group.

Hassan, described by friends as tall with gray-flecked hair and a warm smile, was the second employee of al-Sharkiya television, an independent channel owned by a London-based Iraqi businessman, to be killed this month. In January, a Sharkiya anchor escaped a kidnapping attempt by jumping out of the second-floor window of her apartment after masked men broke into her home.

On Monday, Hassan's family and closest friend struggled to comprehend his death. In today's Baghdad, filled with death squads and criminal gangs, there could be many reasons. Was he the victim of sectarian strife? Or was it a kidnap-for-ransom plot gone awry? Or did his broadcast cross one too many red lines?

What is clear is that Hassan was concerned about his life, said his friends. As he viewed the mounting death tolls, he often thought about when his turn would come, mirroring the views of many Iraqis, said Hanoon.

So, like most Iraqis, he made preparations for death. Last year he sold his car for $5,000 and used it to buy a piece of land for his family.

"I asked him, why you sold your car?" recalled Ali Jabbir, one of Hassan's co-actors on "Caricature."

"He said, 'If tomorrow comes and I die, at least I'll give a house to my kids.' And this was the concern of every Iraqi."

On Monday, Hanoon said he had spoken with Hassan's wife. She said her husband often reassured her that his fame would shield him from the violence unfolding outside.

"She told me he used to tell her, 'If people came and wanted to kill me, I would use reason with them. And I will tell them, why would you kill me? On what basis? And I would get out of it because I was so popular,' " Hanoon recounted.

After graduating from a fine arts college in Baghdad, Hassan worked as a civil servant in Nasiriyah. He took night courses in acting and art while working as a journalist for Iraq's state television. In the early 1990s, he came to Baghdad to pursue his dream of becoming a comedian. He got his break as a director of a candid camera program called "Tricks" that ran on state television, recalled Hanoon.

In the months after the U.S.-led invasion, when Iraq exploded with a constellation of television channels, Al-Sharkiya tapped Hassan and five other actors for "Caricature." In each 30-minute segment, the actors performed skits that often seemed like Iraq's version of "Saturday Night Live." Hassan's roles ranged from corrupt officials to brown-nosing bureaucrats.

One skit was about a family who moved their home and all their belongings to an unknown location. By the end of the segment, they had grown long gray hair, their faces wrinkled with age. That's when the television viewers learned that the family was waiting in one of Iraq's notoriously long gas lines.

DOJ_NMG_0096640

Last week, in his final role, Hassan played a man who made his way to the top of his company through connections, only to find out he was the wrong person for the job. Many viewers interpreted that as a slap at Iraq's unity government, in which sect and tribal allegiances are clearly visible in many ministries.

"The feeling Hassan had is the same that most people have, that Baghdad is withering," said Jabbir. "So we dealt with the diseases of society."

There was one sensitive issue they never played with: the sectarian strife disfiguring Iraqi society. "We always hated this subject," said Jabbir. "We believe the media should not provoke such strife. The goal is to put down such strife."

Hassan, his friends said, didn't perform his job for the money -- he earned a meager $400 a month and always found it hard to make ends meet.

On Monday, some of his co-actors on the show reflected on what drove Hassan to work on a show that could anger many powerful people.

"This was his own way to serve his country and his people, and this is the reason why Walid and us took that risk," said Bushra Ismael, a co-actor on "Caricature."

Hanoon said he wasn't certain whether the show would stay on the air.

"Since the program is a comedy, the laughter that will come out will be soaked with blood," said Hanoon.

Banned Iraqi Television Station Illicitly Back On The Air (MCT)

By Hannah Allam

McClatchy Newspapers, November 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - When Iraqi government officials pulled the plug on al Zawraa TV earlier this month, they thought they'd finally stamped out a channel known for reporting live from "occupied Baghdad" and declaring Saddam Hussein's death sentence "a sad day for Iraq."

Two weeks later, however, the Sunni-owned station is back, and bloodier than ever.

"Virtuous clerics, tribesmen, merchants, farmers, work together as one hand to liberate Iraq," a crawl at the bottom of the screen urged Monday. Saddam-era martial music boomed as an insurgent video montage began: a sniper hitting an American soldier snacking on a sandwich, a U.S. Humvee bursting into flames as it hit a roadside bomb, Sunni Muslim militants vowing to overthrow Shiite leaders who are portrayed as agents of Iran.

"This is as violent as it gets," said Bassam al Husseini, the senior government adviser who'd sought the order banning the channel for its coverage of Saddam's trial. "Now they've become officially irhabiyah," he added, using the Arabic word for "terrorist."

Al Zawraa TV is the station of choice for nostalgic Baathists, militant Islamists, Iran-hating Sunnis and anti-American Arab nationalists. Driven underground by a court order on Nov. 5, the day Saddam was sentenced to death, the satellite news channel has re-emerged in recent days, broadcasting from an unknown location and devoid of any pretense of neutrality.

Its theme song is borrowed from an old Iraqi TV miniseries, and its content is unbroken, 24-hour insurgent propaganda.

"We'll fall man over man until our hair is gray, and this land will not be touched," the lyrics say, usually accompanied by startling footage of attacks on U.S. troops.

"I'm so happy to hear these nationalist songs again and to see the armed attacks against the Americans," said Tamam Abdul Samad, 28, a Sunni engineer from the southern Shiite city of Basra, which borders Iran. "When I hear it, I jump and dance. This channel represents Sunnis as well as patriotic Shiites." Al Zawraa's ability to broadcast round the clock in defiance of the government is yet another example of the increasing technological prowess of insurgents and their supporters. U.S. military officials sort through Internet sites, message boards, text messages and TV channels every week to monitor the ebb and flow of insurgent chatter. But that doesn't mean they're able to counter it.

"These extremist elements can literally go out and say what they want, post what they want," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for U.S.-led forces in Iraq, said at a news conference Monday. "They have absolutely no responsibility to the press or anybody else to come back and clarify it, validate it, justify it, to be held accountable to it. Whereas, in fact, it's the exact opposite for us."

DOJ_NMG_0096641

Al Zawraa was launched in November 2005, the brainchild of Mishaan al Jubouri, a Sunni member of the Iraqi parliament who fled to Syria recently amid allegations of corruption. The station claims it won't run al Qaida videos and doesn't condone attacks on civilians; its allies are Iraqi nationalist fighters who strike only military and government targets, it says. In a telephone interview from Damascus, Jubouri said the main goal of the station is to urge resistance to what he calls the "U.S.-backed Safavid occupation," a reference to the Persian Shiite dynasty that ruled Baghdad in the late 16th and early 17th centuries. "Safavid" is now a common slur to describe the Shiites in charge of Iraq, many of whom spent years in Iran as exiles.

"When we were broadcasting in public from inside Iraq, we had to respect Iraqi law. But when the Iraqi government broke the law and closed the channel for no legitimate reason, they turned us into a channel that broadcasts in secrecy," Jubouri said.

Jubouri said the station's Baghdad offices remain shuttered and his six correspondents on the run, roaming the Iraqi countryside in a satellite truck, from which they beam their programming to an Egyptian satellite distributor called Nilesat, which then retransmits the channel across the Middle East.

Jubouri said the new pro-resistance format has increased the number of viewers "100 times over." He said the channel receives thousands of e-mails and text messages every day.

"We are now broadcasting from places the Safavids can't reach," he boasted.

To many Sunni Iraqis, it's the perfect antidote to the Shiite-run stations that regularly deride Sunni clerics as terrorists, air interviews conducted in Persian-accented Arabic and support militias blamed for scores of sectarian killings.

In predominantly Sunni areas of Iraq, former military officers watch from cafes, and ordinary families tune in from home for the songs, speeches and spirit of the days when Iraq was a place of law and order, albeit one built under the crushing weight of a brutal dictatorship.

"This channel wasn't popular or aggressive before the decision to close it," said Jamal Abdullah, 29, a teacher from the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Fallujah.

(McClatchy special correspondents Mohammed al Dulaimy and Shatha al Awsy contributed to this report.)

British PM Visits Troops In Afghanistan (AP)

By David Stringer, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair told soldiers fighting a resurgent Taliban that success in Afghanistan would be a step toward global security, and on Monday pledged Britain's commitment to the war-torn country "for as long as it takes."

Blair held talks in Kabul with President Hamid Karzai following a visit to meet hundreds of troops in the country's restive southern Helmand province — a former Taliban stronghold and hub of Afghanistan's heroin trade.

Blair paid tribute to the troops at Camp Bastion — Britain's main southern base.

"Here in this extraordinary desert is where the future of world security in the early 21st century is going to be played out," he said, speaking on a platform raised above a vast stretch of gray dust.

The visit was the British leader's first to Afghanistan since 2002. Britain has around 6,000 soldiers deployed in Afghanistan.

Blair told a joint news conference with Karzai at the presidential palace that British and NATO forces would likely remain in Afghanistan for years to prevent any return to power of the Taliban.

"We came to Afghanistan because the sickness and the evil that was here came to us," Blair said, referring to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the U.S. "I don't believe there is an alternative but to fight this and to fight it for as long as it takes."

Blair's arrival followed a two-day visit to Pakistan, where he and Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf agreed to a package of joint ventures to tackle extremism and to aid neighboring Afghanistan.

Musharraf said Afghanistan needed a huge influx of reconstruction aid, similar to the U.S. Marshall Plan that helped rebuild Europe after World War II.

A total of 41 British soldiers have died in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 — including 36 killed since Britain's deployment to Helmand province in July, Blair's office said.

British troops moved into the former Taliban stronghold and global heroin hub as part of the NATO mission to subdue insurgents and allow reconstruction to expand.

DOJ_NMG_0096642

"This is a fight of a different kind from anything we have faced as a country, certainly in the postwar years," Blair said in Helmand. "It is not the same as two major powers fighting each other. It's not like World War I or World War II."

After talking with the British leader, Maj. Andy Plewes said his company of commandos — newly arrived on a six-month tour — were eager to begin the job of ousting insurgents, but also to mend relations with local community leaders.

"They've trained back in Britain for it and are ready to get out into the villages, sit down for talks with tribal leaders and drink endless cups of green tea," Plewes said.

Nick Key, a regional coordinator for Britain's foreign office, said meetings with tribal leaders had led to the withdrawal of British forces from the district of Musa Qala — prompting claims soldiers were in effect forced into retreat and raised concerns the area could be exploited by Taliban fighters.

"We know we have to keep our eyes open and we do that," Key said, insisting the pullout had been at the request of local leaders and Karzai.

Britain's Sunday Times newspaper reported Sunday that Taliban commanders had been discovered freely recuperating in the Pakistani city of Quetta following battles in Afghanistan with British forces.

"Fighting the British is as easy as eating a loaf of bread from my hand," the newspaper quoted an unidentified Taliban commander as saying. "Fighting the British is much easier than the Americans. They have no faith."

Troops Will Stay, Blair Pledges (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, November 21, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- British Prime Minister Tony Blair yesterday pledged his nation's commitment in Afghanistan "for as long as it takes," telling British soldiers fighting the resurgent Taliban that success would help establish global security.

Mr. Blair said at a press conference with Afghan President Hamid Karzai at the presidential palace in Kabul that British and NATO forces likely would remain in Afghanistan for years to come to prevent the Taliban's return to power.

"We came to Afghanistan because the sickness and the evil that was here came to us," Mr. Blair said, referring to the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States. "I don't believe there is an alternative but to fight this and to fight it for as long as it takes."

On his first trip to Afghanistan since 2002, Mr. Blair met with Mr. Karzai after visiting hundreds of troops at Britain's main southern base, Camp Bastion, in the restive southern Helmand province -- a former Taliban stronghold and hub of the country's heroin trade.

"Here in this extraordinary desert is where the future of world security in the early 21st century is going to be played out," Mr. Blair said.

Britain has about 6,000 troops deployed in the country.

Mr. Blair's arrival followed a two-day visit to Pakistan, where he and President Pervez Musharraf agreed to a package of joint ventures to tackle extremism and to aid war-ravaged Afghanistan.

Gen. Musharraf said neighboring Afghanistan needed a huge influx of reconstruction aid, similar to the U.S. Marshall Plan that helped rebuild Europe after World War II.

A total of 41 British troops have died in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 -- including 36 since Britain's deployment to Helmand in July as part of the NATO mission to subdue insurgents and allow the expansion of reconstruction.

"This is a fight of a different kind from anything we have faced as a country, certainly in the postwar years," Mr. Blair said in Helmand.

After talking with Mr. Blair, Maj. Andy Plewes said his company of commandos -- newly arrived on a six-month tour -- was eager to begin ousting insurgents and building relations with local community leaders.

"They've trained back in Britain for it and are ready to get out into the villages, sit down for talks with tribal leaders and drink endless cups of green tea," Maj. Plewes said.

British Defense Secretary Des Browne said last month that operations in Afghanistan had cost Britain $1.6 billion since 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0096643

Aid for the region has included a program of loans amounting to about $190 apiece to farmers and rural workers, aimed at encouraging them to establish new businesses.

However, hopes of denting Afghanistan's narcotics trade were undermined by a bumper opium harvest this past season.

Taliban Drug Trade: Echoes Of Colombia (CSM)

By Gretchen Peters,

The Christian Science Monitor, November 21, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN

As Afghanistan's narcotics trade explodes past $3 billion a year, there is concern that the Taliban is becoming another FARC, Colombia's notorious leftist insurgent group that draws much of its funding from the drug trade.

The Taliban and FARC - the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia - both got their start protecting peasants from corrupt governments. There's evidence both initially fought narcotics traffic but then levied taxes on the trade for much-needed cash.

Over time, the FARC began to use its soldiers to protect shipments, and took over coca factories. They forced farmers under their control to grow coca. Eventually, they became self-sufficient and set up a parallel government in their semiautonomous zone. They now earn an estimated $500 million a year from cocaine.

That all sounds eerily familiar to police and military officials in Afghanistan. "There is no question at all that the Taliban has been increasingly involved both directly and indirectly in narcotics," says Seth Jones, an analyst at the Rand Corp.

Evidence is growing that the Taliban and their allies are moving beyond taxing the trade to protecting opium shipments, running heroin labs, and even organizing farm output in areas they control. "It's reached the point where about half of the opium we seize in the provinces has some link to the Taliban," says Gen. Ali Shah Paktiawal, director of the anticriminal branch of the Kabul police.

Another senior Afghan security official says captured Taliban have confessed that most funding comes from drugs.

Afghan opium production, which mushroomed 59 percent in 2006, multiplied by 162 percent in southern Helmand Province, where Taliban ties to the trade are clearest. "People should be concerned about the FARCification of the Taliban," says a senior Western counternarcotics official, adding, "It does not take a lot of drug money to fund their terrorist operations."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair visited British troops in the province Monday and pledged to stay "as long as it takes" to prevent a return to power by the Taliban. British aid - $1.6 billion since 2001 - has included loans to farmers to start new businesses. But the country produced a bumper opium crop this past season, and is expected to do so again next year.

Many experts believe the Taliban has always been dependent on the poppy trade. Declassified US State Department records show that two major narcotraffickers now in US custody, Baz Mohammed and Bashir Noorzai, sat on the original five-member Taliban shura, or leadership council.

"The Taliban rose to power by co-opting Afghan heroin," says a US official.

Today there's raging debate among experts over how much the Taliban leadership depends on heroin for its financing. Some say that donations from wealthy Arabs and financial support from Pakistan make up a larger portion of the Taliban's financing than heroin. "I don't believe Mullah Omar and his top counsel are involved, but they have clearly allowed [trafficking] to happen," says the Western official.

Unraveling the truth is complicated by the fact that the Taliban is less of a unified movement today than it was at its start. Now, officials say, it's more a loose grouping of tribal leaders, businessmen, and regional warlords.

"There's a very small core of true believers still left in the Taliban," says a top US military official. "But our intel is that most of the guys are just in it to make a buck."

The evolution from holy warriors to heroin smugglers should come as little surprise, say experts. Terror groups from the IRA to the Tamil Tigers have raised funds through trafficking, along with other criminal activities. And the lure of the dollar often eventually warps original goals. That metamorphosis has already happened to one Afghan insurgent group, say experts. Hezb-Islami Gulbuddin, run by the fundamentalist Gulbuddin Hikmatyar, is now "a full-fledged smuggling organization," moving everything from heroin to people, says a US official.

DOJ_NMG_0096644

There's fragmentary evidence that Osama bin Laden has instructed his people not to get wrapped up in narcotics, apparently fearing it would harm his movement. "Some say that Osama and his people have specifically stayed away from it," says the Western official.

The growth in smuggling complicates strategic response. "Strategic withdrawals," like the Pakistani retreat from troubled North Waziristan or the British pullback from Musa Qula in Helmand, for example, risk allowing criminal activity to flourish.

"This trade has strengthened the Taliban and greatly weakened the government's capacity," says Mr. Jones of Rand. "I'm not optimistic about where it's going."

Some US lawmakers say Washington must do more. Congressman Charles Schumer (D) of New York tagged a $700 million amendment to the defense appropriations bill to try and boost funding for Counter Narcotics in Afghanistan. It was later cut back to a total of $116 million.

DOJ:

GAO Reports Progress On Info Classification At Justice, FBI (FCW)

Federal Computer Week, November 21, 2006

A report from the Government Accountability Office says the Justice Department has significantly improved the way it handles classified information, but the agency has not corrected one of the most glaring problems: staff shortages.

Increased staffing was one of the recommendations made by the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which reviewed security procedures at DOJ in July 2004 and April 2005. GAO was brought in this year to assess how well DOJ and its FBI component were following the recommendations.

The agencies have made a lot of progress in a lot of areas, according to GAO's report. "DOJ, however, has taken no action on the most important recommendation, addressing staff shortages, which continue to place its program at risk," the document states.

Justice said it does not have the resources to address the staff shortages, according to the report. The department said it "is trying to address its resources constraints, a longstanding problem that GAO identified as early as 1993, by requesting additional funds from an administrative account in fiscal year 2007."

But Justice officials acknowledged they do not know precisely how many new employees they would need because they have not fully assessed those needs, the report said. "It also does not have a strategy that identifies how it will use additional resources to address remaining deficiencies," the report added.

Justice had taken action on five of 10 recommendations, "including fixing problems with outdated and insufficient training and insufficient monitoring of components' programs," GAO said.

The report found that five department components — the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Criminal Division; the Drug Enforcement Administration; the FBI; and the U.S. Marshals Service — were experiencing problems designating sensitive but unclassified information.

The components had no specific guides to help employees determine when to use that designation, GAO found.

Justice said it is awaiting the results of an interagency working group charged with setting governmentwide standards for sensitive but unclassified information before it will consider making any changes to that category. The working group is expected to release its findings next month.

GAO found that the FBI had taken action on 11 of its 12 recommendations, including updating most of its guidelines on classifying documents and issuing new security regulations.

The report also noted that the bureau is revising its training and oversight activities. "If FBI completes all recommendations, this will help to lower program risk since it makes 98 percent of DOJ's classification decisions," it states.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ_NMG_0096645

Prosecutors Drop Lay Appeal (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 21, 2006

Government withdraws notice to challenge ruling clearing record

Federal prosecutors on Monday had this to say about their intent to challenge a judge's decision to wipe out former Enron Chairman Ken Lay's convictions: Never mind.

Last week the Justice Department filed notice it would appeal U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's October decision to clear Lay's name. That filing came the same day two senators introduced a bill to allow crime victims to seek restitution when a convicted defendant dies before exhausting appeals.

Lake had based his ruling on precedent set by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals — the same court that would have heard a challenge. But prosecutors filed court papers Monday that said the government would withdraw its appeal notice.

Monday's filing explained that last week's action came as the deadline for filing notice of appeal was about to expire.

Even though the Justice Department acknowledged helping draft the proposed legislation, prosecutors said in Monday's filing that last week's move was "protective" to ensure they met the deadline and could then review the bill to determine if it could help support an appeal.

"Having concluded that review, the government now moves to withdraw its notice of appeal," the filing said.

Samuel Buffone, who represents Lay's estate, declined comment.

Lay died in July, just six weeks after he was convicted of 10 criminal counts in separate cases. He had not been sentenced.

Lake's decision would force the government to sue in civil court to seek millions of dollars of Lay's alleged ill-gotten gains, because a conviction no longer exists for a criminal forfeiture.

The legislation, introduced last week by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, aims to clarify the legal procedures when a defendant dies before appeal.

Head Of Cyberonics Resigns As Options Inquiry Expands (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

The tumultuous tenure of Robert P. Cummins as chairman, president and chief executive of the medical device maker Cyberonics has ended, the company disclosed yesterday.

Mr. Cummins, 52, who is known as Skip, is a former venture capitalist who joined the board of Cyberonics in 1988 and became chief executive in 1995. He gained a reputation as one of nation's most passionate and intimidating business leaders in dealing with critics, regulators and investors.

Mr. Cummins had been under growing pressure since questions arose in June about the timing of stock options for 100,000 shares that were granted to him in 2004 just hours after a regulatory panel recommended approval of a Cyberonics implant to treat depression. Although none of the options vested immediately, their potential value soared when trading in the stock resumed the next day.

Scrutiny of the timing of the 2004 options grant expanded into internal and government investigations of whether Cyberonics was among the scores of technology companies that improperly manipulated options grants to ensure that executives would profit from them.

Cyberonics stock, which has been battered by the accounting questions and by the company's problems getting insurance coverage for its depression implant, soared yesterday after the company disclosed before trading began that Mr. Cummins resigned on Friday. The shares climbed as high as $26.45 before retreating to close at $24.17, up 12 percent for the day.

Cyberonics, based in Houston, also said that Pamela B. Westbrook, the chief financial officer, resigned Sunday and that Reese S. Terry Jr., the co-founder and former chief executive, would serve as interim chief executive.

In addition to the management changes, Cyberonics disclosed that its audit had concluded that dates on a number of options to Cyberonics employees had been improperly reported from 1999 to 2003. The company did not identify the employees. Investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice continue.

DOJ_NMG_0096646

In a news release and filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Cyberonics said that the questionable transactions might require it to restate earnings back as far as 2000 to account for an additional $10 million in expenses.

The business focus of Cyberonics is unlikely to change, but analysts said that the forced resignation of Mr. Cummins could clear the way for Cyberonics to be acquired by a larger device maker.

"Skip was the biggest barrier to the company being sold," said Thomas J. Gunderson, who follows the medical device industry for Piper Jaffray in Minneapolis. Speculation that such a deal might be struck intensified a week ago when Carl C. Icahn, the billionaire investor, disclosed that he had acquired a 2.4 percent stake in Cyberonics, sending the stock up 20 percent that day.

Cyberonics said in its S.E.C. filing that Mr. Cummins would receive $1.72 million in cash this week for resigning, along with a grant of 75,000 shares and accelerated vesting of outstanding options and restricted stock grants. The filing said Mr. Cummins would receive an additional 75,000 shares within one week of the filing by Cyberonics of its next annual report and a cash payment to cover taxes.

The severance package was criticized as "lavish" by Karen L. Finerman, president of Metropolitan Capital Advisors, an institutional shareholder that has nominated a competing slate of directors for the board of Cyberonics and owns 7.3 percent of the company's shares. Mr. Cummins could not be reached for comment.

Mr. Cummins was known for his tenacious focus on using the company's most important product, a pocketwatch-size electrical nerve stimulator, to treat drug-resistant depression. The disease, Mr. Cummins said, drove his mother and grandfather to suicide.

The $15,000 device is implanted in the chest and attached to the vagus nerve in the neck. The nerve is a major pathway into portions of the brain associated with a number of mental ailments.

Cyberonics first developed the stimulator to control epileptic seizures. But under Mr. Cummins, the company then went after the far larger market of severely depressed patients — four million in the United States alone — who fail to improve with drugs and electroshock therapy.

After months of controversy, Cyberonics gained regulatory approval for the depression treatment in 2005. Critics inside and outside the Food and Drug Administration said that Cyberonics had not conclusively shown the device worked on such severely depressed patients. They also said there was too little evidence that the reported benefits outweighed safety concerns.

Cyberonics has reported that more than 2,200 depression patients have received the implant. Far more patients though have been denied coverage for the procedure, which most insurers classify as experimental despite the regulatory approval. It costs about $25,000, not counting follow-up visits to psychiatrists for adjustments and monitoring.

Slower-than-expected growth led to a string of quarterly losses, layoffs and repeated misses of forecasts made to Wall Street, damaging the credibility of Mr. Cummins with investors who were already annoyed by his confrontational style. This month, Cyberonics said sales for the first half of its fiscal year through Oct. 27 were nearly $68 million, up 21 percent from a year ago, but that it could not predict when the company would return to profitability.

Cyberonics said yesterday that in addition to the management changes it had separated the chairman's job from the chief executive's and that Tony Coelho, a former Democratic congressman and a board member, had been appointed chairman.

George E. Parker III, who had been head of human resources, was named interim chief operating officer, and John A. Riccardi, director of financial planning and analysis, became interim chief financial officer.

Fortunate Ones (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Cyberonics says 4.2 million Americans' lives could improve with a medical implant device the company makes to treat severe depression and epilepsy. The FDA approved its product. But federal investigators are probing Cyberonics' compensation practices. This USA TODAY Special Report examines one company caught up in the nation's expanding stock-options scandal. The report explains how a few Cyberonics executives and directors made nearly $50 million in stock-trading profits while selling a money-losing device that remains controversial.

DOJ_NMG_0096647

HOUSTON — Cyberonics said Monday that its chief executive and chief financial officer had resigned after an internal investigation found that unnamed insiders had incorrectly reported the dates of company stock options for years.

Cyberonics general counsel David Wise said in a filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission that the company had under-reported its executive compensation expense by about $10 million and would have to restate its financial statements going back to 1999.

The company's disclosures came at a time when one of the biggest financial scandals in years is sweeping U.S. corporate boardrooms. Federal authorities are examining at least 130 companies to determine whether insiders manipulated options-award dates to illegally profit from market gains, principally by backdating the options to an earlier date than issued to give themselves a head start on rising prices. To date, dozens of companies have announced executive departures or restatements after internal investigations. Two criminal cases are pending.

In June, Cyberonics said that it was one of the companies under investigation by the SEC and by the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan. The company also faces several options-related lawsuits by shareholders and is embroiled in a proxy fight with a large investor demanding substantial changes in the board's makeup and governance practices.

During three interviews with USA TODAY in August, former CEO Robert “Skip” Cummins — who quit Friday — defended Cyberonics and denied any wrongdoing. “We have nothing to hide,” Cummins said. But he deflected questions about the government and board probes. Company lawyer Wise said at the time that Cummins could not discuss the controversy. The company has declined to comment for this story.

Cummins had been directing Cyberonics' drive to win Medicare reimbursement for its medical devices to treat severe depression, a decision that he said could open up a $1 billion sales market for the company. Medicare's administrators have not yet ruled on the application.

Earlier, in June, former Cyberonics chief financial officer Pamela Westbrook, who resigned Sunday, told investors that “all stock options” issued by the company “are granted the day of approval and are priced at fair market value on the date of the grant.” Westbrook said the company “fully followed securities and accounting regulations.”

A USA TODAY investigation reveals that Cyberonics' board has engaged in a series of questionable practices to reward Cummins, certain directors and some executives with stock and options almost from its inception as a public company in February 1993. Among its practices, the company frequently issued stock options just before market-moving events that insiders participated in, including merger talks, regulatory milestones and earnings advisories. It also repeatedly issued options at the lowest or second-lowest monthly trading price, SEC filings show. On one occasion, management, including Cummins, and a director who serves on the compensation committee, bought company stock at a discounted price in which Cummins represented himself both as the CEO selling the shares and as an individual buying them.

Over the past year, academic research at several major universities has identified widespread problems in dating of stock options granted to company insiders. A joint study at Harvard and Cornell universities published last week estimated that about 850 CEOs at 720 companies benefited from opportunistic timing. The study, “Lucky CEOs,” said the findings reflect widespread governance problems.

A stock option entitles the holder to buy a share at a fixed price. Options typically are issued at the stock's current market value. It is not illegal to issue options at below-market prices, but a company must charge the discount against earnings, and the recipient must report the gain as income. Most options mature over several years, meaning they cannot immediately be converted to cash. But if the stock rises, the value of the options rises.

Since Cyberonics' founding, Cummins and the company have raised $175 million from investors. The company's loss through January was $186 million. Despite the perennial cash drain, company officers and directors have reaped $49.4 million in stock-trading profits from 1999 to present, including $22.5 million for Cummins, according to Thomson Financial, a financial information company.

University of Michigan finance professor Nejat Seyhun, who analyzed all of Cyberonics' options grants since 2000 for USA TODAY, says the odds the award dates on some of the low-priced options occurred by chance range from one in 600 for Cummins to one in nearly 500,000 for the man who now replaces him as chairman: former U.S. congressman Tony Coelho, a longtime member of the board's compensation committee and a beneficiary of Cyberonics stock options.

DOJ_NMG_0096648

After disclosing the government investigations, the board hired outside law firm Morgan Lewis & Bockius to probe its options practices. The Houston company, which employs more than 600, said Monday that neither its management nor auditors had closely reviewed the law firm's findings. But it installed Coelho as chairman and one of the company's founders, Reese Terry, as interim CEO. They declined to comment for this story.

In an interview, former SEC chairman Harvey Pitt, who reviewed some of Cyberonics' stock transactions described in this story, said, "There is something incredibly wrong with this picture even if one assumes no laws were broken.

"What you have here, it seems to me, is a system of granting options that are opportunistically timed with ultimately almost a $50 million payout to insiders from a company that hasn't earned a penny," Pitt said. "The picture looks, on its face, rather tawdry."

Cyberonics' triumph at bringing its medical technology to market, and Wall Street's rousing response, seemed to affirm its use of stock options to reward management for a job well done.

At a development-stage company such as Cyberonics, where revenue and profit were hard to come by, stock options enabled the market to set a large component of CEO pay without draining the corporate treasury. But for years, another debate has swirled around the company: about the safety and effectiveness of its medical implants.

The small, battery-powered device — surgically inserted in the chest at a cost of about $25,000 — sends electrical current to the brain through a nerve in the neck. Some medical researchers believe the electric stimulation wards off depression and seizures. But nobody knows for sure how Cyberonics' vagus nerve stimulation device affects the brain, and there are conflicting views among physicians, patients and regulators about how effective it might be.

In July 1997, the FDA approved Cyberonics' implants to treat a form of epilepsy. To date, that product has been implanted in more than 40,000 epilepsy patients. In July 2005, agency administrators overruled the objections of their own staff investigators to approve the implants to treat depression, as well. The device has been implanted in about 1,600 depression patients, many of them during company-paid clinical trials.

Cyberonics estimates as many as 4 million severely depressed Americans could benefit from the product, a U.S. patient base 20 times larger than its potential U.S. epilepsy patient base. First, the company must persuade Medicare to pay for the procedure for depression, as it does for epilepsy.

How Cyberonics proceeds without Cummins remains to be seen.

On Monday, Karen Finerman, president of Metropolitan Capital Advisors, an investment group that owns 7.3% of Cyberonics stock, acknowledged "we don't know" what effect Cummins' departure will have on the company's Medicare application. But Finerman welcomed Cummins' departure, saying, "This is a step in the right direction of very necessary corporate governance changes that we've been asking for. It is a step. There is more to do." Metropolitan is leading a proxy fight to shake up the board.

Investors bid up company shares by 12% to $24.17 at the close of trading Monday.

For Cummins, the personal setback is only the latest in a history of large challenges. In the small Pennsylvania town of Grove City, where he grew up, his parents married and divorced each other three times. To distance himself from the domestic discord, Cummins said during an interview, he lived with his paternal grandmother.

Jeff Lumley, Cummins' best friend during high school, says now, "He knew there was a better way of life than what he had, and I think that was a motivating force for him to work hard and achieve his goals — his success — always pushing hard to be better."

An athletic scholarship to Dartmouth College was Cummins' ticket out of town. The two-time All-Ivy-League linebacker repaid his tuition by punishing opponents. "Skip was one tough son of a gun," says Dartmouth coach Buddy Teevens, a freshman quarterback during Cummins' senior year. "He was extremely competitive."

Cummins earned an MBA at the University of Illinois and took jobs in venture capital that carried him from Chicago to New Canaan, Conn., where a firm he joined, Vista Partners, invested in Cyberonics at its founding. Cummins joined Cyberonics' board in June 1988.

But less than two years after taking the company public, Cyberonics' founders realized they did not have the resources required to get through the legal and regulatory obstacles ahead of them. Over several months, the company approached 70 potential investors with hardly a nibble of interest, according to its SEC filings. By June 1995, $100 invested in the company's IPO was worth $33. The board fired its CEO and hired Cummins.

DOJ_NMG_0096649

"He was aggressive. He was a hardworking guy. And suddenly he comes up through the ranks and sees this opportunity and steps in, never having had the benefit of that formal training (in managing a company that) you really need," says venture capitalist Bill Mullaney, one of Cyberonics' early investors. "I saw him as a guy who would step in on an interim basis."

In taking the job, Cummins' mission was to complete the sale of Cyberonics to St. Jude Medical, a big medical device manufacturer with which the board had launched merger talks in June 1995. But the new CEO and board also initiated a practice that would prove troublesome in the future: granting attractive options on fortunate dates.

On Oct. 11, 1995, Cyberonics' board awarded Cummins options on 50,000 shares at $4.70 a share, lower than all but one price the stock closed at that month, and near a six-month low. As investors anticipated a merger agreement with St. Jude, the stock quickly rose 54% from the grant price to $7.25 in November 1995, before the deal unraveled. Had the merger gone through, Cummins' options would have vested immediately. At $7.25 a share, he would have pocketed $127,500 on the options issued in October, company filings show.

Timing options grants to profit from future events is called "spring loading." Spring loading "is not illegal," says Mark Poerio, co-chairman of the Paul Hastings law firm's executive compensation practice and a member of the firm's Stock Option Task Force. But, he says, the practice is "viewed poorly" by regulators and shareholders "as an unfair form of executive enrichment."

Cyberonics and St. Jude renewed their courtship a few months later. On June 1, 1996, six weeks before shareholders convened to vote on the revised merger at $7 a share, the board awarded each non-employee member options on 2,000 shares at $4 a share. That was a 26% discount from the market price and a 43% discount from the merger price. The prospective gain on the options amounted to $6,000 for each director. Cummins' prospective gain on his options issued in October 1995 was now $115,000.

Cyberonics' shareholders approved the proposed merger. But St. Jude walked away again.

In early 1997, Cummins said in an interview, he visited Coelho near Washington to offer him a seat on Cyberonics' board.

The onetime House Democratic party whip had resigned from Congress in June 1989 after failing to disclose on his congressional financial statement a "junk" bond investment he obtained on favorable terms. But he remained a power broker. And he had epilepsy, an illness Cyberonics sought to treat.

Coelho accepted Cummins' invitation, though he was busy leading the upcoming U.S. delegation to the 1998 world's fair in Portugal. On March 7, 1997, Coelho was granted options on 35,000 shares at $4.63 a share but missed two of Cyberonics' next four board meetings, SEC filings show. By year's end, the stock more than tripled to $15.25 a share.

Coelho's stewardship at Expo '98 met with scathing criticism by the State Department's inspector general, which, in a September 1999 report, held him responsible for "questionable payments" on a luxury hotel, car and driver for himself and for a $300,000 personal loan from a Portuguese bank under terms for which the U.S. government feared it was liable. The inspector general referred its findings to the Justice Department, which brought no charges.

Meanwhile, Coelho became a member of the board's compensation committee, which oversees the company's stock-option plans and sets the CEO's compensation. He continues to hold that job, along with being the board's lead director, serving as the primary liaison between directors and the CEO. Coelho did not respond to requests for comment for this story.

Insurance reimbursement specialist Michael Strauss joined the board a few weeks after Coelho and was appointed to lead the audit committee that has been investigating the company's options.

About the same time, a firm Strauss founded, Covance Health Economics, began collecting $1.6 million in consulting fees from Cyberonics over three years, including $511,459 the first year. Cyberonics did not disclose the related-party transaction — involving dealings between insiders — to the SEC for 2½ years. Strauss had no comment.

Also in March 1997, Cyberonics sold stock at the discounted price of $4.44 a share — lower than any price the stock closed at in the month — to an investment group led by New York investment firm Clark Estates. One of Cummins' Dartmouth classmates, Kevin Moore, was senior vice president of Clark Estates. Its $6.8 million investment gave it a 9.2% stake in the company.

DOJ_NMG_0096650

Cyberonics described the private placement as having been based on “arm's-length negotiations between the company and the lead investor.” It is not unusual for a company to give a large institutional investor a discount when buying stock during a recapitalization of the company. But Cummins, two vice presidents and another new board director, Baylor College of Medicine neurologist Stanley Appel, participated in the investment as individuals. They bought 82,627 shares at the discounted price. Cummins signed the sale agreement on behalf of Cyberonics as CEO and himself as a buyer of the shares, according to an SEC filing the company made in April 1997.

Former SEC attorney Ronald Mueller, an expert on securities law and disclosure, says the transaction “raises a potential conflict of interest.”

Former SEC chairman Pitt says, “If Cummins is on both sides of the transaction, it's not a potential conflict of interest. It's just a conflict.”

Moore, now a director, did not respond to requests for comment. Appel, who was about to join Cyberonics' compensation committee at the time of the investment and who remains a director and compensation committee member, declined to comment.

Pitt says that Coelho's initial failure to attend board meetings for which he was compensated also raises governance concerns: “If you have a director who doesn't attend meetings, you don't really have a director. You have a face and a name but no substance.”

And Pitt says the fact that Strauss, the audit committee's chief, received business benefits and stock options from Cyberonics could have compromised the board's investigation. “How is he going to be able to blow the whistle, if that's required, without blowing the whistle on himself?” Pitt says. “What you've got is somebody who may have an economic incentive in the outcome.”

Driven by FDA approval of the vagus nerve stimulation device for epilepsy treatment in July, the Clark Estates shares more than tripled in value by year's end, closing 1997 at $15.25 a share. The 40,000 shares Appel purchased at a discount rose by $432,400 by year's end, a calculation of his investment shows. Cummins' 35,500 shares bought at a discount rose by $383,755.

Among the lucrative options grants overseen by Coelho and Appel's compensation committee, according to Cyberonics' annual proxy filings:

•In March 1999, Cummins received options on 100,000 shares at $8, the stock's second-lowest closing price that month. The stock rose 99% by year's end and nearly tripled in two years. Cummins did not report receiving these options for two years, according to Equity Incentive Analytics, a stock-tracking service.

•In June 1999, when independent business consultant Alan Olsen joined the board, he was awarded options on 50,000 shares at $11.63, the stock's lowest closing price that month. By year's end, the stock had risen 37%. Olsen is a member of the audit committee that investigated the options grants. He had no comment.

•In January 2000, new manufacturing Vice President Richard Kuntz received options on 150,000 shares at a price lower than all but one closing price that month. In July 2001, new marketing Vice President Michael Cheney got options on 150,000 shares at the stock's lowest closing price that month. In August 2001, new chief medical officer Richard Rudolph got options on 150,000 shares at the lowest closing price that month. And in October 2001, new sales Vice President David Erinakes got options on 50,000 shares at the lowest price that month.

•In June 2001, Cummins got options on 150,000 shares at $12.80, the month's low and the lowest price it traded at for the rest of the year. CFO Westbrook got 15,000 options at the same price, the same date. By year's end, the shares rose 107% in value to $26.53 a share.

University of Michigan finance professor Seyhun has developed a statistical program to assess the likelihood that multiple grants of low-priced options were awarded randomly. Seyhun says the chances Cyberonics' options grants to Coelho were random range from one in 2,000 to one in 492,000; for Appel, the chances are from one in 4,000 to one in 42,000; and for Cummins, from one in 600 to one in 2,796.

“None of this proves that they are backdating,” Seyhun says. “What it shows is that it is extremely unlikely to get these on a random basis.”

DOJ_NMG_0096651

Bill Coleman, an executive compensation consultant at Salary.com, says, “It could be coincidence, it could not be coincidence. Many coincidences make one tend to believe it's not a coincidence at all.”

Even after Congress reduced insiders' ability to manipulate options dates under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 — the new law required options grants to be reported within two business days, rather than up to a year previously — some Cyberonics executives and directors continued to get options at dips in the stock price.

In June 2, 2003, a week after Cyberonics provided Wall Street analysts with an earnings forecast at the low end of analysts' expectations, the board awarded Cummins options on 250,000 shares at $18.94 a share, the previous Friday's closing price. That was the lowest price the stock closed at for the rest of the year.

Then, in August 2003, the company issued new guidance to Wall Street, saying its earnings were exceeding expectations, driving up its stock price. On Aug. 21, Cummins cashed in 100,000 options he'd been awarded years earlier and reaped $2.5 million in a cash profit.

On June 15, 2004, the Holiday Inn at Gaithersburg, Md., filled with Cyberonics executives, lobbyists, medical researchers, depression patients and Wall Street securities analysts. It was a pivotal day in Cyberonics' history.

An FDA advisory panel would hear the company's arguments for approving the vagus nerve stimulation device to treat depression and vote whether to recommend it. The FDA almost always accepts its advisory panel decisions.

Six medical patients who had participated in Cyberonics-sponsored clinical trials spoke about their ordeals with depression and about the dramatic effect that the company's battery-powered electronic device appeared to have on their recoveries, according to an official transcript.

Patients who participated in the trials were not told whether their implant device was turned on. Despite encouraging accounts from some patients, the trials provided scant statistical evidence that the implanted devices worked much better than placebos. “The study failed to demonstrate a statistically significant difference” between a group of implant patients whose devices were turned on and those whose devices were not, testified Carlos Pena, an FDA staff medical device reviewer.

Late in the day, the panel's chairwoman, Kyra Becker of the University of Washington School of Medicine, told Cyberonics that “it's unclear” whether the depression treatment should be approved. At 4:10 p.m., the panel took a break.

A few minutes later, Cyberonics' chief regulatory liaison, Vice President Alan Totah, delivered the company's closing argument in “an unusually confrontational tone,” according to Lazard Capital Markets securities analyst Alexander Arrow, who attended the proceeding.

Totah, speaking in “a slightly caustic, slightly indignant Southern drawl,” according to Arrow, said depression patients in Cyberonics' clinical trials appeared to do better after more extended treatment than originally envisioned. He interpreted that as a promising sign. Totah quoted from FDA statutes to remind the panel that clinical trial standards for medical devices are more flexible than for drugs, based on the agency's “least burdensome” approval guidelines. A few minutes later, the panel voted 5-2 to recommend Cyberonics' depression therapy.

Nasdaq had halted trading in Cyberonics shares that day, pending the advisory panel's decision. That night, the board rewarded Cummins with options on 150,000 shares of stock — and Totah with options on 10,000 shares — at the previous day's closing price of $19.58 a share. The next day, Cyberonics' share price soared 78% to $34.81, delivering a $2.3 million overnight paper gain for Cummins and $152,300 for Totah.

The Financial Accounting Standards Board, which sets U.S. accounting standards, was already concerned at the time of the after-hours grant that U.S. companies were not appropriately disclosing the costs and benefits of executives' options.

In December 2004, FASB revised its options-reporting rule. Under the guidelines, all public companies had to begin reporting the “fair market value” of new options grants on their financial statements, whether they were issued at, above or below the stock's market price. “Fair market” is a technical valuation that incorporates the options' likely value over time, not just at the date issued.

For Cyberonics, the new rule did not take effect until this fiscal year, beginning in April. That same month, the company said it was unable to file its financial statements until it had reviewed its options practices. As a result, Nasdaq is threatening to delist Cyberonics stock.

DOJ_NMG_0096652

In June, SunTrust Robinson Humphrey securities analyst Amit Hazan, who recently left the firm, issued a critical note to investors about Cummins' after-hours grant in June 2004, writing: "We feel this management knowingly abused" the principle of aligning management's interests with that of shareholders.

In an interview, Hazan said Cummins and the board were "trading on information that nobody else had, and the stock clearly was worth more than he got it for."

University of Michigan finance professor M.P. Narayanan calls the after-hours grant "clearly an end run around insider-trading laws."

Even so, the options would not vest for years, and the men would have to wait for their money.

Unexpectedly, the FDA ruled on Aug. 11, 2004, that it would not accept its advisory panel's recommendation, amid an internal debate at the agency over Cyberonics' implant devices. In what is known as a "not approvable" letter, the agency's Center for Devices and Radiological Health, which evaluates new medical devices for use by the public, informed Cyberonics: "There are safety concerns associated with the use of your device. … In addition to known safety concerns, worsening depression was reported as a serious adverse event during" one of the clinical trials.

Cyberonics' stock, which had been trading at $23.95 a share, fell to $14.36 the next day.

On Aug. 26, 2004, Cummins wrote a passionate, 10-page reply to the same FDA office. He described himself "as an American citizen whose mother and grandfather suffered from treatment-resistant depression, and committed suicide because it was their only remaining option."

He wrote that the FDA's decision against Cyberonics "insures that millions of Americans living today with chronic or recurrent treatment-resistant depression have only the same way out chosen by my mother and grandfather."

"After finding my mother's body in her small apartment an estimated two weeks after her suicide," Cummins wrote, "I can assure you that I know the sights, smells, tastes and despair that accompany the hopelessness of treatment-resistant depression and the only real way out."

On Feb. 2, 2005, the FDA signaled in a letter to the company that it would approve Cyberonics' depression treatment after all. Over the next week, investors bid up the company's stock by 58% to a record $43.36 a share. And on Feb. 10, 2005 — his 51st birthday — Cummins' cashed out $14.7 million in stock options, netting $10.3 million after his trading costs.

Sharing his good fortune were nine other insiders, including CFO Westbrook and board compensation committee members Coelho and Appel. Cyberonics officials cashed out $19.9 million in trading profits that February, in the largest sale of stock by insiders in any month in company history, according to Thomson Financial.

But the letter that Cummins wrote to the FDA was inaccurate on several accounts, he acknowledged during an interview in August.

In that interview, Cummins conceded he did not discover his late mother's body. Rather, Cummins said, the Mercer County, Pa., coroner's office informed him of her death.

He also said he does not know whether his mother was diagnosed with depression, or if her death certificate says she committed suicide. In fact, the death certificate and coroner's report state she died of natural causes.

As for where the term "treatment-resistant depression" he cited comes from, Cummins said, "We invented it."

Cummins burst into tears when discussing his mother. When he regained his composure, he said, "If you look at what Cyberonics has accomplished, it's not for the faint of heart.

"The leader of Cyberonics has to be willing to stand up and say, 'We're going to make it.'

"As the leader of Cyberonics, even if you're scared beyond words, you have to be able to convince people they can do the impossible."

Capital One Ex-CFO Resolves Charges (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Insider Trading Probe Is Settled For $1.8 Million

DOJ_NMG_0096653

A former chief financial officer of credit card issuer Capital One Financial Corp. agreed to pay more than $1.8 million to settle insider trading charges, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday.

David M. Willey was accused of exercising Capital One stock options and cashing in shares after learning in 2002 that a regulatory examination of the company was likely to end unfavorably. After the results of the examination were made public, Capital One's stock price plunged by about 40 percent.

Without admitting or denying wrongdoing, Willey agreed to give up $801,434 in alleged ill-gotten gains, plus $218,180 in interest and a penalty of $801,434. The SEC dismissed a related claim against Willey's wife, Joy S. Willey, a former Capital One vice president. The agency had previously named her as a defendant alleging that some of the proceeds of the insider trading were in her possession.

An attorney for David Willey, William M. Mann, declined to comment.

Willey, who joined McLean-based Capital One in 1989, earned more than $1.2 million in salary and bonus in 2001, according to a company report.

The following year, Federal Reserve examiners found serious management problems in areas under his authority, the SEC alleged in a 2004 complaint. The lead examiner told Willey of the Fed's concerns in a private meeting and warned that they could lead to formal supervisory action, the complaint said.

Willey, of Great Falls, knew that if the Fed examination cost him his job, his stock options would expire within 90 days, the SEC alleged. In the spring of 2002, he exercised tens of thousands of options in his account and in his wife's, which he controlled, the SEC alleged. He also sold Capital One shares. The transactions yielded several millions of dollars in profits, the SEC alleged.

The SEC said Willey knew or should have known that Capital One's stock price would fall when the Fed's actions became public. Indeed, when Capital One's general counsel learned about the potential regulatory action, he immediately barred all senior executives from trading in Capital One securities. Willey, however, had completed his sales by then.

Willey was forced to resign from Capital One in 2003, the SEC alleged.

Under the settlement, he is banned from serving as an officer or director of a public company for five years.

South Korean Prosecutors Indict Lone Star, KEB (WSJ)

By Laura Santini And Lina Yoon

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

South Korean prosecutors indicted Dallas private-equity firm Lone Star Funds and Korea Exchange Bank on stock-manipulation charges related to the bank's credit-card unit, part of a nine-month investigation that the U.S. firm has blamed on antiforeign sentiment in Korea.

The chief prosecutor in the case, Chae Dong Wook, vowed to continue a separate probe into whether Lone Star illegally purchased the bank in 2003. Prosecutors have been examining whether government and bank officials conspired to understate KEB's financial health when Lone Star acquired control of the bank. Lone Star's role in that transaction is also under scrutiny.

Korean lawmakers have threatened to nullify Lone Star's original purchase of KEB if wrongdoing is discovered, jeopardizing a $7 billion sale of the firm's controlling stake to Korea's Kookmin Bank that would secure a $4.5 billion profit for Lone Star.

In recent months, prosecutors have turned their focus to KEB's credit-card unit, leading some foreign investors watching the investigation to speculate that the prosecution had reached an impasse with the broader probe into the KEB purchase. Regarding KEB itself, prosecutors still haven't provided any evidence of wrongdoing by Lone Star in the transaction.

Last week, the Korean court issued arrest warrants for Lone Star's vice chairman, Ellis Short, and Michael Thomson, the firm's general counsel. Both men have refused to travel to Korea.

"They want to show the general public that they have a good case," said Hwang Ju Myung, a lawyer representing Lone Star in Korea, in characterizing the indictment yesterday. Mr. Hwang said the next step will be for the courts to set a trial date.

Foreign investors have complained that a backlash against them is hampering deal making in the country and scaring off newcomers.

DOJ_NMG_0096654

For their part, Koreans are outraged at the use of tax shelters by foreign funds, which allowed the funds to buy assets cheaply after the Asian financial crisis of 1997-98 and then sell them at huge profits -- all without paying capital-gains taxes.

Yesterday's indictment names KEB and LSF-KEB Holdings SCA, a special-purpose vehicle owned by Lone Star that is KEB's largest shareholder, with a 51% stake. If KEB and the Lone Star vehicle are convicted of the stock-manipulation charges, the court may order a fine, Mr. Hwang said.

The indictment is the upshot of a probe into KEB's merger with the separately listed credit-card unit, KEB Credit Services. In 2003, KEBCS was under a mountain of bad debt amid a credit-card debacle in Korea. In November of that year, KEB's board said it would rescue the company by implementing a so-called capital reduction, in which the value of the shares outstanding is wiped out and the company works with creditors to restructure its debt.

The board's announcement precipitated a drop in the credit-card unit's share price, as panicky investors rushed to sell ahead of the plan. Days later, KEB announced that instead of the capital reduction, it would buy out existing shareholders, whose shares were now worth much less than before.

Prosecutors have estimated that minority shareholders lost about 22.6 billion won ($24 million) from the share decline.

A KEB spokeswoman declined to comment yesterday. The bank has previously denounced the allegations of stock manipulation as "groundless." In a statement in September, it argued that prosecutors are revisiting accusations made in January 2004 by KEBCS's labor union. At the time, KEB argued, investigators didn't see the merit of pursuing those accusations.

SEC Filings Show New Chairman Got Options 3 Years Before Joining Board (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, November 21, 2006

Former U.S. congressman Tony Coelho received below-market stock options from Cyberonics in early 1994, three years before he joined the board, at a much deeper discount to the market price than the company's stock-option plan provided for at the time, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings.

On Monday, Coelho was named chairman of the medical device maker after its former chairman and CEO, Robert Cummins, resigned under pressure. Coelho did not respond to requests for comment through the company, his lawyer or the Epilepsy Foundation, which he chairs.

Coelho's first options at Cyberonics, dated April 14, 1994, entitled him to buy 20,000 shares of company stock at a 32% discount to the stock's market price on the grant date, according to a Form 3 stock ownership record he filed later with the SEC.

Cyberonics' maximum discount on options it issued at the time was 15%, according to the company's stock-option plan filed separately with the SEC that October.

In Cyberonics' 1994 shareholder proxy filing, which contained a copy of the plan, company officials stated that all options under the plan had been issued at the stock's fair market value.

Another member of the board's compensation committee, neurologist Stanley Appel, also received below-market stock options in 1994, two years and three months before he joined the board. Appel got 50,000 options on Sept. 21, 1994, priced at $3.06, a 35% discount to the stock's market price that day.

Since mid-1997, Coelho and Appel have served on the board's compensation committee, forming a two-member panel during many of those years. The two directors administered Cyberonics' stock-option plan and helped set CEO compensation.

Coelho, the former Democratic party whip in the House, resigned from Congress in June 1989 after failing to disclose on his congressional financial statement a “junk” bond investment he had obtained on favorable terms. In recent years, Coelho and Appel cashed out their below-market options from Cyberonics at different times, reaping nearly $1.1 million in combined profits, SEC filings show.

Appel had no comment. At the time Coelho and Appel received their below-market options, the head of the compensation committee was Cummins, who took the helm of the company in October 1995. Cummins also declined to comment.

Cyberonics is now under investigation by the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan, which are looking into the company's history of awarding lucrative stock options to company officers and directors. Until Monday, the company denied any wrongdoing. It now says it has identified some irregularities, principally from 1999 to 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0096655

According to Financial Accounting Standards Board rule APB 25, issued in 1993, Cyberonics should have recorded the 1994 below-market options as an expense for tax and accounting purposes.

In addition, the two men would have been required to report as personal income that year the difference between the Cyberonics options' price and the stock's market price.

"It is taxable income in the year in which the option is received. And the income is the difference between the strike price" — that is, the price at which the option is issued — "and the fair market value," says tax lawyer Kenneth Rubinstein.

For Coelho, the taxable benefit would have been $50,000 on the grant date. For Appel, the benefit would have been $84,375 on the grant date.

Former longtime Cyberonics director Thomas Duerden, 76, whom company documents show served on the compensation committee in 1994 when Coelho and Appel were awarded the below-market options, said in an interview, "I don't recall ever being a member of the compensation committee." But he calls the below-market options to Appel and Coelho "very improbable."

Duerden also is unable to say what Coelho and Appel did to earn their options. "I didn't know Stan Appel from a bar of soap until he joined the board" in 1996, Duerden says.

And, he says, "It's my memory that the first time I ever set eyes on Tony Coelho was when he joined the board" in 1997.

Appel first reported his below-market options to the SEC in December 1996, 27 months after the grant date. Appel cashed out half of this below-market grant on June 21, 2004, for a $639,249 profit. He also held onto 20,000 shares with a market value of $680,400 on that date.

Coelho first disclosed his April 1994 options grant in March 1997 upon joining the company's board. Unlike most stock options that mature over four to five years, Coelho's filing shows that these options could be cashed in immediately.

In June 2002, Coelho made another disclosure in a Form 5 stock ownership record filed with the SEC. In that filing, Coelho reported having received 20,000 options on March 8, 1994 — coinciding with the lowest price the stock traded at that month — rather than on April 14, 1994, but at the same price.

A key difference in the 2002 filing was that Coelho reported those options as vesting over five years rather than right away. He made a $444,420 profit when he cashed out the options in November 2003.

"Why did (Coelho) get an option grant three years before he joined the board? Why has the date moved? Why is the stock priced low? And (why), when they first reported them, (did) they (say) they were immediately vestable, and then later, they said, no, they vest over five years? Which one was it?" asks former SEC attorney Ronald Mueller, who specializes in executive compensation and disclosure issues.

Former SEC chairman Harvey Pitt says, "One of" Coelho's filings "has to be wrong.

"Both of them," Pitt says, "could be wrong."

Sumner Redstone's Nephew Sues Over Management Of Family Trusts (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

Viacom Inc. Chairman Sumner Redstone, already facing a lawsuit from his son, now faces a suit from his nephew who claims he and other family heirs were bilked out of an approximately $4 billion stake in the Redstone family's business empire.

The suit, coming nine months after Mr. Redstone's son Brent filed suit against his father seeking to gain direct control of the son's personal stake in the empire, is likely to add to questions about the strength of Sumner Redstone's hold on Viacom and CBS Corp., both of which are controlled by the Redstone family.

In a lawsuit filed in a Massachusetts court this month, Michael Redstone alleges his father Edward Redstone and his uncle Sumner Redstone engaged in "self-dealing," "breaches of fiduciary duty" and "unjust enrichment as trustees of certain Redstone family trusts" when they bought his stake and that of other heirs in the family company, National Amusements Inc., in a series of transactions in 1972 and 1984.

Michael Redstone's suit against his father, uncle and the family company is joined by the trustees for trusts representing his late sister Ruth Ann and a trust set up for the four children of Edward Redstone and Sumner Redstone -- Michael, Ruth Ann, Brent and Shari. Michael Redstone and the trustees are asking for the 1972 and 1984 transactions to be rescinded or for damages "in an amount equal to the present value of those shares."

DOJ_NMG_0096656

The suit claims that National Amusements, which owns controlling stakes in CBS Corp. and Viacom Inc., is worth $8 billion. Absent the disputed transactions, the suit says the trust's combined stake would have been 50%, suggesting that the plaintiffs are seeking $4 billion. If the suit prevails, Sumner Redstone's control of National Amusements could be diluted.

In a statement, National Amusements called the allegations "baseless" and said it would defend itself vigorously. "This suit is particularly troubling considering the important role Sumner Redstone has played helping Michael overcome serious obstacles throughout his life," according to NAI spokeswoman Brandy Bergman. "Mr. Redstone essentially rescued Michael from a difficult family environment, removed him from a mental institution, paid for his education and gave him a job at NAI. It is unfortunate that this is how Michael has chosen to repay Sumner Redstone's care and generosity."

The younger Redstone's attorney, William Narwold of Motley Rice LLC in Hartford, Conn., declined to comment on his client's relationship with his uncle and his personal life. "I think it would be a mistake to make this lawsuit about Michael," he said. "This is, in our view, a lawsuit brought by the trustees who have obligations not only to the current beneficiaries but also to future beneficiaries."

The Redstone family dispute echoes those of other families who have passed on their businesses to the next generation. Last year, Liesel Pritzker, scion of the Chicago-based Pritzker family that owns the Hyatt Corp. hotel chain, and her brother each won about $450 million in a settlement, after she alleged that her father had secretly stripped her trust funds of more than $1 billion.

The Redstone family feud dates back to 1936, when Sumner Redstone's father Michael "Mickey" Redstone started his first drive-in movie theater. As the company expanded into a regional chain of theaters, the elder Redstone set up a series of trusts for his children and their children. Each trust contained a stake in the company.

In 1972, Edward and Sumner had a falling out, and as part of the resolution, National Amusements bought out Edward's shares and a portion of his children's shares for $5 million. Edward also agreed to let Sumner be the sole trustee of his children's trusts. Although Edward's children were minors, the lawsuit alleges that no guardian was appointed to protect their interest in this transaction.

In 1984, Sumner paid $21.4 million to buy back the shares of the trusts for Michael, Ruth Ann and the trust set up for all four children. The lawsuit alleges that the transaction set an artificially low valuation on the company and was "self-dealing" because Sumner was both buyer and seller of the shares.

Paulson Criticizes Regulation (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, November 21, 2006

NEW YORK — U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said Monday that the tough, costly rules put in place to combat corporate frauds such as Enron need to be enforced in a more flexible manner if U.S. financial markets are to retain their competitive edge around the globe.

In his first major speech on market regulation, the former chairman of Goldman Sachs said regulators' decision to “impose rule upon rule upon rule” was making it more difficult for U.S. markets to attract business from abroad.

Many non-American businesses, he said, that are faced with spiraling accounting costs, mounting legal burdens and a confusing and threatening enforcement system here in the USA, were opting to take their business to markets with less onerous regulation, such as London and Hong Kong. He cited a drop in the number of foreign companies listing their initial public offerings on U.S. exchanges as evidence.

“When it comes to regulation, balance is key,” Paulson said. “The right regulatory balance should marry high standards of integrity and accountability with a strong foundation for innovation, growth and competitiveness.”

The speech comes amid increasing criticism from businesses that the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, designed to reduce accounting fraud and make corporate CEOs more accountable, is too costly and time consuming to implement.

DOJ_NMG_0096657

Paulson stressed that he does not believe new legislation is needed. Rather, he said, the government needs to "implement the law in ways that better balance the benefits of the legislation with the very significant costs that it imposes, especially on small businesses."

In an attempt to make existing laws more flexible, Paulson said, those enforcing the laws must "rise above a rules-based mind-set that asks, 'Is this legal?' and adopt a more principles-based approach that asks, 'Is this right?' "

Paulson's comments come just weeks after Democrats took control of Congress in the midterm elections. In a statement, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., member of the Senate Banking and Finance Committees, said the committee looks forward to working with Paulson. "While most are pleased with the balance between entrepreneurialism and regulation that we've achieved, the new prominence of international competition requires us to re-examine that balance in a careful and thoughtful way so that we keep America No. 1," he said.

On the issue of finding solutions to the future funding shortfall of Social Security: "Now is a good time to deal with it when the economy is so strong," Paulson said in a Q&A session after his speech. "It's better to act from a position of strength."

On the economic front, Paulson said the key to keeping America strong is to reform entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicaid, improve our energy independence and maintain free trade. "These challenges," he said, "won't be easy."

Paulson Urges Flexible Market Regulation (FT)

By Jeremy Grant And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, November 21, 2006

The US should move towards a more flexible, UK-style approach to regulating its capital markets to preserve its global competitiveness, Hank Paulson, US Treasury secretary, said on Monday.

Saying the US "should be open to learning from ... the experience of others", Mr Paulson said the country's regulators should put less emphasis on rules and more on principles.

The call marks a fundamental break with a regulatory approach rooted in the securities markets of the 1930s.

It comes as top US policymakers worry that the US "rules-based" system is not flexible enough to deal with the pace of innovation in capital markets, global exchange consolidation and emerging competition from abroad.

"It is necessary to take a global view. We don't operate in isolation, so it is very important to consider how changes we make affect the ability of our companies to compete globally and how these changes affect our interaction with markets and regulators around the world," Mr Paulson said in a speech to the Economic Club of New York.

"Our rules-based regulatory system is prescriptive, and leads to a greater focus on compliance with specific rules. We should move toward a structure that gives regulators more flexibility to work with entities on compliance within the spirit of regulatory principles," he said.

Without naming the UK, his comments are a clear reference to a less prescriptive approach to regulation championed by the Financial Services Authority and embodied in European accounting standards.

Taking issue with the US rules-based accounting system, he said: "Businesses and auditors are searching for something that doesn't exist in today's constantly changing world - a rules-based safe haven that still provides investors with an accurate portrayal of a company's financial performance."

Referring to the need for European companies to reconcile their International Financial Reporting Standards accounts with US GAAP, Mr Paulson said: "We should recognise that the time and cost that go into reconciling and restating IFRS statements may not be a worthwhile expense for a foreign company considering the US market."

"Added complexity and more rules are not the answer for a system that needs to provide accurate and timely information to investors in a world where best of class companies are continually readjusting their business models to remain competitive," he said.

He also warned that the existence of only four big auditing firms "may not be healthy".

"The current situation forces us to ask questions about the industry's sustainability and effectiveness. Is there enough competition?"

DOJ_NMG_0096658

The “big four” accounting firms fear that huge liability litigation suits could bring down a firm and have argued for caps on the amounts of such suits.

Mr Paulson pointed out that the US has four separate banking regulators, with a “similar dynamic” in the securities and commodities markets, and their related self-regulatory structures.

Each of these organisations had different statutory responsibilities and a number had different regulatory philosophies. The US also had a dual federal-state regulatory system in the banking and securities markets – “and the degree of federal pre-emption over state law in these areas varies greatly”.

“A consequence of [this] is an ever-expanding rulebook in which multiple regulators impose rule upon rule upon rule. Unless we carefully consider the cost/benefit trade-off implicit in these rules, there is a danger of creating a thicket of regulation that impedes competitiveness,” Mr Paulson said.

He said the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley auditing and compliance law had also “fundamentally” altered interactions between auditors and company management “in a number of ways, some of which are not constructive”.

Turning to enforcement, Mr Paulson said that a combination of enforcement and guidance was likely to be more effective and more efficient than relying on enforcement alone.

“When multiple jurisdictions and entities are involved, each with their own objectives and approaches, the enforcement environment can become inefficient and, to the regulated, can appear confusing and threatening,” he said, referring to multiple US state and federal enforcement agencies.

Paulson Says Business Is Over-Regulated (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 21, 2006

Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. yesterday criticized the nation's "ever-expanding rulebook" and its burdensome legal system for constraining the economy but rejected wholesale revisions to a corporate accountability law under attack from business groups.

Paulson, a former chairman of the investment bank Goldman Sachs, called for striking a regulatory balance as he delivered his first major policy address on the subject since joining the government in July. "Excessive regulation slows innovation, imposes needless costs on investors, and stifles competitiveness and job creation," he said in a speech to the Economic Club of New York.

But under questioning, Paulson stood behind the controversial Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed in 2002 after financial scandals rocked the stock market and devastated investor confidence. Policymakers do not need to reopen the law, Paulson said. Instead, he expressed confidence in the work of securities regulators and accounting industry overseers, who are racing to make audit rules more flexible for small businesses that have complained about the regulations' cost. The eagerly awaited proposed revisions are to be unveiled within weeks, Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, has said.

"I don't think there is a single principle in [Sarbanes-Oxley] that is ill-founded," Paulson said after the speech.

Paulson's remarks come as trade groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce exhort lawmakers and regulators to retool corporate rules, which they contend are leading fewer companies to list on U.S. exchanges. A chamber-affiliated coalition led by William M. Daley, who was an official during Bill Clinton's presidency, and A.B. Culvahouse, counsel to former president Reagan, issued data yesterday that they said reflected a decade-long decline in market share of corporate listings in the United States.

Some consumer advocates warn that tighter rules make for a convenient scapegoat. Barbara Roper of the Consumer Federation of America pointed to other factors, including steep investment banking fees and changes in the global economy, for the dip in U.S. public offerings.

Business groups insist the changes would combat what they say is an overly onerous application of the law. "No one is talking about a wholesale rollback," said Robert S. Nichols, president of the Financial Services Forum, a coalition of large banks for which Paulson once served as chairman. "That would be a very serious mistake in our view. It's a matter of discussing the implementation and execution."

DOJ_NMG_0096659

In his speech, Paulson sought to take the debate beyond recent corporate reforms and into broader terrain. He singled out class-action lawsuits as an Achilles' heel in the legal system, which he contended have "gone beyond protection" of investors and now hamper business competition.

Statistics compiled by NERA Economic Consulting suggest that the number of class-action lawsuits filed against corporations and executives has plummeted in the past two years, especially since the indictment of the law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, which had been a leader in filing plaintiff cases before being charged with improperly paying people to serve as clients.

"Investors already are getting pennies on the dollar for massive losses they suffered in recent scandals," said Roper, of the consumer group. "I don't think you can sell that message after the experience we've been through."

Separately, Paulson called for more "constructive" dialogue among prosecutors and corporate executives, citing possible changes to the Justice Department's guidelines on charging companies with crimes. The 2002 prosecution of accounting firm Arthur Andersen for charges of obstructing justice helped push it out of business, an issue that Paulson said has reduced choice and competition in the auditing industry.

An unusual coalition including the American Civil Liberties Union and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce testified before Congress this year in support of relaxing parts of the Justice guidelines, known as the Thompson memo, named after former deputy attorney general Larry D. Thompson.

Paulson said he would host a conference early next year to explore problematic rules, accounting and legal issues and to lay a foundation for possible new initiatives within the executive branch and Congress. Last week, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), who is set to lead the Senate Banking Committee when Congress returns in January, expressed skepticism that the Sarbanes-Oxley law had hampered U.S. competitiveness.

But the wider topic appears to have drawn some bipartisan support. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), whose constituents include many Wall Street executives, yesterday referred to "a growing consensus . . . that we need to do a complete and comprehensive review of America's and New York's worldwide competitive position in financial services."

SEC To Undergo Further Scrutiny From Congress (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission, already under fire for its handling of a suspected insider-trading case, will receive more congressional scrutiny next month when the Senate Judiciary Committee holds a hearing on the agency's effectiveness.

Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the committee until the new Democrat-controlled Congress convenes in January, has scheduled an oversight hearing on the SEC for Dec. 5.

The hearing comes as the SEC has been on the defensive since Sen. Specter and Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) said they were investigating the agency's handling of an insider-trading investigation involving hedge fund Pequot Capital Management and John Mack, the chief executive of Morgan Stanley. The matter, which was brought to their attention by a former SEC attorney, was referred to the Government Accountability Office for a thorough review of the SEC's enforcement division.

Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's enforcement chief, is expected to testify at the hearing. Pequot founder Arthur Samberg has been notified of the hearing, according to a person familiar with the matter. It is unclear if Sen. Specter will compel his testimony. A spokesman for Pequot declined to comment.

Sen. Specter is expected to discuss the ability of the Justice Department to work with the SEC on investigations, following two court rulings that criticized the agencies for working too closely. He is also likely to discuss hedge funds, which he has said require tough enforcement.

DOJ_NMG_0096660

It follows two hearings Sen. Specter held earlier this year. The first focused on hedge funds and short-selling activities, and Gary Aguirre, a former SEC attorney, testified about the SEC's handling of the Pequot investigation. Mr. Aguirre says he was fired after he sought to compel the testimony of Mr. Mack, who he suspected of tipping inside information to Pequot about a pending takeover. Mr. Aguirre has charged that the SEC denied his interview request because of Mr. Mack's political connections, and he said the agency allowed insider-trading referrals to gather dust, allegations the SEC has denied. Mr. Mack testified before the SEC this summer, and the agency said last month it wouldn't file charges against Pequot or Mr. Mack.

Sen. Specter has criticized the SEC's diligence in following up on insider-trading referrals from exchanges. The SEC says 75% of referrals become informal probes.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Criminal Network To Catch Crooks In Cyberspace, FBI Goes Global (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-Low

The Wall Street Journal, November 21, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey -- On Aug. 16, 2005, a CNN television news bulletin alerted viewers that computers at the network's New York and Atlanta offices were infected with a new virus called Zotob. Soon, U.S. companies from coast to coast were hit.

Halfway around the world, two young computer hackers in Turkey and Morocco got spooked by the ensuing media coverage, but mocked the ability of authorities to track them down. "They can't find me," wrote Atilla Ekici, a 23-year-old Turk, in an email to his accomplice, a 19-year-old Moroccan called Farid Essebar. "Ha, ha, ha," replied Mr. Essebar.

The U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, however, was already hot on their trail. The 98-year-old FBI, which has traditionally focused on domestic crime, is extending its reach beyond U.S. borders and boosting cooperation with other law-enforcement agencies in pursuit of cybercriminals, much as the agency has done in tracking down terrorists overseas.

The shift reflects the global nature of computer crimes, which include unleashing viruses, worms and other rogue programs onto victims' computers to disrupt them or steal information. As electronic borders between countries blur, hackers in one nation can easily commit crimes against individuals, corporations and governments on the other side of the world.

The FBI now ranks cybercrime as its third priority behind terrorism and espionage. Computer-based crimes caused $14.2 billion in damages to businesses around the globe in 2005, including the cost of repairing systems and lost business, estimates Irvine, Calif., research firm Computer Economics.

Building relationships with police in other countries is "the only way we are going to effectively get a handle on the problem," says Christopher Painter, deputy chief of the Justice Department's Computer Crime Section.

The FBI is running into limits fighting international computer crime. Cybercrooks remain difficult to pinpoint in part because hackers can hide their tracks by commandeering computers from afar and routing their activities through machines dotted around the world.

Even when the agency does find suspects overseas, local authorities sometimes lack the resources or laws to prosecute. In its pursuit of LoveBug, one of the first big international computer viruses, which spread around the world in 2000, the FBI located its creator in the Philippines. But he was never charged because local laws didn't specify the virus writer's activities as illegal at the time.

"The criminal community is winning," says Nicholas Ianelli, a security analyst at the CERT Coordination Center at Carnegie Mellon University, a federally funded group that coordinates responses to computer-security incidents.

But the agency is making some headway, thanks partly to a diplomatic offensive to enlist help from foreign agencies. It now has about 150 agents deployed in some 56 offices around the world, including in Iraq and China, which deal with computer intrusions, as well as terrorism and other crimes. That has grown from about a dozen offices in the early 1990s.

During the past two years or so, the FBI has also built up Cyber Action Teams, or CATs -- a group of about 25 people that includes agents, computer forensic experts and specialists in computer code, according to David Thomas, the deputy assistant director of the FBI's science and technology branch. Establishing the team has taken longer than expected, in part because of the challenges of hiring people with the right skills, Mr. Thomas says.

DOJ_NMG_0096661

Earlier this month, the FBI announced the arrest of at least 16 individuals involved in a credit-card theft scam as part of an investigation spanning the U.S., Poland and Romania. As part of the probe, the FBI temporarily posted several agents with Polish and Romanian police to assist with surveillance and information sharing.

Some overseas police agencies have noticed the change. The FBI is "much more open to interaction" than it was even a few years ago, says Kevin Zuccato, director of the Australian federal police's high-tech crime center. One FBI agent is even embedded full-time with Australia's high-tech crime center. Usually, FBI agents are posted within U.S. embassies and consulates abroad.

Police in other countries can also get touchy about defending their turf from outsiders, just as a local beat cop in the U.S. might resent interference from the FBI on a murder case. In 2002, Russian police accused an FBI agent with computer hacking after the agent seized evidence against two Russian hackers by downloading data from their computers in Russia without approval from local authorities. Russia hasn't pursued the charges, however, and the agent is still at the FBI. The two countries since then have worked on several cybercrime cases.

The FBI's overseas push is still a long way from winning the borderless battle against cybercrime. But as the tale of the Zotob virus shows, the agency is scoring some victories.

By Sunday Aug. 14, 2005, the FBI and antivirus software companies noticed that a virus called Zotob had started to spread. The virus infected computers by taking advantage of a weakness in some versions of Microsoft Corp.'s popular Windows operating system, causing them to slow or reboot repeatedly.

But that wasn't all: Zotob opened a door for other malicious software to be installed, such as "key-logging" programs that record what a PC user types into a keyboard -- a way to snatch credit-card numbers and other information that is sold to criminal gangs. Zotob hit some 100,000 companies or more, some analysts estimate, including Time Warner Inc.'s CNN division and New York Times Co.

Even before the virus became famous by attacking CNN's computers, FBI Agent Erkan Chase and his colleagues were tracking the code. They discovered that the Zotob computer program had a signature line "by Diabl0". Mr. Chase, a 41-year-old former New York cop, recalled the nickname from another virus that he had started monitoring earlier in the year, called Mytob. That suggested the same person created both viruses.

Mr. Chase, who was overseeing the FBI's Cyber Action Teams at the time, checked in with the FBI's U.S. field offices and found that agents in Seattle had opened an investigation into Diabl0 after Mytob hit, linking him to an email account at Microsoft in nearby Redmond, Wash. With search warrants served on the software giant, Mr. Chase and his colleagues obtained emails between Diabl0 and another suspect using the nickname "Coder." They also received subscriber information and other evidence indicating the two were using computers in Morocco and Turkey, respectively.

In their email traffic, the tone of the hackers became cautious after media coverage of the virus, especially a local report in Turkey that authorities believed one of the hackers might be living there. The two suspects discussed whether to take precautions by getting rid of the evidence, by wiping or ditching their computer hard drives.

That raised the pressure on Mr. Chase to act quickly and try to arrest the two young men before it was too late. "We had to respond pretty quickly because we didn't want to get out there and find there was no evidence," he said.

Late afternoon on Aug. 18, 2005, just days after the virus hit, the head of the Turkish national police's cybercrime unit, Omer Tekeli, received a call from the U.S. Embassy in Ankara asking for help. The FBI teams only travel overseas at the behest of local authorities and don't have special powers to make arrests, but can offer technical and investigative assistance.

Mr. Tekeli agreed, and later that same day, an FBI agent from the Seattle office called to brief Turkish police on the details, including information they had gathered on Coder, Mr. Tekeli says. Mr. Tekeli's team soon identified Coder as Mr. Ekici, a farmer's son who had taught himself about computers at Internet cafes. Turkish authorities already knew of Mr. Ekici from an earlier investigation into a gang of credit-card thieves. Among other details, the FBI provided an email address for Coder that included part of Mr. Ekici's name as well as the equivalent of digital fingerprints that linked Coder's computer with Mr. Ekici's home address.

DOJ_NMG_0096662

On Aug. 21, a week after noticing the virus, Mr. Chase left with a team of about a dozen people for Morocco and Turkey, flying in an FBI Learjet. The fact that Mr. Chase, whose mother is Turkish, spoke some of the local language helped smooth the process. After dropping half the group in the Moroccan capital of Rabat, Mr. Chase landed in Ankara, Turkey.

At the sparsely furnished offices of Turkey's cybercrime police, the FBI team handed over evidence they had obtained about the suspects from Microsoft and about 25 pages of analysis of the malicious code. FBI engineers gave a roughly hour-long presentation on how the code worked, complete with slides. In Rabat, meanwhile, emails provided by the FBI enabled Moroccan authorities to locate Diabl0 -- Mr. Essebar -- as well as an accomplice. Emails typically carry a unique set of numbers, known as an Internet protocol address, which identifies each computer connected to the Internet. Moroccan police were able to obtain the name and contact details associated with the Internet protocol addresses received from the FBI from a local Internet service provider.

The FBI's documents also helped local authorities swiftly secure arrest and search warrants. Concerned that the arrest of one suspect would tip off the others, Mr. Chase helped the two countries coordinate the raids. In the early hours of Aug. 25, Turkish police officers surrounded Mr. Ekici's home and took him into custody. About 2,000 miles away in Rabat, police moved in on Mr. Essebar and his accomplice. The FBI wasn't invited to be present at either of the arrests. Turkish and Moroccan authorities say that is because only local police are allowed to charge suspects under the respective national laws.

Mr. Ekici in Turkey had disposed of his computer hard drive so Turkish investigators weren't able to gather much evidence from his machine. But Mr. Essebar in Morocco only reformatted his hard drive, which wipes out files but let the Moroccan police's computer specialists recover most of them because copies often still exist.

Among the finds were copies of the code itself and other information identifying Mr. Essebar as Zotob's author. Police also found emails between Diabl0 and Coder discussing Zotob as well as the numbers of about 1,600 stolen credit cards.

In parallel, FBI specialists worked off a copy of the hard drive, searching for relevant emails and writing a piece of computer code on the fly to help them analyze the program. "We were able to use that information from Morocco and give it to Turkish authorities to further [their] investigation," says Mr. Chase.

In September of this year, a Rabat court sentenced Mr. Essebar, a Russian-born Moroccan national, to two years in prison for virus-writing, illegal access to computers and conspiracy to commit credit-card fraud. The court also sentenced his 21-year-old accomplice to one year in prison for conspiracy to commit fraud. A lawyer for Mr. Essebar couldn't be reached. At the time of the sentencing, news service Agence France Presse cited a lawyer for the defendants saying they planned to appeal.

Authorities allege Mr. Ekici, whom they believe met Mr. Essebar at a Web site for credit-card fraudsters, was responsible for disseminating the Zotob worm and intended to use it to steal financial information. But they say it is unclear whether he had time to swipe any information or profit from it given the speed with which they were able to arrest him, less than two weeks after the worm first spread.

The trial of Mr. Ekici, whom Turkish authorities have charged with unauthorized access to computers and disseminating a virus, continues in Turkey. He couldn't be reached for comment.

The Zotob case marked the first time foreign law enforcement has come to Turkey to assist in a cybercrime investigation, says Mr. Tekeli, the cybercrime unit chief in Turkey. Without the FBI's help, the investigation "would have been more difficult and more time consuming," he says. Hakim Aarab, an engineer in the Moroccan police's computer division, says because of the borderless nature of cybercrime, "international collaboration is an obligation, it's not an option."

Gangsters Who Targeted Blacks Get Life (AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Three members of a Hispanic gang were sentenced Monday to life in prison without the possibility of parole for using murder and other violent acts to intimidate blacks in their neighborhood.

Federal prosecutors had accused Gilbert Saldana, Alejandro Martinez and Fernando Cazares of targeting blacks in the largely Hispanic community of Highland Park, east of downtown Los Angeles. They were found guilty of conspiring to use violence, including the shooting deaths of two black men in 1999 and 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0096663

Authorities said it was one of the first prominent cases in which the U.S. Justice Department targeted a street gang with laws normally used to prosecute white supremacist groups.

"These were horrific offenses that have had far-reaching consequences," U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson said during sentencing.

Each defendant received two consecutive life sentences. They were convicted in August.

A fourth man, Porfirio Avila, was also convicted. He was scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 18.

Government Backs Off Prison Restrictions (AP-Y)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 21, 2006

Prosecutors have dropped plans to ask a federal judge to prevent leaders of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang from communicating with anyone but their attorneys, officials said Monday, but they may ask U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to do so instead.

Prosecutors will probably ask the Bureau of Prisons to impose the bans on Barry "The Baron" Mills, T.D. "The Hulk" Bingham, Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson, said U.S. attorney's office spokesman Thom Mrozek.

The change means defense attorneys wouldn't be able to fight the restrictions until after they have been imposed, which would delay the appeals process, said Mark Fleming, an attorney representing Mills.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe filed papers Friday in federal court withdrawing a request for a federal judge to impose the restrictions.

An order would also keep writing implements, paper and previously viewed reading material out of the inmates' cells.

Mills, Bingham and Hevle are to be sentenced Tuesday for murder, conspiracy and racketeering. Gibson, who recently had back surgery, won't be sentenced Tuesday because he can't be present.

Similar bans have been imposed only 11 times in the history of the federal prison system. Inmates Zacarias Moussaoui, the suspected "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11, 2001, World Trade Center attack, and convicted Unabomber Ted Kaczynski are among those with restrictions on their prison contacts.

All four men were convicted of racketeering and three were convicted of murder in a case aimed at dismantling the white supremacist organization, which is accused of dealing drugs and spreading terror inside some of the nation's most dangerous prisons.

Mills and Bingham face life in prison without the possibility of parole; Hevle and Gibson face 20 years to life.

G.O.P. Fund-Raiser Sentenced For Embezzlement In Ohio (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio, Nov. 20 (AP) — A Republican fund-raiser who embezzled from a state investment in rare coins was sentenced Monday to 18 years in prison for his role in a scandal that helped bring down Ohio's ruling Republican Party.

The fund-raiser, Tom Noe, 52, was also fined $139,000.

Mr. Noe spent money as if he had "a bottomless cup of wealth and luxury" at his disposal, "when in fact it was at the state's expense," Judge Thomas Osowik of Common Pleas Court said Monday.

The sentence is on top of the more than two years Mr. Noe was ordered to serve after pleading guilty earlier this year to illegally funneling $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign.

Mr. Noe declined to make a statement before sentencing and stared blankly, his upper lip twitching, as his punishment was handed down.

Mr. Noe was the central figure in a scandal that dogged the Ohio Republican Party for more than a year. On Election Day, the Democrats won the governor's office, a Senate seat and other major offices after 12 years of Republican rule.

Until Monday, prosecutors did not say whether Mr. Noe had used any of the money to make campaign contributions, but after the sentencing, the prosecutor, Ron O'Brien, said, "You can make those inferences."

Also for the first time, prosecutors on Monday calculated that Mr. Noe had stolen a total of $13.7 million.

DOJ_NMG_0096664

Mr. Noe was hired by the state workers' compensation agency and given $50 million to invest in an unorthodox and risky effort by a state government to make money buying and selling rare coins. A furor erupted when the investment in rare coins became public and when it was learned that millions of dollars were missing.

Democrats asserted that Mr. Noe had gotten the job because of his Republican ties. He was a top fund-raiser who gave more than $105,000 to Republicans, including President Bush and Gov. Bob Taft in 2004.

The resulting investigations led to ethics charges against Mr. Taft, who pleaded no contest to failing to report golf outings and other gifts. Four former Taft aides pleaded no contest to similar charges.

Mr. Noe was convicted of theft, corrupt activity and other offenses last week, and faced a minimum of 10 years in prison on the corrupt-activity charge alone.

Prosecutors said he had used the money to pay off business loans, renovate his home in the Florida Keys and otherwise live in high style.

One of Mr. Noe's lawyers, John Mitchell, had asked for the minimum 10-year sentence, saying that other high-profile criminals had received less time for taking more money.

Married Aleppo Man Held In W. Va. Death (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 21, 2006

Murder suspect waives hearings

WHEELING, W.Va. -- Eugene Talik Jr., a married man accused of killing his girlfriend to hide their illicit affair, yesterday abandoned any hope of getting out of jail before he stands trial.

He waived his right to a bail hearing and to a second proceeding that would have forced federal prosecutors to reveal some of their evidence.

Less than a minute after his court session began, Mr. Talik ended it by saying he did not want to go through either hearing.

U.S. marshals took him back to jail, where he will await his indictment in the death of 28-year-old Kelly Jo Elliott.

Prosecutors say the victim and Mr. Talik, 38, were having an affair that soured after she learned he was married.

The government alleges that Mr. Talik and an accomplice killed Ms. Elliott to stop her from telling his wife.

Grand jurors will consider a murder-for-hire charge against Mr. Talik when they hear the case against him, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert McWilliams said in a motion opposing bail.

After the indictment, Mr. Talik could face the death penalty, Mr. McWilliams said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has the final decision on whether the government will pursue a capital case or try to imprison Mr. Talik for the rest of his life.

As for Mr. Talik's accomplice, he still has not been identified by the government.

His name might have come out yesterday had Mr. Talik insisted on a preliminary hearing. Because he gave up his right to the hearing, prosecutors left court without having to disclose it.

Mr. Talik, a moving van driver from Aleppo, Pa., met Ms. Elliott during a swing through West Virginia.

Tall and powerfully built, he favored short-sleeve shirts that displayed his tattoos, including a spiderweb on his left elbow.

Soon, Ms. Elliott, a single mother of two, began seeing him on his days off or when his moving business brought him near the town of Valley Grove -- where she lived, just outside of Wheeling.

Prosecutors say she was the second West Virginia woman to have an affair with Mr. Talik.

The first told police that Mr. Talik threatened to kill her if she exposed him for cheating in his marriage. The government has not made the woman's name public.

Prosecutors say Mr. Talik and his accomplice killed Ms. Elliott the night of May 25 after extensive planning.

The accomplice owed Mr. Talik about $2,000 for cocaine, so he entered into the murder plot to wipe away his debt. Mr. Talik also promised the man additional cocaine at no charge, prosecutors said.

Ms. Elliott was supposed to be house-sitting for her sister, so the accomplice broke into the home with the idea of shooting her there.

DOJ_NMG_0096665

But, prosecutors said, she changed her plans, so Mr. Talik called the gunman and told him to leave.

Soon after, prosecutors said, the two of them attacked Ms. Elliott near Dallas Pike, where a truck stop is located. The accomplice began the assault. He hit Ms. Elliott with a pipe, but the blow did not kill her.

Prosecutors gave this account of her final moments: Mr. Talik urged his cohort to strangle her, but the man could not bring himself to do it. So Mr. Talik grabbed Ms. Elliott and choked her until she stopped breathing.

Twelve hours later, Mr. Talik appeared at the house where Ms. Elliott had been living.

Her parents told him she had not come home the night before. Mr. Talik told them he was surprised.

Then he left for the weekend, taking his wife, Karen, on a camping trip.

Later, prosecutors say, Mr. Talik disposed of Ms. Elliott's body in Elk County, Pa.

His accomplice led police to her remains last week, breaking the case open.

FBI Recovers Stolen Goya Painting (NSDY/AP)

By Wayne Parry, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, November 21, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. -- The FBI said Monday that it has recovered a 1778 painting by the Spanish artist Francisco de Goya that was stolen as it was being taken to an exhibition earlier this month.

"Children with a Cart," which disappeared en route from the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio to the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum in New York City and was valued at about $1.1 million, appeared to be unharmed, said Les Wiser, agent in charge of the Newark FBI office.

Steven Siegel, a spokesman for the FBI, said the bureau recovered the painting Saturday in New Jersey, but would not be more specific about where or how it was located. No arrests were made, but the case remains under investigation, he said.

The FBI said extensive news coverage of the theft led to tips that enabled the agency to recover the painting.

The painting was taken from an art transporter's truck that was parked overnight in a hotel parking lot in Stroudsburg, Pa., on Nov. 8, authorities said. It had been scheduled to be displayed in the exhibition "Spanish Painting from El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth, and History," which opened at the Guggenheim on Nov. 17.

Siegel said the thieves apparently did not know what was inside the truck when they broke into it. "It was a target of opportunity. They probably thought it was a truck full of PlayStations," he said.

The image of four children at play was insured for about $1 million and was to be exhibited with about 135 paintings by Spanish masters.

The insurer had offered a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of the artwork.

A Phone Call Leads The F.B.I. To A Stolen Goya (NYT)

By Randy Kennedy

The New York Times, November 21, 2006

F.B.I. officials in Newark and Philadelphia said yesterday that they had recovered a Goya painting that was stolen from a truck this month while it was being transported from the collection of the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio to a major exhibition now on view at the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum in Manhattan.

Officials said the painting was recovered unharmed Saturday in central New Jersey after a lawyer called the F.B.I. and told investigators where they could find it while saying that he could not tell them anything else about the theft.

As of late yesterday, no arrests had been made. Because the investigation remains active, officials would not say exactly where or how the painting had been found.

Contrary to earlier law enforcement theories that the theft was carried out by insiders, they did say it appeared that the thieves probably had no idea what kind of art-historical loot they had stumbled upon when they broke into the truck overnight in a parking lot at a Howard Johnson Inn near Bartonsville, Pa.

“This time of year, close to Christmas, they probably thought they’d found a truck filled with PlayStations and broke in and started looking for the biggest-looking box,” said Steve Siegel, an F.B.I. agent who serves as the spokesman for the bureau’s

DOJ_NMG_0096666

Newark office. “Basically, it’s a target-of-opportunity typical New Jersey cargo theft. There are literally predators — for lack of a better word — who when they see a tractor-trailer or a cargo vehicle parked for any length of time start snooping around.”

Officials at the Toledo Museum of Art said the painting, which was insured for $1 million, would not be included as a late entry in the Guggenheim show, “Spanish Painting From El Greco to Picasso: Time, Truth and History,” a sprawling exhibition of some 135 paintings by Spanish masters that opened Friday. Instead, the work, painted in 1778 and titled “Children With a Cart,” will be returned to Toledo.

“We are ecstatic that the painting has been recovered, and we look forward to bringing the Goya home and sharing it again with our community,” Don Bacigalupi, the director of the Toledo Museum of Art, said in a written statement.

Lisa Dennison, the director of the Guggenheim, said the museum would have liked to put the painting into the show but added that it was “understandable that the Toledo Museum would want to bring the stolen painting back to its home after this nerve-racking experience.” She pointed out that the show includes 21 other works by Goya.

The crated painting was stolen either late on the night of Nov. 7 or early on Nov. 8 from a shipping container in the truck while it was parked in an unlighted lot near the Howard Johnson motel. The two drivers checked around 11 p.m. on Nov. 7, according to the motel manager, Faizal Bhimani. He said the white midsize truck was left in a lot adjacent to the hotel, out of sight of the motel’s rooms and the main office.

